[COURT OF APPEAL]

REGINA v. SHARP

1987 April 7

Lord Lane C.J., Farquharson and Gatehouse JJ.

Crime—Duress—Homicide—Person voluntarily joining gang of armed robbers—Reluctant participation in robbery when victim shot and killed—Conviction for manslaughter—Whether defence of duress available

The appellant, who joined a gang of robbers, knew that they used firearms and he participated in a robbery during which the gang leader shot and killed the victim. The appellant was tried on a count charging murder. He submitted that the defence of duress was available to him since he had wished to pull out of the robbery but had participated in fear because a gun had been pointed at his head by the gang leader with a threat to blow it off if the appellant did not participate. The submission was rejected by the trial judge and the appellant was convicted of manslaughter.

On appeal against conviction:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that the defence of duress was not available to a person who voluntarily and with knowledge of its nature joined a criminal organisation or gang, which he knew might bring pressure on him to commit an offence, and was an active member when he was put under such pressure; and that, accordingly, the trial judge was correct in his decision to reject the appellant's submission (post, pp. 8H—9A).

APPEAL against conviction.

The appellant, David Bruce Sharp, on 21 May 1985 in the Crown Court at Reading before Kenneth Jones J. and a jury on a count charging murder was convicted of manslaughter in respect of which he was sentenced to 16 years' imprisonment. He pleaded guilty to counts charging attempted robbery, for which he was sentenced to 15 years' imprisonment and to robbery for which he was sentenced to 16 years' imprisonment; all sentences were ordered to be concurrent. He appealed against conviction for manslaughter on the ground, inter alia, that the trial judge was wrong to withdraw the defence of duress from the jury.

On 16 May 1986 the appeal came before the court (Lawton L.J., Drake J. and Sir Ralph Kilner Brown) and was adjourned pending the decision of the House of Lords in Reg. v. Howe [1987] 2 W.L.R. 568. The appeal was relisted for hearing on 7 April 1987.

The facts are stated in the judgment.

Nigel Mylne Q.C. and Stephen Smyth (assigned by the Registrar of Criminal Appeals) for the appellant.

Daniel Hollis Q.C. and Anthony Longden for the Crown.

LORD LANE C.J. gave the following judgment of the court. On 21 May 1985 in the Crown Court at Reading before Kenneth Jones J. and a jury, the appellant, David Bruce Sharp, was charged with murder. He was eventually convicted of manslaughter. Then he pleaded guilty to the remaining counts in the indictment against him. He was sentenced as follows. In respect of count 2, which was an attempted robbery at Hounslow, he was sentenced to 15 years' imprisonment. On count 3, robbery, to which he pleaded guilty—that was a robbery at Wraysbury—he was sentenced to 16 years' imprisonment. On the manslaughter to which I have referred, which arose from the same incident at Wraysbury, he was sentenced to 16 years' imprisonment, all those sentences to run concurrently. He was jointly charged with two other men: Alderson and Hussey. Hussey was convicted of murder in respect of the Wraysbury offence. The appellant now appeals against conviction by leave of the single judge.

The circumstances which gave rise to the charge of murder were the culmination of what was in effect a series of armed robberies committed upon sub-post offices. They culminated in the Wraysbury offence which resulted in the death of the sub-postmaster at that place.

Count 2, the Hounslow robbery, to which the appellant pleaded guilty, concerned the following facts, and they are of relevance to the main issue. At about midday on 23 August Alderson and Hussey, both of whom were armed with sawn-off shotguns, in the company of the appellant, held up a sub-post office in Hounslow. They wore wigs. Hussey threatened the wife of the postmaster, whereupon the postmaster himself pressed the alarm. All three then ran off to the getaway car empty handed, because they had not time, after the sounding of the alarm, to take any of the money which they had coveted. Hussey tried to fire his gun in the air in order to discourage anyone who was minded to pursue them. His first attempt to fire the gun failed, but his second attempt succeeded, and a pellet from that gun in fact hit Alderson, one of the other miscreants, in the ear.

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Sharp (C.A.)

A The importance of that incident is this, that both Alderson and Sharp as a result of that knew the sort of man with whom they were associating in the commission of these offences and the predilection which Hussey had for loaded weapons. They must have known also that any attempt in the future by an unlucky postmaster to press the alarm button would be viewed by Hussey with disfavour to say the least.

B On 14 September 1984 the sub-post office at Wraysbury, near Staines, was the subject of a reconnaissance by the appellant and the two other men. Then they determined to attack the office. Alderson and Hussey once again carried loaded sawn-off shotguns. A further weapon, a pump action shotgun, was left in the getaway car. Hussey's gun was loaded with a particular venomous sort of shot, namely, buckshot. Sharp was responsible for locking the post office door after the three of them had entered.

C Alderson moved towards the wife of the sub-postmaster and Hussey went to the post office area of this little shop. Hussey then shot the sub-postmaster in the head at close range: the ballistic expert thought about two or three feet. The unfortunate postmaster died instantly. As he fell, so money was scattered. Alderson took the opportunity to hit the sub-postmaster's wife on the head with his gun three times. That was in order to try to stop her screaming, which, not surprisingly, she had started to do. Once outside, Alderson shot at the tyre of a parked vehicle which belonged to the sub-postmaster in order plainly to impede anyone who might be minded to pursue them.

D Hussey, as already stated, was convicted of murder. The jury, not unnaturally, rejected his contention that the gun may have been discharged by accident. Alderson at first denied that he had taken part in the matter at all, but eventually went on to admit his part in the affair and he was in due course convicted of manslaughter.

E Sharp put forward the contention that he had been invited indeed to take part in these robberies and had willingly acceded to the invitation. He was the "bagman," as he put it, the man carrying the bag in which the loot, if any, would be contained. He regarded Hussey in the vernacular as a "nutcase." He, Sharp, did not wish any weapons to be used, so he said. He said that he panicked when he saw the guns being loaded into the car. He thought they were blanks, so he said. He wanted to pull out, but he lost his nerve and he carried on despite his wish to withdraw from the conspiracy, because Hussey pointed a gun at him and threatened to blow his head off if he did not carry on with the plan to rob the post office. He, Sharp, did not carry a gun. He said he had thought of sabotaging either the gun or the ammunition by using some salt, but he did not get the opportunity.

F So stood the case. Counsel for the appellant, Mr. Mylne, who appeared for him in the court below as he appears for him today, submitted to the judge that his client was entitled to rely upon duress as a defence to the charges of murder and manslaughter. There then took place a series of submissions by counsel to the judge and a ruling by the judge.

G There was plainly a misunderstanding between the judge and Mr. Mylne as to what it was that the judge had in fact ruled. As some of the grounds of appeal are based upon that misconception, it is necessary perhaps very briefly to refer to them, although as matters have turned out today, they are not vital to the determination of this appeal.

Counsel thought that the judge was ruling that the defence of duress was not open to the appellant on three grounds: (a) such a defence is only available where the defendant discharges the evidential burden of proof sufficient to show that there is something fit for the jury to consider in the way of duress; (b) the defence of duress is not available to a man who has voluntarily joined an organisation or a gang which he knows might compel him to commit serious crimes similar to those with which he is charged; and (c) the evidence was such that the jury could come to no conclusion other than the appellant had voluntarily joined such a gang. That was plainly counsel's understanding of the matter, which was based upon a passage in the judge's ruling which initially gave that impression. In fact the judge, as is clear if one reads the passage as a whole, was taking the view that all he had ruled upon was point (b), namely, that duress is not available to a man who, to put it briefly, has the necessary knowledge, and with the necessary knowledge joins the gang of miscreants.

There is no need to go further into that misconception, because Mr. Mylne now agrees that everything in this appeal depends upon whether the judge was correct or not in ruling that a defendant who has voluntarily joined a gang such as this cannot subsequently rely upon the defence of duress.

So we turn to examine the situation which lies behind Mr. Mylne's submission to the judge, and again the submissions to this court, namely, that the common law knows no such exception to the defence of duress. Mr. Mylne realistically is the first to concede that pragmatically, to use his own word, and realistically, the judge's interpretation of the law was desirable, if not essential, if justice is to be done in circumstances such as existed in the present case. But he submits that it is not for this court, or indeed any other court, to usurp the function of Parliament and to introduce into the common law a rule which, in his submission, has never previously been held to form part of it.

No one could question that if a person can avoid the effects of duress by escaping from the threats, without damage to himself, he must do so. In other words if there is a moment at which he is able to escape, so to speak, from the gun being held at his head by Hussey, or the equivalent of Hussey, he must do so. It seems to us to be part of the same argument, or at least to be so close to the same argument as to be practically indistinguishable from it, to say that a man must not voluntarily put himself in a position where he is likely to be subjected to such compulsion.

Mr. Mylne, I hope, will forgive us if we do not refer to all the citations which he made of authority. He read to us lengthy extracts from the decision in Reg. v. Tyler (1838) 8 C. & P. 616, and a further passage from Glanville Williams, Criminal Law, 2nd ed. (1961), pp. 751 et seq. which do not, if we may say so respectfully, seem to advance the argument one way or the other. But we are fortified in the view which I indicate, which, to jump ahead, is that this is part of the common law and always has been, by certain matters which appear in the speeches of their Lordships in Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland v. Lynch [1975] A.C. 653. Although

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Sharp (C.A.)

A Lynch's case has been the subject of certain adverse comment since the date of those speeches, nevertheless the passages to which we wish to refer have not, as far as we know, been the subject of criticism.

First of all in the speech of Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest appears this passage, at p. 668:

B "Where duress is in issue many questions may arise such as whether threats are serious and compelling or whether (as on the facts of the present case may specially call for consideration) a person the subject of duress could reasonably have extricated himself or could have sought protection or had what has been called a 'safe avenue of escape.' Other questions may arise such as whether a person is only under duress as a result of being in C voluntary association with those whom he knew would require some course of action. In the present case, as duress was not left to the jury, we naturally do not know what they thought of it all."

A little later Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest again said, at p. 670:

D "In posing the case where someone is 'really' threatened I use the word 'really' in order to emphasise that duress must never be allowed to be the easy answer of those who can devise no other explanation of their conduct nor of those who readily could have avoided the dominance of threats nor of those who allow themselves to be at the disposal and under the sway of some gangster-tyrant. Where duress becomes an issue courts and juries
E will surely consider the facts with care and discernment."

Here of course, I interpolate. Hussey was the archetypal gangster-tyrant.

I turn from Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest to the speech of Lord Wilberforce, at p. 679:

F "It is clear that a possible case of duress, on the facts, could have been made. I say 'a possible case' because there were a number of matters which the jury would have had to consider if this defence had been left to them. Among these would have been whether Meehan, though uttering no express threats of death or serious injury, impliedly did so in such a way as to put the appellant in fear of death or serious injury; whether, if so, the threats continued to operate throughout the enterprise; whether G the appellant had voluntarily exposed himself to a situation in which threats might be used against him if he did not participate in a criminal enterprise (the appellant denied that he had done so); whether the appellant had taken every opportunity open to him to escape from the situation of duress. In order to test the validity of the judge's decision to exclude this defence, we must H assume on this appeal that these matters would have been decided in favour of the appellant."

Finally, so far as the passages in favour of the contention which we are supporting are concerned, in the speech of Lord Simon of Glaisdale appears this passage, at p. 687:

"I spoke of the social evils which might be attendant on the recognition of a general defence of duress. Would it not enable a gang leader of notorious violence to confer on his organisation by terrorism immunity from the criminal law? Every member of his gang might well be able to say with truth, 'It was as much as my life was worth to disobey.' Was this not in essence the plea of the appellant? We do not, in general, allow a superior officer to confer such immunity on his subordinates by any defence of obedience to orders: why should we allow it to terrorists? Nor would it seem to be sufficient to stipulate that no one can plead duress as a defence who had put himself into a position in which duress could be exercised on himself."

In deference to Mr. Mylne, we turn finally to a passage in the speech of Lord Kilbrandon, who, in his opening words, said, at p. 699:

"My Lords, the learned trial judge directed the jury to the effect that the defence of duress is not available as exculpation in a charge of murder, whether the accused has been charged as a principal in the first or in the second degree. In my opinion, that direction correctly stated the law as it then stood and now stands. It is my misfortune that while I agree with those of your Lordships who consider that that law is in a very unsatisfactory state, and is in urgent need of restatement, I remain convinced that the grounds upon which the majority propose that the conviction of the appellant be set aside involve changes in the law which are outside the proper functions of your Lordships in your judicial capacity."

Mr. Mylne submits, as already indicated, that that view is a correct one, that it is not for this court to extend by judicial interpretation what he submits is the present state of the common law.

We draw assistance from the fact that common law jurisdictions as well as Commonwealth jurisdictions throughout the world have adopted this rule almost unanimously (although the wording in their various statutes differs the one from the other), which is an indication to us that this may well have been, and indeed was, throughout a principle of the common law.

The matter was stated clearly by Winneke C.J. of the State of Victoria in Reg. v. Hurley and Murray [1967] V.R. 526, decided in the Supreme Court of Victoria. Before turning to the passage in the judgment of Winneke C.J., let me just read part of the headnote, in order to summarise the effect of the decision:

"Held . . . (2) Whether or not the matters raised by M could amount to a defence of duress, that defence was not available to him in the present case because he had voluntarily, and without any threat to himself, joined in the criminal enterprise and could not excuse his conduct by showing that he had subsequently been subjected to threats of violence to ensure that he did not withdraw from the enterprise."

Turning to the judgment of Winneke C.J., which was the majority judgment of the court, the passage runs as follows, at p. 533:

"Tyler's case, 8 C. & P. 616 was cited to us by Mr. Gaffy (who appeared for the Crown) as authority for the proposition contained in the last sentence of the passage quoted above from Dr.

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Sharp (C.A.)

A Glanville Williams' book, but it is plain on consulting the report that Lord Denman did not in his charge to the jury advert to the matter at all."

If I may interpolate there, that is a statement with which this court entirely agrees. Winneke C.J. went on:

B "There is thus nothing in his charge to the jury which is authority for Dr. Glanville Williams' statement. Nevertheless, we are persuaded that it is both good law and good sense, and that a person who without threat of death or serious violence voluntarily makes himself a party to a criminal enterprise cannot excuse his criminal conduct in participating in that enterprise by showing that after he had embraced the cause he was subjected to threats of violence at the hands of the other parties to ensure that he did not resile from the bargain he had voluntarily entered into."

That was the precise description of what happened in this case between the appellant and Hussey.

D Then Winneke C.J. went on to cite from the Criminal Codes of Queensland, Western Australia and Tasmania, each of which contained a provision to that very effect. He cited the first Criminal Code from Canada. He cited the New Zealand codification of the criminal law, and he cited also the well-known American textbook, Perkins on Criminal Law, (1957), where the following passage appears, at p. 843:

E "If D for example is compelled under threat of death to provide a getaway car for robbers, or to assist them in some other way, he is not guilty of robbery. . . . He cannot be a perpetrator of a robbery of which he is innocent. This is not comparable in any way to the claim that one who willingly joins in the robbery was compelled during the perpetration to do something against his will. Such a claim will be rejected because the situation was the result of extreme culpability on his part."

F Two American decisions are cited there by name.

We are therefore, in the light of that persuasive authority and the indications in their Lordships' speeches in Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland v. Lynch [1975] A.C. 653 of the opinion that the judge, Kenneth Jones J., was correct in the decision which he reached.

G We are further fortified in that view by the judgment of Lord Lowry C.J. of Northern Ireland, in Reg. v. Fitzpatrick [1977] N.I. 20. Let me read the brief headnote once again in order to indicate the nature of the decision. It runs as follows:

H "If a person by joining an illegal organisation or a similar group of men with criminal objectives and coercive methods, voluntarily exposes and submits himself to illegal compulsion, he cannot rely on the duress to which he has voluntarily exposed himself as an excuse either in respect of the crimes he commits against his will or in respect of his continued but unwilling association with those capable of exercising upon him the duress which he calls in aid."

Turning to the body of the judgment, there are just three passages which we would like to cite to indicate the way in which the judgment of Lord Lowry C.J. went. The first reads, at p. 22:

"the judge held that, having joined the I.R.A. and voluntarily exposed himself to the risk of compulsion by the I.R.A. to commit crimes on its behalf, the appellant was not entitled to rely on the defence of duress exercised by that organisation. In so holding the learned trial judge cited the well known passage from Stephen's History of the Criminal Law of England, vol. 2, p. 108, which was referred to by Lord Edmund-Davies in Reg. v. Lynch [1975] N.I. 35, 112: 'If a man chooses to expose and still more if he chooses to submit himself to illegal compulsion, it may not operate even in mitigation of punishment. It would surely be monstrous to mitigate the punishment of a murderer on the ground that he was a member of a secret society by which he would have been assassinated if he had not committed murder.' "

The second passage reads, at p. 23:

"Counsel on both sides have informed us that the point is devoid of judicial authority and we have not found anything to suggest the contrary. Therefore we have to decide, in the absence of judicial decisions, what is the common law. Assistance may be sought from the opinions of textwriters, judicial dicta and the reports of Commissions and legal committees, and from analogies with legal systems which share our common law heritage, with a view to considering matters of general principle and arriving at the answer. Mr. Curran drew to our attention the penal codes of Canada, New Zealand and the State of Queensland and we have also considered among others the penal codes of Western Australia and the State of New York as well as the draft code of 1879 prepared by the Royal Commission of which Mr. Justice Stephen was a member and the American Model Penal Code. All these codes and draft codes contain various provisions withholding from members of unlawful organisations the right to rely on a defence of duress."

Then Lord Lowry C.J. cites two extracts from the various codes and authorities which he indicates in précis in the passage which I have read. There is no need for us to go into that and there is no need for us to cite further from Lord Lowry C.J., except for one passage, where he said, at p. 26:

"We consider that the widespread adoption of such limiting provisions with regard to duress shows that the framers of the codes and drafts which we have mentioned considered that this exclusory doctrine was already part of the common law and the Law Commission's recommendation indicates the view of a distinguished body of jurists, (whose recommendations are in general favourable to duress as a defence), that participation in unlawful associations or conspiracies should disqualify the accused from relying on it."

In other words, in our judgment, where a person has voluntarily, and with knowledge of its nature, joined a criminal organisation or gang which he knew might bring pressure on him to commit an offence and was an active member when he was put under such

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Sharp (C.A.)

A pressure, he cannot avail himself of the defence of duress. Mr. Mylne concedes that such a ruling is the end of his appeal. The appeal is therefore dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

[COURT OF APPEAL]

SUTER v. SUTER AND JONES

1986 Oct. 13, 14;
Dec. 19

May L.J. and Sir Roualeyn Cumming-Bruce

Husband and Wife—Financial provision—Divorce proceedings—“Clean break” order—Children under 18 in care and control of wife—Welfare of children “first consideration”—Whether overriding consideration on application for financial provision—Court’s duty to consider period terminating right to claim periodical payments—Matrimonial Causes Act 1973 (c. 18), ss. 25(1), 25A(2) (as substituted by Matrimonial and Family Proceedings Act 1984 (c. 42), s. 3)¹

Section 25(1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973 (as substituted by section 3 of the Matrimonial and Family Proceedings Act 1984) provides:

“It shall be the duty of the court in deciding whether to exercise its powers under section 23, 24 or 24A above and, if so, in what manner, to have regard to all the circumstances of the case, first consideration being given to the welfare while a minor of any child of the family who has not attained the age of 18.”

The husband and wife, who had married in 1971, were divorced in 1985, on the husband’s petition, on the ground of the wife’s adultery with the co-respondent. Care and control of the two children of the marriage, born in 1972 and 1978, was awarded to the wife who continued to live with them in the former matrimonial home. The co-respondent, who earned £7,000 per annum, paid rent to his mother for a room in her house and had his meals there, but spent most nights with the wife, who neither sought nor received any contribution from him towards the expenses of running the home. The husband remarried. On the wife's application for financial provision, the registrar in the county court ordered, inter alia, the husband to transfer to the wife all his interest in the former matrimonial home, subject to the mortgage, together with the surrender value of two insurance policies, and to make periodical payments of £100 per month to her until she remarry or both children attain the age of 18 and periodical payments of £110 and £90 per month respectively to the children during their respective minorities. Without the periodical payments to her the wife's outgoings would have exceeded her income by £570 per annum. The circuit judge dismissed the husband's appeal against the periodical payments order in favour of the wife, on the basis that a "clean break" could not be ordered, under section 25A(2), where there were children under 18, that section 25(1) of the Act of 1973 made the welfare of the children the paramount consideration in deciding whether to make a periodical payments order and its amount, and that the children's welfare required the order to be made so as to ensure that they continued to have a roof over their heads.

¹ Matrimonial Proceedings Act 1973, s. 25A: “(1) Where on or after the grant of a decree of divorce . . . the court decides to exercise its powers under section 23(1)(a), (b) or (c) . . . above in favour of a party to the marriage, it shall be the duty of the court to consider whether it would be appropriate so to exercise those powers that the financial obligations of each party towards the other will be terminated as soon after the grant of the decree as the court considers just and reasonable. (2) Where the court decides in such a case to make a periodical payments . . . order in favour of a party to the marriage, the court shall in particular consider whether it would be appropriate to require those payments to be made . . . only for such term as would in the opinion of the court be sufficient to enable the party in whose favour the order is made to adjust without undue hardship to the termination of his or her financial dependence on the other party. . . .”

Suter v. Suter and Jones (C.A.)[1987]

On the husband's appeal:—

Held, (1) that section 25A(2) of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973 imposed a mandatory duty on the court, whenever it made a periodical payments order in favour of a party to a marriage, to consider whether it would be appropriate so to limit its term as to enable that party to adjust without undue hardship to the termination of her financial dependence on the paying party; that the circuit judge had misdirected himself in failing to apply the test provided by section 25A(2) because children were involved but it was impossible at the present time to predict a period sufficient for the wife to adjust to the termination of her right to claim periodical payments (post, pp. 15G—16B, F—G).

(2) Allowing the appeal, that section 25(1) of the Act of 1973 made the welfare of any minor children of the family a consideration of first importance for the court when deciding whether and how to exercise its powers under sections 23, 24 or 24A, to be borne in mind throughout consideration of all the circumstances including those specified in section 25(2), but it was not the paramount or overriding consideration, and the circuit judge had erred in treating the children's welfare as the paramount consideration in determining the amount of the periodical payments to be made to the wife; that the fact that the wife had invited the co-respondent to live with her and the children in the former matrimonial home without seeking or receiving any financial contribution from him was conduct which under section 25(2)(g) it would be inequitable to disregard and which, in view of the financial resources available to the wife and the co-respondent, made it unjust that the husband should be required to make substantial periodical payments to the wife; and that, accordingly, the husband's liability to make such payments would be reduced to £1 per annum (post, pp. 17F—G, 18A—B, H—19A, D—20A).

APPEAL from Mr. David Pennant sitting as a circuit judge at Weymouth County Court.

E The husband, James Anthony Suter, and his wife, Pauline Ann Suter, who were married in 1971, were divorced in 1985 on the husband's petition on the ground of her adultery with the co-respondent, Steven Richard Jones. By a notice of application dated 20 December 1985 the wife applied for, inter alia, orders (i) that the husband pay to the children of the family, their daughter (born on 29 June 1972) and their son (born on 22 September 1978), such periodical payment as might be just; (ii) that he pay her during their joint lives until her remarriage such sums in respect of periodical payments as the court thought fit; (iii) that he pay her such lump sum or sums as the court thought reasonable; and (iv) that the matrimonial home be transferred into the sole name of the wife, subject to existing liabilities. On 22 January 1986 Mr. Registrar Trayhurn, inter alia, made the transfer of property order sought and ordered the husband to make periodical payments of £100 per month to the wife until she remarry or both the children attain the age of 18, and £110 and £90 per month respectively to the children until they reach the age of 18 or further order. The husband appealed against the order that he make periodical payments to the wife, and on 20 February 1986 Mr. David Pennant, sitting as a circuit judge, dismissed the appeal and refused the husband leave to appeal.

G
H

By a notice dated 14 March 1986, the husband applied to the Court of Appeal for leave to appeal against the judge's order, for an order that the wife's rights to receive periodical payments be terminated or limited to such a period as might seem just or reduced. The proposed grounds of appeal were (1) that, having correctly directed himself that the wife's relationship with the co-respondent ought to be taken into account, the judge had erred in giving that factor no or insufficient weight in considering whether or not to terminate or reduce or limit the financial dependence of the wife on the husband; (2) that, having correctly found that it was inevitable that the co-respondent would make a substantial financial contribution towards the discharge of the wife's outgoings, the judge had erred in failing to make any sufficient reduction in the sum which the husband was ordered to pay to cover her needs as found by him; (3) that there was no evidence to support the finding that the children would become homeless if the husband did not make the periodical payments to the wife, or alternatively that it was against the weight of the evidence; (4) that, having correctly directed himself that it would be right to reduce the wife's periodical payments because of her relationship with the co-respondent, the judge had erred in not making any such reduction and had misdirected himself that the limitation of the time for which the husband would remain liable to maintain the wife was such a reduction; (5) that in adopting the registrar's findings, that the children needed a total order of £300 per month if they were to live in the matrimonial home whether or not the co-respondent was also using the house and that the children's needs included the obligation to keep a roof over their heads by paying the mortgage instalments, the judge had erred in treating the whole cost of maintaining the roof over their heads as part of their needs in that only part of the mortgage repayments were properly attributable to the children, having regard to the use made of the property by the wife and the co-respondent and to the capital element involved in the mortgage payments; (6) that the judge had misdirected himself by treating the children's welfare not as the first consideration but as the paramount consideration; and (7) that the judge had wrongly exercised his discretion in that the periodical payments which he had ordered the husband to pay to the wife were excessive having regard to the respective means, earning capacity, needs, obligations and responsibilities of each of the parties and to their conduct.

On 13 October 1986 the Court of Appeal granted the husband leave to appeal and proceeded to hear the appeal.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Sir Roualeyn Cumming-Bruce.

Alan Ward Q.C. and Timothy Coombes for the husband.

George Brown for the wife.

The co-respondent did not appear and was not represented.

Cur. adv. vult.

19 December. The following judgments were handed down.

SIR ROUALEYN CUMMING-BRUCE. This appeal raises questions about the meaning and application of section 25(1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973, as amended by section 3 of the Matrimonial and Family Proceedings Act 1984, and the correct exercise of the powers and duties conferred on the court by section 25A of the Act of 1973.

The appeal to this court is against the order made by Mr. David Pennant sitting as a circuit judge on 20 February 1986, when he dismissed the former husband's appeal (herein called "the husband") against that part of the order made by the registrar on 22 January 1986 ordering the husband to pay to his former wife (herein called "the

B The facts are fully set out in the judgment of the registrar. In bare summary, the parties married in 1971. Decree nisi upon the husband's petition alleging adultery with the co-respondent, Steven Jones, was made on 20 June 1986; decree absolute on 27 September. The effective duration of the marriage was 13 years. He is about 34; she is 31. There are two children, a girl aged 14 and a boy aged 8. The husband serves as a petty officer in the Royal Navy, and has recently remarried. The wife has the care of the children where she lives with them in the former matrimonial home. She also works in domestic service for about 112 hours per month. The co-respondent, aged 21, pays for a room in his mother's house where he goes for breakfast, but sleeps every night with the wife. He is a labourer at Devonport Dockyard earning £7,000 per annum gross. The orders made by the registrar were: (1) husband to transfer to wife all his interest in the former matrimonial home subject to the mortgage; (2) wife to receive surrender value of two insurance policies (£472); (3) periodical payments to the wife for her maintenance at the rate of £100 per month until she remarries or until both children attain the age of 18, i.e. potentially a 10-year term; (4) periodical payments to the daughter of £110 per month and to the son £90 per month until each attain the age of 18; (5) other claims for ancillary relief dismissed; (6) claims under the Inheritance (Provision for Family and Dependents) Act 1975 dismissed.

E The husband has given the contents of the matrimonial home and a car to the wife. By his appeal against the circuit judge's order he seeks (a) termination or reduction of the order that he pay £100 per month to the wife for her maintenance, (b) an order that his financial obligations to her should be terminated forthwith by an order under section 25A of the Act of 1973 as amended by the Act of 1984; alternatively a date for termination should be set substantially earlier than the term indicated by the registrar and approved by the judge. He does not challenge any of the other orders.

F The effect of the orders may be summarised as follows:

Capital

Agreed value of matrimonial home	£30,000
----------------------------------	---------

Less mortgage	20,400

Equity	9,600

Surrender value of policies	472

H The registrar assessed the financial needs and resources of the parties and their children. He found that the total housekeeping needs of the wife for herself and the children were at the rate of £300 per month. In addition the mortgage of £179 per month had to be paid—being £2,148 per annum. On this basis her total financial needs amount to £5,748 per annum. Her resources without maintenance for her from the husband come to £5,178. There was thus an annual deficit of £570. The order for periodical payments thus met the deficit and left her with £630 per annum above her basic needs.

The husband's resources were his gross naval pay, which in February was £10,698 less superannuation payments and tax. Since August 1985 he had been living with a Mrs. Bickerton in rented accommodation at £100 per calendar month. He intended in February 1986 to marry Mrs. Bickerton and has done so. She has very little capital and small part-time earnings. He has debts of £1,800 which he is paying off by instalments. The registrar decided, at paragraphs 15 and 16 of his judgment, that in the opinion of the court it would be inequitable to disregard the conduct of the wife in affording a home to which her paramour returns to sleep nearly every night and he proposed to take it into account in deciding the issue of periodical payments. He proceeded, at paragraph 16 of his judgment:

"It by no means follows however that I should therefore dismiss her application for periodical payments. Considering the needs of the children in isolation would result in a periodical payments order for them, bearing in mind the difference in their ages, of £25 and £20 respectively or a total of £195 per calendar month. But this total will simply be insufficient to satisfy their needs if one includes the obligation to keep a roof over their heads by paying the mortgage instalments. It might be said that in that event, the Department of Health and Social Security will step in at least to the extent of paying the mortgage interest. There is no certainty of this, however, having regard to what would be [the wife's] total income and particularly if the Department of Health and Social Security learn of her relationship with [the co-respondent]. In any event I can see no good reason why any burden should fall on the taxpayer."

The circuit judge approved of the approach of the registrar quoted above. He found that it was inevitable to conclude as a probability that the co-respondent would make a substantial financial contribution. The deputy judge continued:

"it still leaves the question which the registrar posed at paragraph 16 of his judgment. Now this husband had originally agreed to sign over his share of the house to the wife and she had given up her application for a lump sum which might have had some value when his terminal grant came to be paid but the gift of half a share in the equity of a house worth £10,000 isn't the same as a gift of a house the children can live in, because unless the mortgage can be kept up the children are homeless. The registrar is right that the children need an order of £300 if they are to live in that home whether or not [the co-respondent] is also using the house and I don't think that the mere fact of [the co-respondent] using the house entitles a court to say that the children's mother should not have any money to keep a roof over the children's heads. But on the other hand, in findings that I have made, it would be right to reduce her periodical payments because of the relationship with [the co-respondent]. Mr. Brown's argument is cogent, that the order the registrar made took account of these findings by giving her enough to keep a roof over the family head but with limitations as to the size and time limit and the registrar said '[the wife] must now look to the future. It is

A improbable that she will be entitled to any maintenance beyond the youngest child reaching the age of 18 years.’”

In connection with the term for which the order should run, the judge commented on the fact that the house was being used for the children and said, “One must remember where there are children, a clean break is impossible until they grow up.”

B Counsel for the appellant husband’s first submission was that the judge misdirected himself in that he never carried out the exercise prescribed as a mandatory duty upon the court by section 25A. By section 25A(1) it is the duty of the court to consider whether it would be appropriate to exercise the powers so that financial obligations of each party towards the other will be terminated as soon after the grant of the decree as the court thinks just and reasonable. By subsection (2), where
C the court decides to make a periodical payments order in favour of a party to a marriage, the court shall in particular consider whether it would be appropriate to require those payments to be made for such term as would in the opinion of the court be sufficient to enable the party in whose favour the order is made to adjust without undue hardship to the termination of his or her financial dependence on the

Those provisions, introduced by the Act of 1984, enshrine in statute law the principle that after dissolution of marriage a time may have come, or can be foreseen in the future, when the party in whose favour financial provision has been made can so adjust his or her life as to attain sufficient financial independence to enable that party to live without undue hardship without any further dependence on the other
E party. This has been described as the principle of a “clean break,” the phrase used by Lord Scarman in his speech in Minton v. Minton [1979] A.C. 593, 608. In a number of cases which were decided before the new legislation came into force the court observed that where there were children for whom the parties shared a continuing obligation there is likely to be little or no room for the father and mother to have a clean
F break from each other: see, for example, Pearce v. Pearce (1979) 1 F.L.R. 261 and Moore v. Moore (1980) 11 Fam. Law 109, in which Ormrod L.J. observed, at p. 109:

“It is one thing to talk about a ‘clean break’ when there are sufficient financial resources to make a comprehensive settlement. Where there are no capital resources, as here, it is unrealistic to talk about a ‘clean break’ if there are children. It is not possible for the father and mother of dependent children to have a clean break from one another. . . . So, in my judgment, the so-called principle of the ‘clean break’ has no application where there are young children.”

I agree with the submission of counsel that the new section 25A
H imposes a mandatory duty in every case to apply itself to questions set out in section 25A(2) whenever a court decides to make a periodical payments order in favour of a party to the marriage. The judgments in the cases before 1984 have to be read with that in mind. Though the parties may have to co-operate with each other over children still dependent upon them, it may be possible on the facts to recognise a date when the party in whose favour the order is made will have been able to adjust without undue hardship to the termination of financial dependence on the other party. I also agree that the judge appears to have been influenced by the earlier cases to approach the question of termination of financial dependence without specifically addressing himself to the question whether this wife could and should find a way of adjusting her way of life so as to attain financial independence of her husband. So this court is entitled to consider the facts for itself and to carry out the statutory duty prescribed by section 25A. Having said that, I am clear that on the facts it is not possible at this date to predict with any more confidence than the registrar when the wife will have been able to make the adjustment which leads to the inference that it will then be just and reasonable to terminate her right to claim periodical payments from her husband. The children are growing up. It is likely that it will become progressively easier for the wife to organise and increase her earning capacity. But there are too many uncertainties to predict the development of events over the next 10 years. Likewise in connection with the financial advantages which on the judge's finding she can expect to derive, if she wishes, from her association with the co-respondent. It is their declared intention at present not to marry. There has already been one interruption in the continuity of their cohabitation, if that is the right description of their present arrangements, as I think it is. She may become increasingly and permanently financially dependent on the co-respondent. She may not. Consideration of the facts in evidence before the registrar does not at this date enable the court to predict with any confidence whether she will in the next 10 years have had the opportunity so to adjust herself that her claim for periodical payments can be terminated without undue hardship. The registrar warned her that such would be the position once the younger child reached the age of 18. It may be that that situation will be attained earlier. It is not impossible that even after the younger child is 18, consideration of the wife's needs and earning capacity will still make it just and reasonable for her to claim some support from her husband, though I would expect it to be unlikely. For those reasons I reject the submission that the judge was wrong in refusing to make an order terminating the husband's financial obligations towards his wife.

I do not however found that conclusion upon the judge's reasoning and approach. I am satisfied for the reasons that I have stated, that he misdirected himself by failing to apply the test prescribed in section 25A(2). This court is therefore entitled to consider the facts in the way that section 25A(2) has enjoined, and then to exercise the discretionary power itself. So directing myself I come to the conclusion that it would be premature to make an order terminating the wife's claim for periodical payments for her support from her husband.

The second submission made on behalf of the husband is that the judge, following the approach of the registrar, misdirected himself upon the proper construction and effect of section 25 of the Act of 1973, as amended by section 3 of the Act of 1984.

By section 25(1):

"It shall be the duty of the court in deciding whether to exercise its powers under section 23, 24 or 24A above and, if so, in what manner, to have regard to all the circumstances of the case, first consideration being given to the welfare while a minor of any child of the family who has not attained the age of 18."

3 W.L.R.

Suter v. Suter and Jones (C.A.)

Sir Roualeyn
Cumming-Bruce

A This subsection is new, and in effect replaces the words formerly enacted in section 25 at the end of the list of matters in paragraphs (a) to (g) of section 25(1) and paragraphs (a) to (e) of section 25(2) to which the court had to have regard amongst all the circumstances of the case.

B The husband submits that both the judge and the registrar treated the welfare of the children as first and paramount, in the sense in which that phrase was interpreted by Lord MacDermott in the context of section 1 of the Guardianship of Infants Act 1925: see J. v. C. [1970] A.C. 668, 711. There Lord MacDermott considered the two adjectives in the phrase, and said:

C "That is the first consideration because it is of first importance and the paramount consideration because it rules upon or determines the course to be followed."

D I agree with the submission that counsel culled from a commentary by a distinguished commentator* that the phrase "first and paramount" means simply "overriding," and that if the draftsman had omitted the adjective "first" the meaning and effect of the single adjective "paramount" would have been the same. We are faced with the problem of discovering the intention of Parliament when it used the phrase "the first consideration" without the conjunction of the adjective "and paramount" which gave the phrase in section 1 of the Guardianship of Infants Act 1925 its dominant force and effect.

E The duty of the court under section 25(1), as amended, is to have regard to all the circumstances, first consideration being given to the welfare while a minor of any child of the family under the age of 18. As regards the exercise of the powers in relation to a party to the marriage, the court shall in particular have regard to the matters set out in section 25(2) in the sub-paragraphs lettered (a) to (h). Sub-paragraph (g) introduces a matter not previously included: "the conduct of each of the parties, if that conduct is such that it would in the opinion of the court be inequitable to disregard it; . . ."

F Having regard to the prominence which the consideration of the welfare of children is given in section 25(1), being selected as the first consideration among all the circumstances of the case, I collect an intention that this consideration is to be regarded as of first importance, to be borne in mind throughout consideration of all the circumstances including the particular circumstances specified in section 25(2). But if it had been intended to be paramount, overriding all other considerations pointing to a just result, Parliament would have said so. It has not. So I construe the section as requiring the court to consider all the circumstances, including those set out in subsection (2), always bearing in mind the important consideration of the welfare of the children, and then try to attain a financial result which is just as between husband and wife.

G Consideration of the judge's judgment, taken in conjunction with paragraphs 15 and 16 of the judgment of the registrar which he clearly approved, shows that the judge treated the consideration of the children's welfare as paramount, and controlling the effect of the interplay of all other matters. Though the registrar and the judge gave some effect by way of reduction of the periodical payments to the financial contribution of the co-respondent to the wife's finances, which the judge held would be substantial, the order was calculated in such a way as to provide the wife with a periodical payments order which would enable her to make all the mortgage payments. And the reasoning thus proceeded because it was considered that the children's welfare required that solution, although the registrar for the reasons that he gave thought that ordinary people would regard the result as unjust. In my view the judge fell into error in treating section 25(1) as requiring him to give effect to a consideration of the children's welfare as the overriding or paramount consideration. This was a misdirection, and this court is entitled to review the facts, apply the statute on its proper construction, and decide how to determine the wife's financial claim for periodical payments.

In the course of the appeal before us the wife sought leave to put in an affidavit dealing with the husband's conduct during continuance of matrimonial co-habitation. There was no cross-appeal by the wife to the effect that the judge was wrong to regard the wife's association with the co-respondent and invitation to him to live in her home as a consideration relevant under section 25(2)(g). No evidence had been filed or given in evidence by the wife alleging misconduct on the part of the husband as relevant to the wife's financial claim for periodical payments. Further, in the proceedings before the registrar and the judge there was no issue between them about the facts of the association between her and the co-respondent, including his almost continuous residence with her every night in the former matrimonial home. This was a case in which there had never been contested issues about the facts of conduct. The only way in which conduct had become relevant under section 25(2)(g) was in relation to the question whether it was inequitable to disregard the wife's conduct with the co-respondent, on which she had not appealed against the judge's decision not to disregard it. We refused to admit the affidavit sought to be tendered to us. I observe that Practice Direction (Family Division: Transfer of Business) [1986] 1 W.L.R. 1139, dated 28 April 1986, only directs that transfer of claims for financial provision should be made to the High Court, if conduct is relevant, where there are contested allegations of conduct. These allegations of the wife's conduct which were the only ones hitherto raised were not contested allegations. The question was what if any effect the conduct should have for the purposes of section 25. The question which arose for the purpose of section 25 was whether it was inequitable to disregard the conduct of the wife, who had invited the co-respondent to spend most evenings and nights at her home. It was agreed before the judge that evidence before him should be limited to the issue as to what if any contributions the co-respondent was making, or was likely to make, to the finances of the wife. She described the situation in the words "We are lovers. We sleep together every night except when he goes off to Kent with friends." She did not ask him for money and he made no financial support for the household. He gave evidence that there was nothing to stop their relationship as far as he could see. He takes her out twice a week. On 14 November 1985 his income was £7,000 per annum gross; £4,050 net. The judge considered that the co-respondent could make a substantial financial contribution. He affirmed the registrar's order of £100 per month, which was clearly related to enabling the wife to pay the mortgage payments. In fact, leaving the co-respondent out of account, she would have about £12 per week above the basic needs of herself and the children. We heard various calculations from her counsel in the familiar one-third rule calculations. In my view they do not help. My

Suter v. Suter and Jones (C.A.)

Sir Rousleyn
Cumming-Bruce

A conclusion is that it was wrong to order the husband to pay periodical payments to his wife in addition to the substantial benefits which she enjoys as a consequence of the capital transfers that he has already made. He has remarried, and has to begin with provision of accommodation for himself and his wife, which may be rented accommodation or in married quarters. The co-respondent told the B judge with becoming candour, "It could be said we have been as close as man and wife and it is likely to continue as far as I can see. I haven't a lot of money."

In my view there is no reason, on the facts found, to expect that the children will find themselves without a roof over their heads if periodical payments for the wife came to an end. The co-respondent should and could make a sufficient contribution to the expenses of his residence without any contribution from the husband beyond his payments of C maintenance for the children. The wife may organise herself to earn more remuneration by her own efforts. If there is a financial crisis, I see no reason why the Department of Health and Social Security should not be asked to contribute to the mortgage interest: see Barnes (R.M.) v.
D Barnes (G.W.) [1972] 1 W.L.R. 1381 and Stockford v. Stockford (1981)
3 F.L.R. 58. The principle in point is that the husband should not be ordered to pay more for his wife's support than is just.

So I approach the question whether any, and if so what, reduction should be made in what otherwise would have been an appropriate order for periodical payments in support of the wife in order to achieve a result which is reasonable. I return to figures set out earlier in this E judgment and consider the needs and resources of the parties and the fact, relevant as part of all the circumstances and to sub-paragraph (g) of section 25(2), that the wife has invited her lover to live for the foreseeable future in the former matrimonial home with herself and the children, without seeking or receiving any contribution to the expenses of maintaining that house. He is a bachelor aged 21 with a gross income F of not less than £7,000, subject to tax. The figures demonstrate that the payment of the mortgage amounts to £2,148 per annum, and that after payment thereof she has a deficit of £570 per annum. It is reasonable to infer that the co-respondent is in a position to contribute at least £12 per week for the privileges which he enjoys in the furnished residence which, as a consequence of the husband's transfer of property, now G belongs wholly to the wife, subject to the mortgage. It is material to bear in mind that since he moved to reside in the wife's house the co-respondent has continued to pay £16 per week to his mother for the room in which he no longer sleeps. As the wife is now for practical purposes living with the co-respondent in the former matrimonial home, it is just and reasonable to make an order on the basis that she require H him to contribute not less than £600 per annum for the expenses of the house which she has invited him to enjoy. On that basis I would not think it just that the husband should do more than he has done by making the capital transfers already completed and by continuing to make payments to the children amounting to £200 per month. In that situation the wife's and children's needs are met, she can afford to run the home and pay the mortgage, and the husband and wife can expect

Discrimination, Sex—Equal pay—Work of equal value—Work of applicant and male comparators of equal value—Applicant's basic pay and overtime rates less than comparators—Other conditions more favourable to applicant—Whether terms in contract of employment relating to basic and overtime rates to be modified so as not to be less favourable—Equal Pay Act 1970 (c. 41), s. 1(2)(c) (as amended by Sex Discrimination Act 1975 (c. 65), s. 8 and Equal Pay (Amendment) Regulations 1983 (S.I. 1983 No. 1794), reg. 2(1))

The applicant, a woman, was employed at a shipyard canteen as a cook and was classified as unskilled for the purposes of pay. She claimed under section 1(2)(c) of the Equal Pay Act 1970¹ that she was doing work of equal value to male comparators who were shipyard workers paid at the higher rate for skilled tradesmen in the yard. Following an evaluation by an independent expert under section 2A(1)(b) of the Act, an industrial tribunal held that the applicant's work was of equal value to that of the men. The industrial tribunal, at a further hearing, rejected the applicant's contention that, in considering whether her contract of employment should be modified, it was sufficient to compare her basic pay and overtime rates with that of the male comparators and held that without a comparison of all terms and conditions of employment, she was not entitled to a declaration that she should receive a higher rate of pay. The Employment Appeal Tribunal dismissed the applicant's appeal holding that since the terms of section 1(2)(c) were ambiguous, it was necessary to construe that section in accordance with article 119 of the E.E.C. Treaty, which gave a broad meaning to the word "pay" so as to include not only basic rates of pay but any other consideration received in the course of employment.

On appeal by the applicant:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that when comparing the term relating to pay in the applicant's contract of employment with that in the male comparators' contracts under section 1(2)(c) of the Act of 1970, it was necessary to look at the whole of the relevant term in the respective contracts, and to take into account any additional payments, whether in cash or in kind, which the applicant received as part of her overall remuneration; that such a construction was consistent with the broad meaning given to the word "pay" in article 119 of the E.E.C. Treaty; and that, accordingly, failing agreement between the parties, it would be for the industrial tribunal to determine whether the term of the applicant's contract relating to pay was less favourable to her than that of the male comparators, and if so, to determine the extent of the modification needed to render the applicant's contract no less favourable (post, pp. 27B, 28A-C, F-H, 29A-B, H—30B, C-E).

APPEAL from the Employment Appeal Tribunal.

The applicant, Julie Ann Hayward, made a complaint, in reliance on section 1(2)(c) of the Equal Pay Act 1970, as amended, claiming equal pay with tradesmen at the shipyard of Cammell Laird Shipbuilders Ltd., where she was employed. The member of the panel of experts designated by A.C.A.S. reported to the industrial tribunal that the work performed by the applicant was of equal value to the work of certain named tradesmen and the industrial tribunal [1985] I.C.R. 71 directed that, if it could not be settled, the applicant's claim should be restored to the tribunal for further consideration. On 13 September 1985 the same tribunal decided that she was not entitled to a declaration that the employer should pay her the same basic and overtime rates of pay as for men doing work of equal value in the same employment and on 19 May 1986 the Employment Appeal Tribunal [1986] I.C.R. 862 dismissed the applicant's appeal. B

By notice of appeal dated 5 June 1986 the applicant appealed on the grounds (1) that the appeal tribunal erred in law in failing to conclude that section 1(2)(c) of the Equal Pay Act 1970 entitled the applicant to point to a specific term of her contract of employment, such as that relating to basic pay or that relating to overtime rates, which was less favourable than the comparable term in the contract of a man doing work of equal value, and entitled her to have that term modified so as not to be less favourable, irrespective of whether her terms and conditions, as a whole, were less favourable than those of the man; (2) the appeal tribunal erred in law in concluding that European Community law required an industrial tribunal to compare the applicant's terms and conditions, as a whole, with the man's terms and conditions, as a whole, for the purposes of deciding a claim under section 1(2)(c), rather than considering and comparing the specific less favourable term of which complaint was made, in that (a) community law was an aid to the interpretation of the Act of 1970: in the present case, the relevant provisions of the Act of 1970 were unambiguous; (b) the relevant Community law which served as an aid to interpretation, if the Act of 1970 was ambiguous, was article 119 of the E.E.C. Treaty and Council Directive (75/117 E.E.C.); those elements of Community law did not confine a woman who did work of equal value to a man to a claim in respect of her terms and conditions considered as a whole, but permitted a claim in respect of a particular less favourable term and (c) even if the relevant Community law did confine a woman to a claim in respect of her terms and conditions considered as a whole, still the Act of 1970 could, consistently with Community law, provide more extensive rights to an employee, and did so as described in (1) above. 3 W.L.R.

Hayward v. Cammell Laird (No. 2) (C.A.)

A NICHOLLS L.J. This appeal raises a point of construction of the equal pay legislation. The applicant, Miss Hayward, is 27 years old. She has been employed by Cammell Laird Shipbuilders Ltd. at its shipyard in Birkenhead for over 10 years. Initially she was a catering trainee. She attended college and obtained the appropriate City and Guilds qualification and other certificates. For the first three of the four years that she was a trainee she was paid the same basic rate of pay as trade apprentices in the shipyard. After qualifying, she was employed in the canteen as a cook. Her basic rate of pay was lower than that of the skilled shipyard workmen who qualified in their trades at the same time as the applicant completed her training in catering.

B So in 1982 the applicant made a complaint under the Equal Pay Act 1970 to the industrial tribunal, claiming equal pay with the male tradesmen. In 1983, in circumstances to which we shall have to return, section 1(2) of that Act was amended by the addition of a new paragraph, paragraph (c). The amendment came into force on 1 January 1984. In February 1984 the applicant made a fresh complaint to the industrial tribunal, this time in reliance on the new paragraph (c) in section 1(2), again claiming equal pay with the male tradesmen in the shipyard. She withdrew her earlier application, and it is with her second application alone that this appeal is concerned.

D This second application came before the industrial tribunal sitting in Liverpool on 10 April 1984. An issue arose over whether the work performed by the applicant was of equal value to the work of certain named tradesmen employed in the same shipyard and whose trades respectively were those of painter, joiner and thermal insulation engineer. E In accordance with the prescribed procedure, the industrial tribunal referred that question for report to a member of the panel of experts designated by the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service. An expert, Mr. T. A. Dillon, duly made his report, in which he answered the referred question in favour of the applicant.

F The matter then came back again to the industrial tribunal. Having heard further argument, on 29 October 1984 the tribunal accepted the conclusions in the expert's report. They directed, in short, that if the applicant's claim in respect of her employer's contravention of any terms modified by virtue of the equality clause deemed to operate in relation to any variation between her contract of employment and the contracts of the so-called male "comparators," could not be settled between the parties, the applicant might restore the matter for further consideration by the industrial tribunal. That decision of the industrial tribunal is reported: [1985] I.C.R. 71.

G The parties were unable to agree on the implementation of that decision, and the matter came before the same industrial tribunal again on 20 June 1985. Before mentioning the stumbling block between the parties, we should refer to the material terms of the relevant legislation. H The effect of section 1(1) of the Equal Pay Act 1970 is to imply an "equality clause" into every contract of employment of a woman which does not contain such a clause. The nature and effect of an equality clause are spelled out in subsection (2). The opening words of that subsection provide:

"An equality clause is a provision which relates to terms (whether concerned with pay or not) of a contract under which a woman is employed (the 'woman's contract'), and has the effect that— . . ."

Of the three paragraphs that follow, paragraph (a) is concerned with the case where the woman is employed on like work with a man in the same employment, and paragraph (b) with the case where the woman is employed on work rated as equivalent with that of a man in the same employment. Each of these two paragraphs (a) and (b) contains two sub-paragraphs, (i) and (ii), which are, in all material respects, the same as sub-paragraphs (i) and (ii) in paragraph (c). Paragraph (c) is in these terms:

"where a woman is employed on work which, not being work in relation to which paragraph (a) or (b) above applies, is, in terms of the demands made on her (for instance under such headings as effort, skill and decision), of equal value to that of a man in the same employment—(i) if (apart from the equality clause) any term of the woman's contract is or becomes less favourable to the woman than a term of a similar kind in the contract under which that man is employed, that term of the woman's contract shall be treated as so modified as not to be less favourable, and (ii) if (apart from the equality clause) at any time the woman's contract does not include a term corresponding to a term benefiting that man included in the contract under which he is employed, the woman's contract shall be treated as including such a term."

The point upon which the parties were unable to agree in implementing the decision of the industrial tribunal given in October 1984 was whether, in considering if any term of the applicant's contract is less favourable to her than a term of a similar kind in the men's contracts, it is appropriate (a) to compare only their respective terms as to the basic wage rates and overtime rates, or (b) to have regard to the terms and conditions of the contracts of employment as a whole of the applicant and the tradesmen. The applicant contended for (a), and the employer contended for (b). The industrial tribunal, by a majority, found in favour of the employer on 25 July 1985, and this decision was upheld by the Employment Appeal Tribunal on 19 May 1986. The applicant has now appealed from that decision.

We can illustrate the effect of these rival contentions in this case, in terms of figures, by using (but only for illustration purposes, because the figures are not agreed) some figures put forward by the employer. On these figures, at April 1984 the applicant, who is paid an annual salary, received the equivalent of £103.89 per week. The tradesmen's basic pay was £126.50 per week. The applicant's hourly overtime rates were £3.44 from Monday to Friday and £4.22 on Saturday and Sunday. The men's hourly overtime rates were £3.81 from Monday to Saturday, and £4.68 on Sunday. Thus the men's overtime rates were higher, save as to Saturdays. These comparisons yield an aggregate advantage of £24.51 per week in favour of the men, having regard (as we were told) to the actual overtime worked by the applicant and the men over an unspecified period.

On the other side of the coin, although the hours of work were nominally the same, the applicant's hours include a paid meal break of 30 minutes each day. The employer values this, and the benefit of her free meals, at £18.12 per week. Further, but as a very small item, the applicant has an additional two days' paid holiday each year (worth 71p per week). Finally, the applicant enjoys better sickness benefits, to an extent which the employer values at £16.95 per week. Using these

Hayward v. Cammell Laird (No. 2) (C.A.)

A figures, the items in respect of which the applicant is treated more favourably than the men comparables show an aggregate weekly advantage of £35.78 to the applicant. Overall, therefore, setting the men's advantage of £24.51 on basic and overtime pay against the applicant's advantage of £35.78 on other benefits, she is, so the employer contends, £11.27 per week better off than the men.

B The conclusion of the majority of the industrial tribunal was:

C "In relation to the concept of equal pay for work of equal value we find that an employer is entitled, when dealing with the implementation of an award to consider pay as meaning not only basic pay, and overtime pay, but also, to use the words of article 119 'any other consideration whether in cash or in kind which the worker receives directly or indirectly in respect of his employment from his employer.' That, in our view, would require sick pay to be taken into account in some way, but it does not follow, as we have indicated above, that we would afford unqualified acceptance to the mathematical approach adopted by the employer in its schedule."

D Accordingly the tribunal refused to make an unqualified declaration, as asked on behalf of the applicant, that her basic pay and overtime pay should be the same as that of her male comparables.

E In upholding this decision the Employment Appeal Tribunal, whose judgment was delivered by Popplewell J., concluded that section 1(2) was capable of bearing either of the two rival meanings, and that, accordingly, article 119 of the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community had to be applied.

F In brief, article 119 comes into the history of the Equal Pay Act 1970 in this way. Although the Equal Pay Act 1970 received the royal assent on 29 May 1970, the coming into force of section 1 was postponed until 29 December 1975 (section 9(1)). Before that date arrived the United Kingdom, on 1 January 1973, became a member of the European Economic Community and the provisions of the E.E.C. Treaty became binding upon it. The treaty of accession was signed on 22 January 1972, and section 2 of the European Communities Act 1972, introducing the E.E.C. Treaty into English law, was enacted on 17 October 1972.

H Article 119 of the E.E.C. Treaty provides:

G "Each member state shall during the first stage ensure and subsequently maintain the application of the principle that men and women should receive equal pay for equal work. For the purpose of this article, 'pay' means the ordinary basic or minimum wage or salary and any other consideration, whether in cash or in kind, which the worker receives, directly or indirectly, in respect of his employment from his employer. Equal pay without discrimination based on sex means: (a) that pay for the same work at piece rates shall be calculated on the basis of the same unit of measurement; (b) that pay for work at time rates shall be the same for the same job."

Progress in implementing this principle having been uneven in different member states, on 10 February 1975 the Council of the European Communities issued Council Directive (75/117/E.E.C.). We shall refer to this as the "equal pay directive."

Thereafter the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 was enacted on 12 November 1975. It amended the Equal Pay Act 1970 by substituting the present section 1(1) and (2), except for paragraph (c), for the original section 1(1) and (2). The new section 1(1) and (2) came into force on 29 December 1975.

Article 1 of the equal pay directive is concerned with the elimination of discrimination over remuneration on the ground of sex for "the same work or for work to which equal value is attributed." Article 8 of the directive gave member states a period of one year in which to put into force the laws necessary to comply with the directive. In July 1982, in Commission of the European Communities v. United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland (Case 61/81) [1982] I.C.R. 578 the European Court of Justice held that, in relation to work of equal value, this country had failed to fulfil its obligations under the E.E.C. Treaty by failing to implement article 1 of the equal pay directive. In consequence, section 1(2)(c) was introduced into the Equal Pay Act by an amendment made by the Equal Pay (Amendment) Regulations 1983. These regulations were made under section 2(2) of the European Communities Act 1972.

With that introduction we come to the Employment Appeal Tribunal's conclusion [1986] I.C.R. 862, 873:

"Applying article 119 the appeal tribunal must look at the overall package. We reject the submission that this will pose any difficulty in practice for an industrial tribunal which is quite capable of carrying out the inquiry. A decision to the contrary, which would necessarily involve leap-frogging, would in the view of the industrial members of this appeal tribunal result in widespread chaos in industry and inflict grave damage on commerce. We are a pragmatic tribunal, as are the industrial tribunals, with members well versed in industrial practice. We should seek to interpret an Act of Parliament with common sense applicable to industrial affairs and not in a way which has precisely the opposite effect unless we were driven to it. To adopt and adapt the words of Lord Reid in Post Office v. Crouch [1974] I.C.R. 378, 399, when he said in relation to the Industrial Relations Act 1971: 'This, in my judgment, shows that the Act must be construed in a broad and reasonable way so that legal technicalities shall not prevail against industrial realities and common sense.' We agree with the views of the industrial tribunal as an industrial jury."

We can illustrate what we understand the appeal tribunal meant by leap-frogging in this way. Take the case of a man and a woman who are doing the same work, or work of equal value. The woman's salary is lower than the man's, but unlike the man she is provided with a car by the employer. On the applicant's argument, the woman is entitled to have her salary increased to the same level as the man's regardless of the extra benefit she receives in the form of a car. But the matter would not stop there. The equality provisions in section 1 of the Equal Pay Act 1970 apply to men just as much as to women: section 1(13). So, after the woman's pay had been increased to match the man's, he could make a complaint in respect of the failure of the employer to provide him with a car. Thus, by pointing out and relying on the differences in each other's contract, each would be able to obtain an improvement in his or her contractual terms to match the most favourable parts of the other's contract.

Hayward v. Cammell Laird (No. 2) (C.A.)

A On this appeal Mr. Pannick's primary and principal argument was short and simple: section 1(2) is unambiguous in focusing on the specific term of which complaint is made. Here the terms of which complaint is made are those relating to the applicant's basic rate of pay and her overtime rate of pay. She is entitled to have those rates of pay increased to match those of the men comparables, regardless of the content of any other terms of her contract or of the men's contracts.

B We are unable to accept this. Under section 1(2)(c)(i), as under the corresponding sub-paragraphs of paragraphs (a) and (b), a comparison has to be made between "any term" of the woman's contract and "a term of a similar kind" in the man's contract. The comparison has to be made to decide whether the relevant term in the woman's contract is less favourable than the corresponding term in the man's contract. If the complaint concerns a term as to the woman's basic rate of pay, and she is paid on the same basis as the man (for instance, at the same weekly rate), and they both work the same hours, a simple comparison will be possible between the two rates of pay. In such a case, the statutory favourability comparison may be capable of being carried out without any adjustments being necessary.

D But in all save the simplest of cases, that will not be so. Take the case of a woman who is paid a lower basic weekly wage than a man but whose hours of work are shorter. In such a case, to make a comparison of their respective terms of pay, some adjustment to the weekly wage rates would obviously be necessary. Otherwise one would not be comparing like with like.

E We think that this reasoning would apply with equal validity and force if the woman's hours of work included a paid meal break but the man's did not: the adjustment being made in order to see if the term of the woman's contract regarding pay was less favourable than that of the man's would need to cover this item also.

F Moreover, in some instances the adjustments needed to carry out the statutory favourability comparison of corresponding terms will be more than the merely arithmetical calculations appropriate in the above examples. Take another case: a woman and a man work similar hours, but the woman is paid on a piece rate basis whilst the comparable man is paid on a time basis. We can see no reason why that difference should preclude the industrial tribunal from hearing and determining a complaint under section 1(2), even though this would involve inquiring into the wages which, over the hours of work in question, the woman could reasonably expect to obtain on her piece rates. The tribunal would, in such a case, have to make an assessment of the value of the woman's piece rates, having heard the evidence necessary for that purpose.

G But it is not only in such a case that adjustments would be called for. If a woman were paid a basic weekly sum but with productivity bonuses added, and a man were paid a fixed wage with no bonuses, in our view it is plain that the comparison exercise called for under section 1(2)(c)(i) would require the bonuses to be brought into account. The woman could not have her basic weekly wage brought up to the level of the man's wage, and ignore the bonuses she was receiving. The object of the Equal Pay Act 1970 is to prevent discrimination. The purpose of an equality clause is to achieve equality. But to leave the productivity bonuses out of account would not be to achieve equality. It would have the effect of raising the woman's "pay," giving that expression the normal meaning of the remuneration from one's employment, to a level above that of the man.

That cannot have been the intention of Parliament, nor do we consider that the language used in the section compels or, indeed, is sensibly capable of, such a construction. The Act requires the "term" of the woman's contract to be compared with a "term of a similar kind." Terms in contracts of employment are of many "kinds"; concerning the nature of the work, working conditions, hours of work, pay, and so forth. Where the complaint relates to pay, the provisions which have to be compared are the terms concerning pay. The "term" in the woman's contract concerning pay must not be less favourable than the "term" concerning pay in the man's contract. This involves looking, in the case of the woman and of the man, at the whole of the relevant term, viz., the term concerning pay. This will be so even if the complainant seeks to isolate one item of her remuneration and compare that alone with a corresponding item in the man's remuneration. The complainant cannot, by limiting her claim in such a way, elevate to the status of a term what is, in the context of the statutory comparison, only part of the relevant term. To revert to my last example, the woman cannot claim parity on basic pay and ignore the bonuses which she receives but the man does not. To do so would produce a result so manifestly absurd as to bring into disrepute the underlying, non-discrimination, equality principle which the Act of 1970 is seeking to further.

The artificiality of looking only at one or more ingredients in the woman's overall remuneration package, as selected by the woman, can be illustrated further by reference to the overtime rates in the present case. On the figures put forward, the applicant's hourly rate is lower than the men's in respect of every day in the week except (somewhat curiously) Saturday, when hers is higher. Self-evidently it would be absurd if, by making complaint only in respect of her overtime rates for the days Sunday to Friday inclusive, the applicant could have the better overtime rate at which she is paid on Saturday left out of account. In fairness to her, that has not been suggested in this case. But what this shows, in stark form, is that to achieve a fair and sensible result with a complaint regarding pay, one cannot look merely at one part of the pay of the complainant and of the comparables and ignore the other parts.

We have mentioned the case of the woman who receives productivity bonuses in addition to her basic pay. What of the case where the woman receives not a fixed or variable cash bonus on top of her basic pay, but a benefit in kind, such as the use of a car, or free meals, or free transport, or free medical insurance? "Pay" is not defined in the Equal Pay Act 1970, but we are unable to discern any reason why, if a cash bonus has to be brought into the comparison exercise, bonuses in kind should not. In an era when many employees receive part of their remuneration in the form of such benefits, frequently of considerable value, to distinguish between payments in cash and payments in kind would be to introduce an artificial and unrealistic distinction.

We come, finally, to the sickness benefits. These are capable of being distinguished from all the other items we have so far mentioned in that these benefits will only result in a benefit, in cash or in kind, being received by the employee if and when he or she falls ill. In argument these benefits were said to be contingent. But, here again, we do not think that any sound distinction exists. Sickness benefits constitute sums paid to an employee when, through sickness, he or she is unable to

Hayward v. Cammell Laird (No. 2) (C.A.)

A work. Paid holidays represent periods when an employee, although not working, will be paid. Of course, holidays are fixed and will be taken, as arranged, year after year, whilst the incidence of illness is uncertain and unpredictable. But most employees are prevented from going to work by illness from time to time. If the length of paid holidays is, in an appropriate case, a matter to be taken into account when comparing two employees' terms as to pay, so also should sickness benefits. They form
B part of the employees' remuneration; they are part of their "pay," giving that word the wide meaning which, in step with article 119 and the equal pay directive, it must surely bear in the context of the Equal Pay Act 1970, as amended.

C In reaching this conclusion, however, we wish to note our agreement with the industrial tribunal's reservation regarding the manner in which the employer appears to have valued the sickness benefits in this case. On its face the calculation assumes that the applicant is receiving one-half of her maximum annual sickness benefit. That is to say, that she is away ill for 13 weeks each year. That seems much too high a figure, but we have heard no argument on the figures, and this will be one of the matters for further consideration by the industrial tribunal.

D For the applicant, in support of her contention on the construction of the Act of 1970, it was argued that assessing the worth of contractual rights such as sickness benefits was a very difficult, if not impossible, task. We do not find this argument persuasive. Even on the applicant's construction, the industrial tribunal will be faced with an evaluation exercise such as that involved in comparing pay on time rates with pay on piece rates. We see no insuperable difficulty in industrial tribunals, with their industrial expertise, putting a fair value on benefits such as E sickness benefits and benefits in kind.

Mr. Pannick drew our attention to the "material factor" defence in section 1(3) of the Act of 1970. In short, section 1(3) provides the employer with a defence in respect of any variation between a woman's contract and a man's contract if the employer proves that the variation is genuinely due to a material difference, other than sex, between the woman's case and the man's case. It was submitted that the existence of this defence provides the answer to the undesirable practical consequences outlined above. It was also submitted that, for reasons which it is not material to mention, section 1(3) is not now available as a defence to the employer in this case. We prefer to express no view on whether
F section 1(3) would be available as a defence in all the instances we have mentioned above. We are content to assume that the ambit of section 1(3) may be wide enough to embrace such cases. But we do not think that making this assumption robs the examples given of their force as an aid to understanding what is meant by the expression "any term" in section 1(2) in the context of a complaint concerning pay. In setting out the effect of an equality clause, section 1(2) requires a favourability comparison to be made. On the applicant's construction, that exercise
G will be a manifestly absurd one in some instances. We are unable to impute to Parliament an intention that this should be the effect of section 1(2), with resort then needing to be had to section 1(3) to bring sense out of nonsense.

H We can deal with article 119 of the E.E.C. Treaty, very briefly. In our view the conclusion we have reached above on the construction of "term" in section 1(2) is consistent with article 119. Indeed, we are fortified in that conclusion by the terms of the article. Article 119 contains a wide definition of "pay" for the purpose of the principle that men and women should receive equal pay for equal work. The article does not expressly state that, in applying the principle, pay as a whole as defined should be looked at, rather than the individual ingredients one by one, in isolation from each other, but we have no doubt that that is what is meant. That is the only sensible interpretation of the article. We add that we can see nothing in the equal pay directive to suggest otherwise.

We should also note a submission made for the applicant based on the Sex Discrimination Act 1975. That Act, with which the Equal Pay Act 1970 forms a single code, makes it unlawful for a person to discriminate against a female employee in the way he affords her "access to opportunities for promotion, transfer or training, or to any other benefits": section 6(2). It was submitted that that provision is concerned with specific benefits, not an overall package. We do not derive assistance from this provision when determining the meaning to be given to the word "term" in section 1(2) of the Equal Pay Act 1970 in the context of a complaint concerning pay.

For these reasons this appeal will be dismissed. Accordingly it will be for the industrial tribunal, failing agreement between the parties, to determine whether the term of the applicant's contract concerning pay is less favourable to her than the terms concerning pay of the men comparables and, if it is less favourable, to determine the extent and to determine also what modification needs to be made to that term in the applicant's contract so that it will be not less favourable. Pay for this purpose will include all the items listed in the employer's schedule. It will be for the industrial tribunal to determine all disputes concerning the figures.

Leave to appeal refused.*

Adoption—Adoption order—Payment or reward—Proposed adopters entering into surrogacy agreement—Payments made to mother—Whether payment unlawful—Whether court having jurisdiction to authorise payments retroactively—Adoption Act 1958 (7 Eliz. 2, c. 5), s. 50(1)(3) (as amended by Children Act 1975 (c. 72), s. 108(1), Sch. 3, paras. 21(2)(4), 34)

A childless married couple, Mr. and Mrs. A, made an arrangement with Mrs. B that if she became pregnant following sexual intercourse with Mr. A, then, after the birth, the child would be handed over to Mr. and Mrs. A to be brought up as their own child. Mr. B consented to the arrangement and the parties agreed that Mr. and Mrs. A would pay a sum of money to cover Mrs. B's loss of wages and expenses during pregnancy. A child was conceived and Mr. and Mrs. A paid to Mrs. B the sum of £1,000 and a further £4,000 after the child's birth. The child was handed over to Mr. and Mrs. A two days after birth. They applied to adopt the child and Mrs. B, as the child's mother, consented to an adoption order being made.

On the question whether there had been any payment or reward for or in consideration of the adoption contrary to section 50(1) of the Adoption Act 1958¹ and, if so, whether the court could authorise the payments made under section 50(3):—

Held, making the adoption order, that the intention of the parties had been to provide a child for a childless couple that they could bring up as their own and there had been no commercial transaction and, therefore, the payments made were not payments or rewards contrary to the provisions of section 50(1) of the Adoption Act 1950; but that, if the payments had been made as a reward for placing a child for adoption, then the court had jurisdiction subsequently to authorise those payments under the provisions of section 50(3) and, if necessary, would do so since it was in the child's interest that the adoption order be made (post, pp. 33H—34A, 35H—36B, F—37A, E-F).

APPLICATION

The applicants, a married couple, sought to adopt a child, aged two years and four months at the time of the hearing of the application, whose natural father was the male applicant. The child's mother, who consented to the adoption, had received a total sum of £5,000 from the applicants more than two years earlier.

The hearing was in chambers but judgment was delivered in open court.

The facts are stated in the judgment.

11 March. LATEY J. read the following judgment. Mr. and Mrs. A apply to adopt a little child, now aged 2 years and 4 months. The child's mother (whom I shall call "the mother") is Mrs. B. The child was conceived as a result of a surrogacy arrangement, as it is described, between Mr. and Mrs. A and Mrs. B and her husband, Mr. B. As a result of that arrangement Mr. A and Mrs. B had sexual intercourse on a few occasions and in due course the child was conceived. It was in no sense a love affair. It was physical congress with the sole purpose of procreating a child. As soon as there was conception intercourse ceased.

What led up to this arrangement was this: Mr. and Mrs. A are a devoted couple. To complete and fulfil their union they dearly wanted a child. For medical reasons Mrs. A was and is unable to have a baby. They did everything they could with medical help and advice, including surgery, to overcome this but to no avail. They then tried to adopt a child both in this country and abroad, again to no avail. As to this country, the principal reason given was their ages. This is surprising. At that time Mr. A was barely 40, and Mrs. A in her mid-30s, well within the normal age of parenthood, I would have thought. Another and subsidiary reason may have been that it was their second marriage, each having been divorced. But there is no doubt that their marriage is solid and stable, especially now that they have the baby, or toddler as it now is.

Then they heard a radio programme, and Mrs. A saw a television programme, about surrogacy. They saw it as their last chance.

In the meanwhile, Mr. and Mrs. B had two children of their own. They decided at that time to have no more (though recently they have had a third child). Mrs. B is one who enjoys pregnancy despite sickness and backache. She too heard, saw and read about surrogacy. She was deeply and genuinely moved about the plight of childless couples. There is no question about her sincerity about this. After much thought she decided to embark on this path. She discussed it with her husband, who was not, at first, enthusiastic but acquiesced and later supported her.

She put an advertisement in a magazine. Mr. and Mrs. A saw it and answered it. They met and the arrangement was made. Finance entered into it and this aspect of it is at the heart of whether an adoption order can be made in this case and, if it can be, whether it should be made. This is because of the terms of certain statutory enactments which I will come to shortly.

The mother, Mrs. B, was in full-time employment. She and her husband's joint income enabled them and their children to live in comfort. If she became pregnant it would mean giving up her job and earnings. It would mean incurring other expenses. She had responses

Laty J.

A from other couples—one couple in particular who offered a very large sum of money. This was not what she wanted.

She agreed with Mr. and Mrs. A to act as a surrogate mother because as she says:

B “I wanted to help a childless couple. My own children are very precious to me and I sympathised greatly with any couple who were unable to have children of their own, so much so that I was willing to have another pregnancy in order to give someone else that joy.”

She wanted a couple with whom she could be friendly, empathise, have a rapport. She and Mr. and Mrs. A found each other and she declined the others, including the couple offering the very large sum.

The two couples agreed a global sum of £10,000. The mother says:

C “The money represented only my loss of earnings, expenses in connection with the pregnancy, and emotional and physical factors. I emphasise that I did not go into the arrangements for commercial reasons, nor did I accept the money to hand [the child] over. I would have done that in any event. In fact, overall, I was marginally worse off. This does not bother me since my motive was not financial.”

D In his report the child's guardian ad litem says:

E “The mother does not appear to have been primarily motivated in entering into the arrangements by financial considerations. She appears to have felt strongly that through a surrogacy arrangement she could offer an important service to a childless couple and to have regarded the money mainly as the equivalent of compensation for loss of earnings while pregnant. . . . Her interest in surrogacy the mother attributes to a particular pleasure she has in having babies and a great sympathy for women who are unable to experience the joy of having and caring for a baby. The public discussions and debates she heard about this subject struck a special chord for her, thus her initiative in advertising herself.”

F I have heard the mother speak about this in her evidence. I am left in no doubt that it is the plain, unvarnished truth.

G Mr. and Mrs. A paid £1,000 when she was some months pregnant, and £4,000 shortly after the baby was born. The balance of £5,000 was due some months later, but the mother refused to accept it. This was because she and a professional writer as co-author wrote a book: “Surrogate Mother. One Woman's Story,” from which she made money. That book has been put in as part of the material in this case. It was written pseudonymously and with care to conceal the identity of the child and those connected with the child. I have tried to do the same in this judgment. In the interest of the child nothing must be published which might point to the child's identity with serious consequences to the child later in life, if it were publicly known. Mr. and Mrs. A's close circle know the facts. They accept and love the child. Mr. and Mrs. A are very intelligent people who adore the child. They have already worked out what and when they are going to tell the child, and done so admirably, as it seems to me. But for any public publicity to happen about this child as it grows up would certainly damage its emotional development and might be disastrous.

H If the word “commercial” has any bearing on what has to be decided in this case and if it connotes a profit or financial reward element there was nothing commercial in what happened. There was no written contract or agreement; no lawyers were consulted until after the baby was born. The arrangement was one of trust which was fully honoured on both sides.

The rest of the history can be told briefly. The child was born in hospital with Mrs. A present at the birth and Mr. A joining them almost immediately. Two days later the mother and child went to Mr. and Mrs. A's home. The four of them spent a week together. The mother went back to her own home. Mr. and Mrs. A and the child have been together since. The child has thrived. The three of them have been and are supremely happy. The mother and Mr. and Mrs. A have kept in contact. The mother and Mr. B have had a third child. They are closer than they ever have been.

Leaving aside questions of morality and ethics it is now a happy story, though all four of them went through many anxious, distressing and embarrassing moments, which I will mention briefly later.

The questions are whether in law an adoption order is permissible; and, if it is, whether it is a correct exercise of the discretion to make it.

I am indebted to counsel for their most helpful arguments. Counsel for Mr. and Mrs. A and for the child's guardian ad litem, who strongly supports the application for adoption, while properly advancing their clients' cases, were careful to apprise me of anything I should know which pointed in the opposite direction.

On my invitation the Attorney-General instructed counsel, Mr. Holman, to appear as amicus curiae. Mr. Holman stressed that there was no public policy formulated regarding surrogacy arrangements other than as was enshrined in the Surrogacy Arrangements Act 1985 which illegalises commercial surrogacy agencies and negotiations and advertisements; and save in so far as it may already be enshrined in the Adoption Act 1958 and Children Act 1975.

The Surrogacy Arrangements Act 1985 had not been enacted when the arrangement in the instant case was entered into and carried out. Otherwise, as Mr. Holman said, there is no public policy in existence. There is active consideration and consultation with the public being carried out by the government and its advisers. A consultation paper entitled "Legislation on Human Infertility Services and Embryo Research" was presented to Parliament in December 1986 which includes, among several other topics, the wider implications of surrogacy. It needs no saying that there is no more difficult and sensitive subject. Presumably when the consultations and considerations are complete, policies will be formulated and put before Parliament. It is there, in my opinion, that questions of morality and ethics should be weighed. There is no requirement in the instant case for the court to weigh them, which it is not equipped to do and should not attempt. I agree fully about this with counsel for the Attorney-General who also has the benefit of advice from a senior member of the legal staff of the Department of Health and Social Security.

Whether or not an adoption order can and, if it can, should be made, falls to be considered in the light of the relevant provisions of the Adoption Act 1958 and the Children Act 1975. As I had hoped he would, Mr. Holman advanced the arguments against the making of an order. Counsel for the applicants and the child's guardian ad litem put the arguments in favour.

Section 50(1) of the Adoption Act 1958, as amended, enacts:

3 W.L.R.

In re Adoption Application (Fam.D.)

Latey J.

A “Subject to the provisions of this section, it shall not be lawful to make or give to any person any payment or reward for or in consideration of—(a) the adoption by that person of a child; (b) the grant by that person of any agreement or consent required in connection with the adoption of a child; (c) the transfer by that person of the actual custody of a child with a view to the adoption of the child; or (d) the making by that person of any arrangements for the adoption of a child.”

B Subsection (2) sets out the penalties for any contravention. Subsection (3) enacts (omitting words immaterial to the present case):

C “This section does not apply . . . to any payment or reward authorised by the court to which an application for an adoption order in respect of a child is made.”

Next there is section 22(5) of the Children Act 1975, which enacts:

D “The court shall not make an adoption order in relation to a child unless it is satisfied that the applicants have not, as respects the child, contravened section 50 of the 1958 Act (prohibition of certain payments in relation to adoption).”

E Then there is section 57(2) of the Adoption Act 1958 (interpretation section) which enacts:

F “For the purposes of this Act, a person shall be deemed to make arrangements for the adoption of a child or to take part in arrangements for the placing of a child in the actual custody of another person, if (as the case may be)—(a) he enters into or makes any agreement or arrangement for, or for facilitating, the adoption of the child by any other person, whether the adoption is effected, or is intended to be effected, in pursuance of an adoption order or otherwise; or (b) he enters into or makes any agreement or arrangement for, or facilitates, the placing of the child in the actual custody of that other person; or if he initiates or takes part in any negotiations of which the purpose or effect is the conclusion of any agreement or the making of any arrangement therefor, or if he causes another to do so.”

Lastly, there is section 3 of the Children Act 1975, which provides:

G “In reaching any decision relating to the adoption of a child, a court or adoption agency shall have regard to all the circumstances, first consideration being given to the need to safeguard and promote the welfare of the child throughout his childhood; and shall so far as practicable ascertain the wishes and feelings of the child regarding the decision and give due consideration to them, having regard to his age and understanding.”

H The first question, therefore, is whether in the present case there has been “any payment or reward” within the meaning of section 50 of the Adoption Act 1958—“for adoption,” to put it conveniently albeit imprecisely. This is a question of fact to be decided on the evidence. Mr. and Mrs. A and Mrs. B have all given evidence. All are transparently honest. They did not make notes. They did not take legal advice. Not surprisingly, their recollection of the precise sequence of events and what was discussed and when is not clear. What does come out strongly is that what was wanted was a baby and that Mr. and Mrs. A should have it from birth to care for and bring up. And that it was upon this that they were all concentrating. It was only after the payments had been made and the baby was born that any of them began to turn their minds in any real sense to adoption and the legalities.

In my judgment there was no payment or reward within the meaning of section 50(1) of the Adoption Act 1958. But if I am mistaken about this and the payments do rank as payments or rewards within the meaning of the section, is that the end of the matter? Is there an absolute prohibition against adoption regardless of the adverse effects on this child and its family.

Much of the argument has been directed towards this question. It turns on the interpretation to be given to section 50(3) which provides, as I have said, that the prohibition shall not apply "to any payment or reward authorised by the court . . ." Can such authorisation be given only in advance of the making of a proposed payment or giving of a reward? Or can it be given for a payment or reward already made or given?

In his role as amicus curiae, Mr. Holman advanced the arguments in favour of the former interpretation. If that is the correct view the results, as he acknowledges, would be draconian indeed. It would mean, for example, that any payment, however modest and however innocently made, would bar an adoption and do so however much the welfare of the child cried aloud for adoption with all the security and legal rights and status it carried with it: and that, be it said, within the framework of legislation whose first concern is promoting the welfare of the children concerned.

I do not believe that Parliament ever intended to produce such a result (nor, anticipating, has it done so in my judgment). The result it intended to produce is wise and humane. It produced a balance by setting its face against trafficking in children, on the one hand, but recognising that there may be transactions which are venial and should not prohibit adoption, on the other hand.

Nor in my judgment does the language of the section compel the draconian interpretation. What does "authorise" mean in this context? Counsel have been unable to find any reported cases on the point, perhaps because none is necessary. In the Shorter Oxford English Dictionary "authorise" is described variously as: "1. To set up or acknowledge as authoritative . . . 2. To give legal force to . . . 3. To give formal approval to; to sanction, countenance . . . ; to justify . . ."

To my mind, in plain language, there is nothing in "authorise" or its synonyms to suggest that authorisation can only be given prospectively. On the contrary, it can equally well be given retroactively. Mr. Baker, the Deputy Official Solicitor, has been in court during the argument and with his wide experience he informed me through Mr. Holman that authorisation is much more likely to be called for for something which has happened than for something which is in future contemplation. For these reasons the correct interpretation is the second one, with the result that Parliament has produced the result it intended to.

It follows that in each case the court has a discretion whether or not to authorise any payment or reward which has already been made or may be contemplated in the future. In exercising that discretion the court would no doubt balance all the circumstances of the case with the welfare of the child as first consideration against what Mr. Levy well described as the degree of taint of the transaction for which authorisation

A is asked. If the matter were to reach that stage, Mr. Holman, with evident pleasure and relief, submitted that authorisation be given and an adoption order made.

The evidence and the full and balanced reports are all one way. As I have said this little child is thriving and it and its family are supremely happy. It is all accurately and clearly summarised in the guardian ad litem's report and I cannot do better than quote from it:

"Mr. and Mrs. A appear both to be sensible, warm and open people. Their relationship with the child is loving and appears a very normal parent/child relationship. . . . Both the doctor and health visitor are entirely happy with the care the As give the child and are entirely happy with the child's physical, social and emotional development. . . . In all respects the care the child receives from Mr. and Mrs. A appears excellent. The child has lived with Mr. and Mrs. A since two days after birth. [The child] has known no other home or parents. . . . It is also most desirable that Mr. and Mrs. A feel fully responsible for the child now and into the future. Anything other than adoption will leave them with some fear that at some future date their care of the child may be interfered with or even [the child] be removed from them. Such a fear, given the existing background anxieties could, in my view, have a corrosive effect on their feelings of commitment to the child. If the parents feel less than fully secure in their rights, duties and responsibilities to the child then this insecurity will communicate itself to the child affecting, in turn, its feelings of security with them which would be to its detriment."

I agree unreservedly with every word of that. If I am mistaken in my finding that the payments did not fall within the prohibited ambit, I should without hesitation exercise discretion by authorising them and making the adoption order.

For all these reasons the adoption order is made. For the sake of completeness I should add that the mother consents, and at a preliminary hearing I declared paternity, and approved the placement with a view to adoption.

This being the first case of its kind to come to court in this country I was invited by counsel to make some further remarks and it may be helpful to do so. Other than those outlawed by the Surrogacy Arrangements Act 1985, surrogacy arrangements are not against the law as it stands. But those contemplating taking this path should have their eyes open to the kind of pitfalls, obstacles and anxiety that they are likely to meet. Mr. and Mrs. A, a devoted and very nice couple, encountered many of them. So too did Mr. and Mrs. B. And they found themselves caught in a tangled web of family and social embarrassment and deception, including the deception of doctors and others, from which they could not escape. There was not, I stress, any illegality. They went to all lengths within their power and knowledge to avoid any illegality. To give just one example, Mrs. B declined medical and other financial benefits to which in the ordinary course she would have been entitled and which she could have had and no one the wiser. I shall not go into more detail in this case. It is enough to say that all the way through they have had to find ways to get over obstacles, and they have had to resort to all manner of shifts and stratagems. The expense has been heavy. And there have been these proceedings. These people have had three years of unremitting anxiety and many moments of distress, though I know that it has all been worthwhile for them in the end.

Latey J.

Last and very far from least there is that fact that in other cases it might well not end up happily. In the nature of things those who undertake the role of surrogate mother are those with very strong maternal instincts. The likelihood must be there that when the baby arrives the mother cannot bear to part with it. The trauma and turmoil then for all needs no describing.

One cannot sit in these courts and hear all the multitude of professionals and others without knowing well the depth of longing in couples, devoted to each other, who cannot have a child through no fault of their own. But before they go down the path of surrogacy they should know and know fully what it may entail. It is not a primrose path.

Adoption order granted.

Damages—Earnings, loss of—Pension contributions—Compulsory pension scheme—Deduction of contributions from plaintiff's wages—Plaintiff off work with no pay as result of accident—No pension contributions payable in respect of period with no pay—Pension rights not affected—Whether damages for loss of earnings to include pension contributions—Whether unpaid contributions part of plaintiff's loss

The plaintiff, who was employed by the defendant board, was required by his contract of employment to belong to the Mineworkers' Pension Scheme. Under its rules he was obliged to make a weekly contribution of a percentage of his earnings, which the board was entitled to, and did, deduct from his pay. The board was required to make a matching contribution. The plaintiff was injured at work in circumstances for which the board was liable. He was off work for 31 weeks, during the latter part of which he received no pay and accordingly no deductions could be made in respect of contributions to the pension scheme. The plaintiff suffered no loss of pension rights in respect of the period for which he was off work. He was awarded damages against the board, subject to reservation of

Dews v. N.C.B. (H.L.(E.))

A the issue whether he was entitled to additional damages equal to the amount of the contributions that he and the board would have made to the pension scheme if he had not suffered a loss of earnings. Michael Davies J. rejected the plaintiff's claim that the board's contribution should be taken into account but awarded the plaintiff £55 together with £20 agreed interest in respect of his own contributions. The Court of Appeal allowed an appeal by the board.

B On appeal by the plaintiff:—

C Held, dismissing the appeal, that a contribution to a retirement pension was not intended to provide any immediate benefit to the injured plaintiff and did not form part of the money available for his current expenditure so that he would suffer no immediate loss in respect of it as a result of the loss of his wages; and that, applying the fundamental principle that damages for personal injury were compensatory and intended to put the plaintiff as far as possible in the same financial position as if the accident had not happened, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the £55 in respect of his pension contributions in circumstances in which he would not suffer any diminution in his pension rights (post, pp. 40B–C, 41D, 43E–H, 46A–B, H—47A, F–H).

G APPEAL from the Court of Appeal.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff, John Dews, by leave of the House of Lords from the decision of the Court of Appeal (Sir John Donaldson M.R., Parker and Woolf L.J.J.) [1987] Q.B. 81 who on 19 May 1986 allowed an appeal by the defendants, the National Coal Board,* from a judgment of Michael Davies J. on 15 March 1985 awarding the plaintiff £55 damages and £20 interest in his action against the board.

H The Court of Appeal refused the plaintiff leave to appeal from their decision, but on 17 July 1987 the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords (Lord Keith of Kinkel, Lord Mackay of Clashfern and Lord Ackner) [1986] 1 W.L.R. 994 allowed a petition by him for leave.

* Now the British Coal Corporation: see the Coal Industry Act 1987, s. 1.

The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Griffiths.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

4 JUNE. LORD KEITH OF KINKEL. My Lords, I have had the opportunity of reading in draft the speeches prepared by my noble and learned friends Lord Griffiths and Lord Mackay of Clashfern. I agree with them, and for the reasons they give would dismiss the appeal.

B

LORD BRANDON OF OAKBROOK. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speeches prepared by my noble and learned friends, Lord Griffiths and Lord Mackay of Clashfern. I agree with them, and for the reasons which they give I would dismiss the appeal.

C

LORD GRIFFITHS. My Lords, the appellant plaintiff is a miner. On 7 February 1976 he was injured during the course of his employment at St. John's Colliery in West Yorkshire. He sued his employers the National Coal Board for damages. On 21 October 1980 judgment was given in the plaintiff's favour and he was awarded damages subject to reserving for further argument one particular head of damage which raises the question with which your Lordships are now concerned. It arises in the following circumstances.

D

It was a condition of the plaintiff's employment that he should belong to the Mineworkers' Pension Scheme and that he should contribute a percentage of his wages to the scheme which at the relevant time was 5.25 per cent. Under his contract of employment his employers were entitled to, and did, deduct this sum from his weekly wage and paid it directly to the scheme. The employers were obliged to make an equal contribution to the scheme and this they did. Thus the employers made a total weekly contribution to the scheme equal to 10.5 per cent. of the plaintiff's wages.

E

The pension to which the plaintiff would ultimately become entitled as a member of the scheme was not directly dependent on the amount of his contributions to the scheme or the matching contributions of his employers but was calculated upon a formula by which the average of the highest three consecutive years' earnings in his last 13 years of service is multiplied by his number of years of pensionable service divided by 90. So if he had spent his whole working life in the industry he would have received a pension of approximately half his best earning rate in the last 13 years of work.

F

If a member of the scheme was off work and received no wages neither he nor the employers were obliged to make any contribution to the scheme.

It was a particular feature of the scheme that if a member was off work for less than 18 months, the break in contributions by him and the employer caused no loss of pensionable service, and therefore no prospective loss of pension under the scheme.

G

For a part of the period that the plaintiff was off work neither he nor his employers made any contributions to the scheme. The "lost contributions" amounted in all to £110, £55 of which represented the plaintiff's contributions and £55 the employers'. However as the plaintiff

H

3 W.L.R.

Dews v. N.C.B. (H.L.(E.))

Lord Griffiths

A was off work for less than 18 months this in no way affected his pension entitlement under the scheme.

B The plaintiff claimed this sum of £110 as one of his heads of damage. The employers resisted the claim on the ground that as the plaintiff had not been required to pay these sums and as he had suffered no loss of pension rights he had therefore suffered no damage, and was not entitled to recover a sum that would be in the nature of a windfall rather than compensation for loss actually suffered. It was this issue that was reserved at the trial for a further hearing and which is now the subject of this appeal.

C The further argument was heard by Michael Davies J. who held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the £55 which would have been contributed to the scheme out of his wages but that he was not entitled to recover the £55 that represented the employers' contribution.

D The employers appealed and the Court of Appeal unanimously allowed the appeal, albeit their reasoning differed. The plaintiff however did not cross-appeal against the finding that he was not entitled to include the employers' contribution in the claim for damages. This was perhaps a pity because in my view the resolution of the problem requires consideration of both the plaintiff's and the employers' contributions.

E It is a fundamental principle of English law that damages for personal injury are compensatory, and intended so far as money can to put the plaintiff in the same financial position as if the accident had never happened. It was the application of this fundamental principle that led the House of Lords in British Transport Commission v. Gourley [1956] A.C. 185 to hold that damages for loss of earnings were to be assessed at the net sum that would be available to the plaintiff after discharging his liability for tax, rather than his gross earnings before deduction of tax.

F If this fundamental principle is applied to the facts of this case the plaintiff is not entitled to recover the £55. If he had not been injured he would never have received this sum as under the terms of his contract of employment it would have been paid directly into the scheme, and therefore would not have been available to him to dispose of as he chose as part of his earnings. Furthermore because of the 18 months moratorium provided for by the scheme he suffered no loss of future pension. If therefore the plaintiff was to be paid this sum of £55 he would receive £55 more than if he had been in full employment and to that extent would be enriched at the expense of his employers, rather than compensated.

G Mr. Alexander acknowledges this result on the facts of this particular case but submits that it should be accepted as an anomaly for to do otherwise would breach a second fundamental principle that governs the award of damages for personal injury which is that it is no concern of the tortfeasor how the injured plaintiff chooses to dispose of his earnings. It does not lie in the mouth of the tortfeasor to argue that because he has put the plaintiff in a hospital bed for six months he must be given credit for the money that the plaintiff would have spent on his own amusement during that time if he had been able to do so. Applying this principle, as the plaintiff's wages include the 5.25 per cent. that was contributed on his behalf to the scheme, it is said that it is no concern of the employers in their capacity as a tortfeasor to inquire how that part of the plaintiff's wages was spent, and he is entitled to be paid it as a part of his wages. A

This second principle cannot, however, be applied without some qualification. It has always been recognised that a deduction has to be made for the expenses of earning the income that has been lost: see Lim Poh Choo v. Camden and Islington Area Health Authority [1980] A.C. 174, 191, per Lord Scarman. There was some discussion before your Lordships as to whether a miner's travelling expenses to and from work should be deducted during the period he was off work and not incurring this expense. The National Coal Board never seek to make this deduction, and Mr. Alexander prays this in aid as showing the illogicality of their approach in seeking to deduct the pension contributions. The National Coal Board justify their position by pointing out that where a man chooses to live is no concern of his employers. If he chooses to live in the country far from his work and incurs substantial travelling expenses he will not be entitled to set the expense off for income tax purposes, and it is an example of expenditure on a way of life which is no concern of the tortfeasor. One is, however, left with the fact that wherever a man lives he is likely to incur some travelling expenses to work which will be saved during his period of incapacity, and they are strictly expenses necessarily incurred for the purpose of earning his living. It would, however, be intolerable in every personal injury action to have an inquiry into travelling expenses to determine that part necessarily attributable to earning the wage and that part attributable to a chosen life-style. I know of no case in which travelling expenses to work have been deducted from a weekly wage, and although the point does not fall for decision, I do not encourage any insurer or employer to seek to do so. I can, however, envisage a case where travelling expenses loom as so large an element in the damage that further consideration of the question would be justified as, for example, in the case of a wealthy man who commuted daily by helicopter from the Channel Islands to London. I have only touched on the question of travelling expenses to show that in the field of damages for personal injury principles must sometimes yield to common sense, and to acknowledge the force of Mr. Alexander's submission that the calculation of loss in personal injury cases should be kept simple as a matter of policy, particularly where the sums involved do not justify the costs likely to be incurred by elaborate investigations. B C D E F

There is another factor that has to be borne in mind when assessing damages that involve a claim for both loss of earnings and hospital or nursing home expenses. In order to avoid duplication of damages the "domestic element" in the cost of hospital and nursing home care is deductible. In so deciding, the House of Lords in Lim Poh Choo v. Camden and Islington Area Health Authority [1980] A.C. 174 applied the decision of the Court of Appeal in Shearman v. Folland [1950] 2 K.B. 43 and deducted the "domestic element" rather than an estimate of what the plaintiff might have spent on herself, as is done in a "lost years" calculation. Lord Scarman said, at p. 191: G H

"It is a simpler, more realistic, calculation and accords more closely with the general principle of the law that the courts in assessing compensation for loss are not concerned either with how the plaintiff would have used the moneys lost or with how she (or he) will use the compensation received."

3 W.L.R.

Dews v. N.C.B. (H.L.(E.))

Lord Griffiths

A The problem is how best to reconcile these two fundamental principles. On the plaintiff's behalf it is submitted that the best solution would be to limit the deductions from earnings to those imposed upon the earnings by the general law of the land, for example by taxation, which is of universal application, and they rely in particular upon the passage in Earl Jowitt's speech in British Transport Commission v. Gourley [1956] A.C. 185, 200 in which he cited the judgment of Lord
B Sorn in M'Daid v. Clyde Navigation Trustees, 1946 S.C. 462, 464:

"It seems to me that, when you get a liability to which all earnings are subject and which depends not upon any circumstances peculiar to the individual but upon a general law of the land universal in its application, it would be wrong to ignore the existence of that liability."

C And in Lord Tucker's speech, at p. 215:

"but the difficulty is, I feel, in deciding what items of expenditure following the earning of profits are to be taken into consideration and which are to be ignored. Such items are clearly distinguishable from those which are incurred in the process of earning the profits and which have to be deducted in the computation thereof. I think D the true answer is that expenditure which—although not actually a charge on earnings—is imposed by law as a necessary consequence of their receipt, is relevant to the ascertainment of the loss suffered by the party injured."

However, the analysis of the speeches in the Gourley case undertaken
E by Parker L.J. demonstrates convincingly that the majority including Lord Jowitt were founding their decision on the wider principle that damages are compensatory and are to be assessed upon a determination of what the plaintiff has really lost, rather than upon the narrow principle that deductions are limited to those imposed by the general law of taxation.

In my view the key to the solution of the present problem is to be
F found by recognising that in present day society people generally work with two principal aims in view; the first is to provide themselves with an income available for current spending and the second is to provide money that will be put into a pension scheme to provide them with an income after their retirement. When a plaintiff is injured and as a result is paid no wages his immediate real loss is that part of his net earnings that were available for current expenditure. In respect of this part of his
G earnings the object of which is to provide income available for current expenditure the tortfeasor is, subject to sums necessarily spent to earn the income, entitled to no credit for expenditure saved as a result of the injury; the principle that it is no concern of the tortfeasor how the plaintiff chooses to spend his income applies.

Different considerations, however, apply to the contributions to a H retirement pension. This money is not intended to provide any immediate benefit and the plaintiff suffers no immediate loss as a result of the loss of his wages. He may, of course, as a result of a failure to pay contributions to the pension scheme suffer a future loss of pension. This loss he is entitled to recover. The measure of the loss will depend upon the terms of the particular scheme to which the plaintiff is contributing. In some schemes if the period of disability is relatively short it may be that the loss can be compensated for by paying to the plaintiff a sum equivalent to the contributions that have not been paid during his disability, so that he can top up the contributions. But such a payment would have to include not only his own contributions to the scheme but also those of his employer. No doubt for fiscal reasons it is usual for the contributions to a pension scheme to be expressed as a percentage of the plaintiff's wages and a contribution, often a matching contribution, as in this case, from the employer; but both contributions are made as part of the consideration the employer pays for the plaintiff's work and in the example I have been considering the plaintiff would be entitled to recover a sum equivalent to both his own and the employer's contributions. However, if the plaintiff has been off work for a substantial period of time or is permanently disabled it is almost certain that payment of a sum equivalent to the lost contributions will not be sufficient to compensate for his lost pension rights and a more sophisticated calculation will be required to ascertain the loss.

What is certain however is that the plaintiff cannot recover both the contributions and the pension that those contributions would have purchased for that would be to allow double recovery. This is clearly demonstrated by the calculations made by the House of Lords in Parry v. Cleaver [1970] A.C. 1. Parry was a police officer who had been injured in an accident on 4 January 1963. He remained on full pay until he was discharged from police service on 30 June 1964. At the date of the accident his police pay was £21 18s. 3d. a week, out of which he contributed under a compulsory pension scheme the sum of £1 3s. 1d. On 6 October he obtained civilian employment. His weekly earnings were £13 16s. per week, out of which he contributed 14s. 8d. to a pension scheme.

If Parry had remained in the police until normal retirement age he would have received a pension of £10 a week. On retirement from his civilian employment at the age of 65 he would receive a pension of £5 13s. 6d. a week.

As a result of the accident, and after his discharge from the police, Parry became entitled to receive a disability pension of £3 18s. 4d. per week. The House of Lords decided by a majority that the disability pension should be disregarded for the purposes of calculating damage up to the date upon which he would have received his pension had he not been injured. The primary importance of Parry v. Cleaver is that it establishes the circumstances in which a disability pension is to be disregarded in calculating damages. It is nevertheless instructive to see how the plaintiff's contributions to the scheme were dealt with in assessing the damages which he was entitled to recover.

The loss was calculated in relation to four periods of time.

Period 1. From the date of his discharge from police service, 30 June 1964, to the date of trial, July 1966. This sum was calculated upon the difference between the net loss of earnings from police service and the net amount received from his civilian employment; in each case the earnings were calculated after deduction of his pension contributions; no account was taken of the police pension he received.

Period 2. From the date of trial to the date when, but for the accident, he would have retired from police service, 14 December 1975. The calculation was the same as for period 1.

Period 3. From 14 December 1975 to the date of his retirement from civilian employment at the age of 65. The damages were calculated as being the difference between the disability pension of £3 18s. 4d. and

A the £10 pension he would have received on his normal retirement from the force, namely £6 1s. 8d.

Period 4. From the age of 65 to the age of 75. The damages were calculated as the difference between the amount of pension that he was going to receive both from his civilian pension and his police employment and the amount of pension he would have received but for the accident.

B It is to be observed that whereas the disability pension is not to be taken into account until the date of his normal retirement from the police it is thereafter to be taken into account in that it is subsumed in the general retirement pension. Dealing with this Lord Reid said, at pp. 20-21:

C “As regards police pension, his loss after reaching police retiring age would be the difference between the full pension which he would have received if he had served his full time and his ill-health pension. It has been asked why his ill-health pension is to be brought into account at this point if not brought into account for the earlier period. The answer is that in the earlier period we are not comparing like with like. He lost wages but he gained something different in kind, a pension. But with regard to the period after retirement we are comparing like with like. Both the ill-health pension and the full retirement pension are the products of the same insurance scheme; his loss in the latter period is caused by his having been deprived of the opportunity to continue in insurance so as to swell the ultimate product of that insurance from an ill-health to a retirement pension. There is no question as regards that period of a loss of one kind and a gain of a different kind.”

E The calculations in Parry v. Cleaver demonstrate that if the plaintiff in the present case had been off work for a number of years so that his pension rights were seriously affected, he would have been able to recover for loss of pension but he would not have been able to recover for contributions that were not made to the scheme during his period of disability. It is therefore a startling proposition that if the plaintiff is less
F gravely injured and suffers no loss of pension rights he is in these circumstances able to recover his contributions. I am satisfied that so bizarre a result cannot be acceptable and is avoided by applying separate considerations to that part of his earnings which is intended to provide income available for immediate expenditure and that part which is intended to provide a pension for his retirement.

G Adopting this approach I do not regard it as a critical feature that this was a compulsory pension scheme. If the evidence showed that a plaintiff had been regularly making contributions to a voluntary scheme in order to secure a pension so that, but for the accident, the probability pointed to a continuation of those contributions I would apply the same principle. It will, of course, be easier to apply the principle in a compulsory scheme because it is possible to say with certainty that the plaintiff would not have H received that part of his wages for his immediate disposal and that it would have gone to the pension scheme. In the case of voluntary contributions the likelihood of the contributions having been continued will have to be taken into account. It may be that the plaintiff would satisfy the court that he was not going to continue with the contributions in which case he would be able to recover what he had hitherto paid as a contribution as a part of his damages. If, on the other hand, the plaintiff asserts that he was going to continue with the contributions and the probabilities support him then his loss is not the contributions but any diminution in his pension rights as a result of the discontinuance of the contributions.

[1987]

For these reasons, my Lords, I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD MACKAY OF CLASHFERN. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend Lord Griffiths. I agree with him that this appeal should be dismissed for the reasons which he has given.

Although the sum in issue in this appeal is small the question that falls to be decided is an important one and may affect a great number of cases. For this reason and out of respect for the full and able arguments to which we were treated I venture to add some observations. Both parties are agreed that it is a general principle in the assessment of damages according to English law that the plaintiff should recover "such a sum of money as will put him in the same position as he would have been in if he had not sustained the injuries:" per Earl Jowitt in British Transport Commission v. Gourley [1956] A.C. 185, 197.

It is also, in my opinion, generally true that a tortfeasor is in no way concerned with how a plaintiff might have spent the remuneration to which he would have been entitled had he not been injured. For example, if a tortfeasor could prove that but for the injury the plaintiff would have invested a part of his earnings in a way which, by the date of the trial, produced a loss to the plaintiff this would not be relevant to reduce the amount of damages payable to the plaintiff.

The question in this appeal is how these principles apply to the circumstances of this case.

Counsel for the plaintiff submits that his contribution to the pension scheme is part of the earnings to which, under his contract with his employers, he was entitled and the mere fact that he by contract agreed to dispose of it by investment in the pension scheme is no concern of the employers. Counsel for the employers maintains that the plaintiff is only entitled to be compensated for lost pecuniary benefits in so far as he would but for the injury have received and retained them. In this connection he makes reference to the use by judges of such phrases as "the pay packet" and "take-home pay" although he accepts that such phrases, while useful shorthand, should not be taken too literally since there is no magic in whether the sum in issue is deducted at source or becomes payable subsequently. Counsel for the plaintiff accepts that deductions required by the general law of the land such as the income tax statutes would fall to be taken into account as deductions in computing the plaintiff's loss but he points out that the pay packet test, particularly having regard to the point that it must not be taken too literally, is hardly a test at all. For example, a donation to charity which an employee agrees with his employer should be deducted at source and therefore never enters the employee's pay packet would not fall to be deducted in computing the plaintiff's loss of wages in consequence of an injury.

In my opinion, the tortfeasor is concerned with the disposal of any part of the plaintiff's remuneration which is applied to obtain benefits which may be affected by the plaintiff's injury and, if affected, would be a proper subject of claim against the tortfeasor. If a plaintiff is entitled to a benefit such as, for example, pension rights which is damaged as a result of his inability to work consequent upon an accident and the tortfeasor is bound to compensate him for the reduction in the value of

3 W.L.R.

Dews v. N.C.B. (H.L.(E.))

Lord Mackay
of Clashfern

A that benefit the tortfeasor must be concerned with the extent to which the injured plaintiff's remuneration required to be devoted to obtaining that benefit. Otherwise, where a claim for such loss is made, there would be a double recovery. If an employer were entitled to the use of a car for his own purposes on payment out of his salary of a certain contribution and as result of an injury for which the tortfeasor was responsible he lost that benefit, the tortfeasor would be entitled to take B into account the payment which the employer required from the employee for the use of the car as a deduction from the total claim for loss of earnings plus loss of use of the car. In my opinion, therefore, the second general principle must suffer an exception to the extent to which the injured plaintiff's earnings are used to provide benefits whose loss of value in consequence of the injury to the plaintiff would form a proper claim against the tortfeasor.

C In the normal case one might expect failure to pay contributions to have the effect of diminishing pension rights. Where this happens the plaintiff cannot claim both loss of contribution and the diminution in value of pension rights consequent upon failure to pay contribution. Which will be the appropriate claim in any particular case will be a question of circumstances.

D The speciality of this case is that the failure to pay contributions because of the terms of the pension scheme does not produce any consequent diminution in pension rights. Counsel for the plaintiff says that this is analogous to an insurance arrangement. He submits that by the terms of the scheme the plaintiff has in effect made an arrangement under which he is insured against loss of pension rights in the event of his being unable to pay contributions due to absence from work for a limited period. He likened the position to that which would have obtained if the plaintiff had, out of his own resources, paid for an insurance to provide the contributions during such an absence from work. In my opinion, the situation is similar to that in which an injured plaintiff on going off work in consequence of an accident does not immediately suffer a loss of wages. In such a case the tortfeasor will not be required to compensate him for a loss of wages which he has not suffered even although the position resulting is similar to one in which the plaintiff himself had purchased an insurance to provide payment equal to his wages over this period. In my opinion the correct analysis is that the arrangement under which the plaintiff suffers no loss of pension rights although no contributions were paid during his period of absence from work is part of the arrangement for remuneration under which he worked at the time of the accident. Since viewing that arrangement as a whole he has suffered no loss in respect of the absence of contributions to the pension scheme during his period off work I agree that his claim fails.

H LORD ACKNER. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speeches prepared by my noble and learned friends, Lord Griffiths and Lord Mackay of Clashfern. I agree with them, and for the reasons which they give I would dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

[COURT OF APPEAL]

CREST HOMES PLC. v. MARKS AND OTHERS

1987 Feb. 18, 19, 20

May, Croom-Johnson and Nourse L.JJ.

Practice—Discovery—Use of documents—Action for infringement of copyright—Documents discovered and affidavits sworn pursuant to Anton Piller order—Implied undertaking not to use documents or affidavits for other purposes—Whether applicable to contempt proceedings in separate action—Application for leave to use documents and affidavits in contempt proceedings—Whether leave to be granted—Supreme Court Act 1981 (c. 54), s. 72¹

B

In 1984 the plaintiff company and a subsidiary commenced an action against the first and second defendants alleging, inter alia, breach of copyright and obtained an Anton Piller order in respect of copies and originals of the plaintiff's documents relating to 60 of its house designs. That order having been executed it appeared to the plaintiff that only two of its designs had been copied by the defendants, and that they had retained no other documents relating to those designs. In 1985 the plaintiff, suspecting that another of its designs, not covered by the 1984 order, had been substantially copied by the defendants, commenced another action and obtained an Anton Piller order in that action in respect of 105 of its house designs, including all those covered by the 1984 order. On execution of the 1985 order, a number of allegedly infringing drawings were discovered, many of which the plaintiff claimed should have been disclosed pursuant to the 1984 order or were evidence of breaches of injunctions in that order. The plaintiff applied to the court for leave to use the documents obtained on the execution of the 1985 order and the affidavits sworn by the defendants in purported compliance therewith (i) in the general conduct of the 1984 action, and (ii) for the purpose of considering and, if so advised, taking proceedings for contempt of court in respect of the 1984 order. The judge refused the application in both respects.

E

On the plaintiff's appeal, (1) the defendants having conceded that leave should be granted in respect of the general conduct of the 1984 action:—

F

Held, allowing the appeal, that the use of documents disclosed in one action for the purposes of another, at least where there was no absolute identity both of parties and of causes of action, would constitute a breach of the implied undertaking given to the court not to use such documents for any collateral or ulterior purpose, unless the court modified the undertaking by giving leave for such use; and that in view of the defendants' concession the court should grant the leave sought in respect of the general conduct of the 1984 action (post, pp. 54E–F, 55B–D, 58D–E).

G

(2) That although section 72 of the Supreme Court Act 1981 had withdrawn the privilege against self-incrimination in respect of the use in proceedings for contempt of court of documents disclosed in proceedings relating to infringement of copyright and evidence given in such proceedings, it had not removed the court's discretion whether to give leave so to use such documents and affidavits to which the implied undertaking applied; and that the fact that the court would never make an order of discovery for the sole purpose of enabling proceedings for contempt of court to be brought was not of itself sufficient ground for refusing such leave (post, pp. 56A-C, 57G-H, 58D-E).

(3) That, in view of the public interest in ensuring compliance with orders of the court and of the fact that the purpose of the implied undertaking was to encourage free and frank discovery by giving protection to those who made it, and since there was material which suggested that the first and second defendants had not complied with the 1984 order by giving such discovery, and many of the documents belonged to the plaintiff, the leave sought would be granted in respect of the contemplated proceedings for contempt of court (post, pp. 55E-G, G-H, 57H-58B, D-E).

APPEAL from Whitford J.

By an amended writ, originally issued on 25 November 1985, the plaintiff, Crest Homes Plc., claimed against the defendants, David Terrence Marks, Wiseoak Homes Ltd., Barry J. Best and Wiseoak Residential Ltd., inter alia, (1) an injunction restraining each defendant from infringing the plaintiff's copyright in its original drawings relating to its house designs, converting to their own use infringing copies of such drawings, or misusing confidential information belonging to the plaintiff; (2) delivery up or destruction on oath of all infringing copies of the plaintiff's copyright works in the possession, custody or power of any of the defendants; and (3) discovery on oath of all documents and information relating to the defendants' allegedly wrongful acts. On the same day Whitford J. granted the plaintiff an Anton Piller order in respect of any of its drawings relating to certain of its house designs, any drawing or other document which represented the whole or any substantial part of any of the plaintiff's drawings relating to those house designs, including in particular all documents relating to the second defendant's "Larchvale" house design, documents relating to planning applications made by the second defendant which were founded upon or included any such document, and written instructions to and communications with the draftsmen of any such document. That order having been executed, Warner J. on 19 December 1985 made an order restraining the first defendant until judgment or further order from commencing to build any house or flat to any of nine of the defendants' designs copies of which had been removed from their possession pursuant to the Anton Piller order, or making or pursuing any planning application for permission to commence the building of any such house or flat, or parting with possession, custody or control of (other than to the plaintiff's solicitors), or hiding, defacing or destroying any document in their possession, custody or control relating to any such house or flat, or to any such planning application, or which was the property of the plaintiff (or a copy thereof); the second and fourth defendants gave an undertaking in the same terms.

By a notice of motion dated 24 January 1986 the plaintiff applied, inter alia, for orders (1) that the plaintiff and Crest Homes (Westerham) Ltd. be at liberty to make use of all documents removed by the plaintiff's solicitors from the second defendant's premises upon the execution of the Anton Piller order of 25 November 1985 for the purpose of their conduct of Chancery action 1984 C. No. 5743; (2) that the plaintiff be at liberty to make use of such documents for the purpose of considering and, if so advised, preparing, commencing and conducting proceedings in connection with breaches of orders made against, and undertakings given by, the first and second defendants in the 1984 action; (3) that for the purpose of making such uses of those documents the plaintiff's solicitors be released from the undertaking contained in the 1985 Anton Piller order that the documents obtained as a result of that order would be retained by them in safe custody; and (4) an order that the plaintiff be released from the implied undertaking not to make use of the documents except for the purpose of the conduct of the 1985 proceedings. On 28 February 1986 Whitford J. dismissed the motion and refused the plaintiff leave to appeal.

Pursuant to leave granted by Slade L.J. on 22 April 1986, the plaintiff, by a notice of appeal dated 30 April 1986, appealed seeking orders as set out in the notice of motion or, as an alternative to number (2), a declaration that the plaintiff's implied undertaking not to make use of the documents and affidavits did not extend to preclude their use for the purpose of contempt proceedings and in particular did not preclude the bringing of contempt proceedings in connection with contempts evidenced by such documents or affidavits. The grounds of the appeal were (1) that, if and in so far as the judge had held that the court had no discretion to permit the use of documents or affidavits disclosed pursuant to a court order to be used in contempt proceedings, he had erred in law, and he ought to have held that the court had a discretion, to be exercised according to the circumstances of the case; (2) that the judge had erred in law in holding that such a discretion

A might arise only in respect of a document which disclosed that a party had deliberately breached an order of the court, and any exercise of his discretion was therefore founded upon a mistake of law; (3) that the judge had wrongly disregarded the evidence before him of breaches of the orders in the 1984 action, and ought to have considered such evidence and to have held that a prima facie case of breaches of such orders had been made out; (4) that the judge had wrongly founded his decision on the fact that no proceedings for contempt by breaches of the orders in the 1984 action had at that time been instituted by the plaintiff, which was irrelevant to the exercise of the judge's discretion and ought to have been disregarded since the plaintiff could not have instituted such proceedings without the leave which it sought on the application; (5) that the judge had disregarded the fact that the defendants had complied without objection with the 1985 Anton Piller order without any claim of privilege, which fact was relevant to the exercise of his discretion; (6) that the judge had wrongly paid attention to the form of the plaintiff's application, and had been wrongly influenced to refuse the orders sought because of that form, which had been dictated by the need to obtain leave; (7) alternatively, that leave to use discovery documents and affidavits in contempt proceedings was not required; (8) that the judge had wrongly refused leave for the documents and affidavits to be used in connection with the 1984 action generally; that he ought to have held, in accordance with the evidence, that a case had been made out for the relevance of such documents, and their use in the 1984 action ought to have been permitted; (9) that the judge had wrongly held that if the documents had not been disclosed in the 1984 action the plaintiffs in that action would be able to secure discovery on a suitable application directed to the disclosure of specific documents, since those plaintiffs would have been able to make such an application without the leave sought on the application; (10) that the judge had wrongly held that, if there were to be any question of using affidavits sworn in the 1985 action in connection with the 1984 action, it was a matter which could only properly be determined by the judge at the trial as and when application to introduce such affidavits was made; (11) that the judge ought to have held, having regard to the common questions of law and fact which arose in both actions and since the rights to relief claimed in both actions arose out of the same transactions, that for the convenience of the parties generally free interchange of documents between the two actions ought to be permitted; (12) that the judge ought to have allowed an amendment to the notice of motion permitting the plaintiff to include within the scope of the application the affidavits sworn in purported compliance with the 1985 Anton Piller order; (13) that the judge had wrongly disregarded the fact that it was the plaintiff's case that, had full disclosure been made in accordance with the order in the 1984 action, the need for the application would not have arisen; and (14) that in the premises the judge had been wrong to refuse the leave sought by the plaintiff.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Nourse L.J.

Roger Henderson Q.C. and Christopher Floyd for the plaintiff.

Paul Dickens for the first defendant.

Geoffrey Hobbs for the second and fourth defendants.

NOURSE L.J. delivered the first judgment. This is an appeal from an interlocutory decision of Whitford J. given on 28 February 1986 in an action for infringement of copyright in house designs and misuse of confidential information. Shortly stated, the sole question now in issue is whether the plaintiff can make use of documents obtained on the execution of an Anton Piller order for the purpose of considering and, if so advised, taking proceedings for contempt of court in respect of breaches of an earlier such order made in another action between much the same parties and covering much of the same ground. The outcome of that question depends primarily on the interaction between (1) the implied undertaking that the documents will not be used for any collateral or ulterior purpose; (2) the privilege against self-incrimination; and (3) the provisions of section 72 of the Supreme Court Act 1981.

The plaintiff in this action ("the 1985 action") is Crest Homes Plc. Both it and the second and fourth defendants, Wiseoak Homes Ltd. and Wiseoak Residential Ltd., are companies engaged in the development of residential land and the sale of residential properties. The first defendant, Mr. David Terrence Marks, was formerly employed by the plaintiff and he was a director of its subsidiary called Crest Homes (Westerham) Ltd. The third defendant, Mr. Barry J. Best, is not affected by the order appealed from and he is not a party to the appeal.

In November 1984 an earlier action ("the 1984 action") was commenced by the plaintiff and its Westerham subsidiary against Mr. Marks, Wiseoak Homes Ltd. and another individual who is not a party to the 1985 action. In June 1985 another individual and two other companies, none of whom is a party to the 1985 action, were joined to the 1984 action by amendment.

On 23 November 1984 Scott J. made an Anton Piller order in the 1984 action. It appears that at that date Mr. Marks was still technically an employee of the plaintiff, although he had handed in his resignation on 1 November and had left to join the second defendant.

The 1984 order was applied for because the plaintiff had discovered that planning applications had been made by the second defendant, using drawings which reproduced the plaintiff's own drawings for two of its house types called "Carrington" and "Linslade" and for which it claims copyright.

In paragraph 39 of an affidavit sworn on 11 December 1984, Mr. Marks agreed that the plans in question used the Carrington and Linslade designs of the plaintiff. He accepted that those plans were copied from the plaintiff's drawings, although he then made several points in mitigation.

The 1984 order, which was in a usual form, was executed at Mr. Marks' home and also at the second defendant's registered office. The plaintiff says that it was not aware that the second defendant had premises at any other location. The 1984 order was not restricted to the Carrington and Linslade designs. It extended to copies or originals of the plaintiff's documents relating to 59 house designs listed in an exhibited schedule and one further design.

The material provisions of the 1984 order were: (1) injunctions against—(a) making use of any of the relevant documents or the information derived therefrom, and (b) making planning applications which utilised drawings reproducing the designs of any of the 60 house types; (2) a power to search for and remove from Mr. Marks' home the relevant documents; (3) an order for the disclosure of the whereabouts of the relevant documents; (4) an order for delivery up within 24 hours of all relevant documents not already removed; (5) an order for the

A swearing of affidavits of compliance by or on behalf of the defendants, including Mr. Marks.

On 30 November 1984, in response to the 1984 order, Mr. Marks swore a short affidavit in which he said that he was not in possession of any of the documents or information required by that order.

B In paragraphs 40 and 41 of the much longer affidavit which he swore on 11 December 1984, Mr. Marks said that he no longer had in his possession any originals or copies of the Crest book of house designs or brochures of various Crest developments containing details of Crest house designs. In paragraphs 64 and 65 he said:

C "64. I wish to deal with the allegations made about Crest documents that I allegedly have in my possession. As I have already indicated, the documents exhibited at D.T.M.1. are the only Crest documents I have in my possession. 65. I do not have any details of the Linslade and Carrington House type. I have not taken any documents relating to the internal costing and profit margin information of Crest, as set out in paragraphs 44 and 48 of Mr. Czezowski's affidavit. Nor do I have my own copy of the Crest book of House Designs, or any copies thereof."

D The documents contained in exhibit D.T.M.1. were those which had been removed from Mr. Marks' home on the execution of the 1984 order.

E The plaintiff says that it appeared to it from this evidence, first, that nothing other than Carrington and Linslade designs had been copied and, secondly, that no other documents relating to those designs were then retained by the defendants. The 1984 action proceeded, they say, upon that basis.

F However, in October 1985 the plaintiff discovered that another type of house, bearing similarities to one of their own, was being advertised by the second defendant under the name "Larchvale." It inspected the relevant planning applications and concluded that the design was substantially copied from its own "Versailles" design. That design was not one of the 60 which were covered by the 1984 order. Furthermore, it was possible that all relevant infringements and misuses of confidential information had occurred after the issue of the writ in the 1984 action. It was for that reason, says the plaintiff, that a second action, the 1985 action, was started. An Anton Piller order was made in that action by Whitford J. on 25 November 1985. On this occasion it extended to G documents relating to 105 of the plaintiff's house designs, including all of the 60 which had been covered by the 1984 order. Subject to that, the order was in much the same form.

H The 1985 order was executed at the second defendant's trading premises. The plaintiff claims that a large number of infringing drawings were there discovered, many of which it says either ought to have been disclosed pursuant to the 1984 order, or were compelling evidence of breaches of the injunctions contained therein. In particular, the plaintiff contends that certain documents which relate to the Carrington and Linslade types (including a specification for the former) fall within the terms of the 1984 order and that the continued possession of them was contrary to the first defendant's statements in his 1984 affidavits already referred to.

In paragraph 3(a) of an affidavit sworn in the 1985 action on 17 December 1985, the first defendant said:

"each and every document taken away by the plaintiff's representative pursuant to the order was in my possession when my own home was searched pursuant to an Anton Piller order made in 1984 and they were all then (in 1984) inspected by officers of the court and representatives of the plaintiff and were left with me as being of no relevance. I did not destroy or conceal those documents believing that if I had, the plaintiff may have subsequently claimed a breach of the order or used such destruction or concealment as an indication of 'guilt' in that 1984 action. I therefore took all the documents, save as below, to my office at 166, Main Road, Sundridge, as aforesaid where they have since lain undisturbed with my 'dead' filing. I respectfully ask the plaintiff's representative who searched my office to confirm this precise location."

That then is the background to this case. The plaintiff wished to make use of the documents obtained on the execution of the 1985 order, and also the affidavits sworn in purported compliance therewith, for the purposes of the 1984 action in two respects: first, in the general conduct of that action; secondly, for the purpose of considering and, if so advised, taking proceedings for contempt of court in respect of breaches of the 1984 order. However, it was advised that it could not take that course without applying to the court.

The plaintiff's application came before Whitford J. on 28 February 1986, when it was refused in both respects. The matter has to some extent been overtaken by events, because on 25 June 1986 the master made an order by consent for the 1984 and 1985 actions to come on for trial at the same time; and a date has been obtained for the autumn of this year. Early yesterday morning, the second day of the hearing in this court, while Mr. Henderson was still opening the appeal on behalf of the plaintiff, an agreement was arrived at between the parties in regard to the first part of the plaintiff's application. It is now agreed that the plaintiff may make use of the documents and affidavits in question in the general conduct of the 1984 action. In the light of that agreement it appears entirely proper that leave should be given by the court accordingly. As to that agreement, I need say no more than that it appears to be entirely in accordance with common sense and the practicalities of the matter, especially now that the two actions are to be heard together. It would be quite impracticable either to prepare for, or to conduct, the trial on any other basis.

In the circumstances, it remains for us to decide whether the plaintiff can make use of the 1985 documents and affidavits for the purpose of considering and, if so advised, taking proceedings for contempt of court in respect of breaches of the 1984 order.

The first point to be made is that the 1985 order contained the usual undertaking on the part of the plaintiff's solicitors to retain in safe custody any documents obtained as a result of the order. However, it is not suggested that that undertaking raises any additional impediment to the plaintiff's objectives. In other words, if its objectives are otherwise unobjectionable, there will be no objection to that undertaking being modified to the necessary extent. The question is then seen to depend in the first instance on the applicability of the implied undertaking by the plaintiff and its solicitors that neither the originals nor copies of the documents will be used for any collateral or ulterior purpose. The continued existence and force of that undertaking has been authoritatively

Nourse L.J.

A reaffirmed by the House of Lords in Home Office v. Harman [1983] 1 A.C. 280. Here it is worth pointing out that the part of an Anton Piller order which requires the delivery up of documents and the swearing of affidavits of compliance is nothing more nor less than an order for early discovery.

B The first question which arises is whether the implied undertaking applies at all in the circumstances of this case. Mr. Henderson submits that it does not. I reject that submission. In my judgment the use of documents disclosed in one action for the purposes of another action will usually, perhaps invariably, be a collateral or ulterior purpose. That, I think, is the view which has consistently been taken in the previous authorities, even where the parties to both actions are identical: see Riddick v. Thames Board Mills Ltd. [1977] Q.B. 881. It is true that in C that case the cause of action in the second proceedings was quite different from that in the first, but it does not at all follow that the undertaking will not apply even where there is an absolute identity of parties and causes of action. That is a state of affairs which does not obtain in the present case and on which it is neither necessary nor desirable to express a view. Here it is enough to say that there is no identity in either respect. Moreover, I think that the court should err on D the side of maintaining the applicability of the undertaking unless it is clearly demonstrated that it can perform no useful function. I think that the judgment of Scott J. in Sybron Corporation v. Barclays Bank Plc. [1985] Ch. 299, where it was held that the undertaking applied to a case in which there was an identity of causes of action although not of parties, supports this approach.

E The next point to be made is that the implied undertaking, like any other undertaking, can be released or modified with the leave of the court. We were referred to a number of recent cases in which this course has been taken, of which I need only refer again to Sybron Corporation v. Barclays Bank Plc. and also to the recent decision of Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V.-C. in E.M.I. Records Ltd. v. Spillane [1986] 1 W.L.R. 967. Mr. Henderson has advanced a number of reasons
F for taking this course in the present case, including in particular the public interest in seeing that orders of the court are complied with. He also relies strongly on the fact that the purpose of the undertaking is to encourage full and frank discovery by giving a protection to those who make it. He says that there is enough material before the court in the present case, in particular the documents relating to the Carrington and G Linslade designs and the first defendant's evidence in relation thereto, to suggest the possibility that full and frank disclosure has not been made. Therefore, says Mr. Henderson, the first and second defendants do not deserve and are not entitled to the protection. He also relies on the facts that this is not a case where it is desired to communicate the documents to a third party, that the property in them or many of them is the plaintiff's, and that the 1985 action was only started as a separate action
H because the plaintiff was in part misled by the first defendant's evidence.

There can be no doubt that there is great force in Mr. Henderson's submissions and, as at present advised, I think that they would certainly have been conclusive in regard to the first part of the plaintiff's application had it been necessary for them to argue it. But what we have to consider is whether the undertaking should be modified for the purpose of proceedings for contempt of court. Here Mr. Hobbs, for the second and fourth defendants (whose arguments were adopted by Mr.

Dickens on behalf of the first defendant) has raised a powerful argument based on the privilege against self-incrimination. He says, correctly, that proceedings for contempt of court, albeit for a civil contempt, are in the nature of criminal proceedings. Then he says, also correctly, that the court would never make an order for discovery for the purpose, pure and simple, of enabling such proceedings to be brought. From there he goes on to say that the 1985 order was superfluous in so far as it covered the 60 house designs which had already been covered by the 1984 order. Accordingly, if the court were now to modify the undertaking, the manifest result, so far as concerned documents already discoverable under the 1984 order, for example the Carrington and Linslade documents, would be that the 1985 order had become one for discovery for the purpose, pure and simple, of enabling proceedings for contempt to be brought. Therefore, says Mr. Hobbs, the necessary leave should not, as a matter of discretion, be given.

Again, it seems to me that there is great force in Mr. Hobbs' submissions standing on their own. I am prepared to assume that they might well have prevailed, had it not been for section 72 of the Supreme Court Act 1981, which was enacted following the decision of the House of Lords in Rank Film Distributors Ltd. v. Video Information Centre [1982] A.C. 380. Section 72, to which the marginal note is "Withdrawal of privilege against incrimination of self or spouse in certain proceedings," provides:

"(1) In any proceedings to which this subsection applies a person shall not be excused, by reason that to do so would tend to expose that person, or his or her spouse, to proceedings for a related offence or for the recovery of a related penalty—(a) from answering any question put to that person in the first-mentioned proceedings; or (b) from complying with any order made in those proceedings. (2) Subsection (1) applies to the following civil proceedings in the High Court, namely—(a) proceedings for infringement of rights pertaining to any intellectual property or for passing off; (b) proceedings brought to obtain disclosure of information relating to any infringement of such rights or to any passing off; and (c) proceedings brought to prevent any apprehended infringement of such rights or any apprehended passing off. (3) Subject to subsection (4), no statement or admission made by a person—(a) in answering a question put to him in any proceedings to which subsection (1) applies; or (b) in complying with any order made in any such proceedings, shall, in proceedings for any related offence or for the recovery of any related penalty, be admissible in evidence against that person or (unless they married after the making of the statement or admission) against the spouse of that person. (4) Nothing in subsection (3) shall render any statement or admission made by a person as there mentioned inadmissible in evidence against that person in proceedings for perjury or contempt of court."

Subsection (5) is a definition provision which starts by defining the expression "intellectual property," to include any copyright. I read the next two definitions in full:

A infringement or passing off to which those proceedings relate; or (ii) any offence not within sub-paragraph (i) committed in connection with that infringement or passing off, being an offence involving fraud or dishonesty; (b) in the case of proceedings within subsection (2)(c), any offence revealed by the facts on which the plaintiff relies in those proceedings; 'related penalty,' in relation to any proceedings to which subsection (1) applies means—(a) in the case of proceedings within subsection (2)(a) or (b), any penalty incurred in respect of anything done or omitted in connection with the infringement or passing off to which those proceedings relate; (b) in the case of proceedings within subsection (2)(c), any penalty incurred in respect of any act or omission revealed by the facts on which the plaintiff relies in those proceedings."

C Although it requires some study to understand the effect of section 72, I think that once that has been done its effect for present purposes is clear. There can be no doubt that the 1984 and 1985 actions are civil proceedings within subsection (2)(a), and it appears that they are also within (b) and (c) as well. Mr. Henderson's first suggestion was that proceedings for contempt of the 1984 order would themselves fall within subsection (2) on the ground that they would be proceedings taken in proceedings of the kind there specified. I do not think that that can be right. Both on principle and on the true construction of subsections (2) and (4), it seems clear that proceedings for contempt are to be treated as separate proceedings. However, that does not invalidate Mr. Henderson's argument on section 72 as a whole, because when subsections (3) and (4) are read together it is clear that the withdrawal of the privilege which is effected by subsection (1) applies just as much to the proceedings mentioned in subsection (4) as it does to those mentioned in subsection (2).

E The argument has centred mainly on the effect of subsections (3) and (4). The general effect of subsection (3) is to make statements or admissions made in proceedings to which subsection (1) applies (i.e. those specified in subsection (2)) inadmissible in evidence against the maker of them in proceedings for any related offence or for the recovery of any related penalty. But then the effect of subsection (4) is to make such statements and admissions so admissible in proceedings for perjury or contempt of court based on such statements or admissions. Mr. Hobbs submits that the effect of subsection (4) is to preserve a discretion in the court as to whether the statements or admissions should be admitted in evidence. I do not think that that is correct as a matter of the construction of section 72. It seems clear from the double negative in subsection (4), when read with subsection (3), that the statements and admissions must be admitted. On the other hand, I would accede to Mr. Hobbs' alternative submission, which is that the provisions of section 72 cannot remove the discretion of the court as to whether the implied undertaking should be released or modified in the case to which the undertaking already applies. It is to that final question that I now turn.

H Mr. Henderson, while accepting that section 72 does not automatically conclude the point in the plaintiff's favour, nevertheless submits that its existence means that the court should usually exercise its discretion in favour of the necessary release or modification. I do not find it necessary to accept the proposition in that form, although it is impossible to ignore the fact that the clear purpose of the section was to withdraw the privilege against self-incrimination in intellectual property cases. It seems to me that, as with every discretion, each case must depend on its own facts. In the present case it becomes necessary to return to the reasons advanced by Mr. Henderson, as I have already recorded them. After considering those reasons and all the contrary arguments which have been put forward by Mr. Hobbs, I have come to a clear conclusion that this is a case where the plaintiff's application should succeed.

In general I accept the reasons advanced by Mr. Henderson, and it is I think unnecessary to consider them separately or in any greater detail. I will, however, record that it appears to me that the material on which he relies establishes that there is a question of contempt to be investigated. It is not appropriate to put it higher than that.

It seems clear that the case was not as fully argued before Whitford J. as it has been before us. I do not think that the effect of section 72 can have been fully explored. The judge seems to have been favourably disposed towards the application in regard to contempt proceedings, although he did not refer to section 72. He refused that part of the application on the ground that it was premature. He thought that the plaintiff ought first to institute its proceedings for contempt. However, I respectfully agree with Mr. Henderson that that would have been impracticable, if only because the notice of motion would have had to specify with particularity the alleged breaches of the 1984 order. That is something which the plaintiff and its advisers could not have done unless and until they had been able to make full use of the documents in respect of which this application is made.

For the reasons which I have given I would allow this appeal.

CROOM-JOHNSON L.J. I entirely agree and have nothing to add.

MAY L.J. I also agree that this appeal should be allowed for the reasons given by Nourse L.J. Although we are differing from the judge below, I do not think it necessary to add any further comments of my own.

A helicopter manufactured by a French company S., owned by an English company, and operated and serviced by a Malaysian company, crashed in Brunei. The deceased, who was a passenger, was killed. He and his family were resident in Brunei, and he was a successful businessman providing in particular catering services for oil rigs operating off Brunei. The plaintiffs, the deceased's widow and administrators of his estate, instituted proceedings in Brunei against the Malaysian company and S., in France against S., and in Texas against, inter alia, S. and its associated companies and the Malaysian company and its associates. The Texas court had jurisdiction over S. because S. carried on business there. The French proceedings against S. were discontinued, and the plaintiffs' claim against the Malaysian company was settled. S. and its associated companies applied to the Texas court for dismissal of the plaintiffs' action there on the ground of forum non conveniens, and although other issues were also raised the judge dismissed the application without giving reasons. The plaintiffs' Texas attorneys commenced pre-trial discovery and trial was eventually fixed for 1 July 1987 in Texas. Meanwhile S. applied to the High Court of Negara Brunei Darussalam for an order restraining the plaintiffs from continuing with the Texas proceedings. The application was dismissed and S. appealed. The plaintiffs gave undertakings that they would agree to trial by judge alone in Texas, and they accepted that on trial in Texas the law of Brunei was applicable as to liability and quantum so that no claim lay against S. on the basis of strict liability or for punitive damages. S. gave undertakings to protect the position of the plaintiffs and their Texas attorneys in Brunei, and to facilitate trial of the action there in autumn 1987. A contribution notice was served by S. on the Malaysian company, which intimated that it would submit to Brunei but not Texas jurisdiction, and that it would accept service of a third party notice issued by S. in Brunei. S. accepted service in Brunei of a writ issued by the owners and insurers of the helicopter. The Court of Appeal of Brunei Darussalam dismissed S.'s appeal against the refusal to grant an injunction holding that having regard to the work done by the plaintiffs' Texas attorneys Texas had become the appropriate and natural forum.

On appeal by S.:—

Held, allowing the appeal, (1) that in considering whether an injunction should be granted to restrain a plaintiff beginning or pursuing an action in another jurisdiction, the court did not proceed on the same principles as those applied when granting a stay of proceedings on the ground of forum non conveniens; that the authorities showed that an injunction would be granted where justice required that a plaintiff amenable to the jurisdiction of the court should be restrained from proceeding in a foreign jurisdiction; and that, although the question of whether the plaintiff's action was oppressive or vexacious was material in determining whether the interests of justice required the plaintiff to be restrained from proceeding in the foreign jurisdiction, the court had also to consider the injustice to the plaintiff if restricted to the natural forum for determining the dispute if that restriction would unjustly deprive him of advantages available in the foreign forum (post, pp. 70G, 73D–G, 74D–H).

(2) That Brunei not Texas was the natural forum for the trial of the plaintiffs' action against S. and the work already undertaken by the lawyers in the Texas proceedings was not sufficient to make that court the natural forum for the determination of the dispute; that it would be oppressive for the plaintiffs to continue the Texas proceedings because of the serious injustice to S. in not being able to claim in those proceedings indemnity or contribution from the Malaysian company for any liability S. might have to the plaintiffs; and that, since the undertakings entered into by S. were sufficient to ensure that any advantage to the plaintiffs in proceedings in Texas would be available in the proceedings in Brunei, no injustice would be caused to the plaintiffs by being restrained from proceeding in Texas and, accordingly, an injunction would be granted on terms set out in the undertakings (post, pp. 76F–77A, C, 80A–E).

APPEAL (No. 13 of 1987) with leave of the Court of Appeal of Brunei Darussalam by Société Nationale Aerospatiale (S.N.I.A.S.) from the judgment of the Court of Appeal of Brunei Darussalam (Briggs P., Kempster and O'Connor, Judicial Commissioners) given on 20 March 1987 dismissing an appeal by S.N.I.A.S. from the judgment of Mr. Commissioner Rhind in the High Court of Negara Brunei Darussalam at Bandar Seri Begawan on 22 December 1986, written reasons being delivered on 16 January 1987, whereby S.N.I.A.S.' application for an order that the plaintiffs, Lee Kui Jak and Yong Joon Kim (both suing as administrators of the estate of Yong Joon San, deceased, and Lee Kui Jak also suing in her personal capacity as widow of Yong Joon San) be restrained from further prosecuting the suit filed in the 61st Judicial District Court of Harris County, Texas, against S.N.I.A.S.

The facts are stated in the judgment of their Lordships.

Cur. adv. vult.

14 May. The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by LORD GOFF OF CHIEVELEY.

There is before their Lordships an appeal by the appellants, Société Nationale Industrielle Aerospatiale (whom their Lordships will refer to as "S.N.I.A.S."), from a judgment of the Court of Appeal of Brunei Darussalam delivered on 20 March 1987, in which the Court of Appeal dismissed an appeal from a decision of Mr. Commissioner Rhind (delivered orally on 22 December 1986 and in writing on 16 January 1987) declining to grant an injunction restraining the plaintiffs from continuing proceedings commenced by them in the 61st Judicial District Court of Harris County, Texas.

The matter has arisen as follows. On 16 December 1980 a Puma 330J helicopter crashed near Kuala Belait in Brunei. There were 12 people on board: all were killed. Among those killed was Yong Joon San.

D

Yong Joon San was a very successful businessman. His home was in Brunei, where he lived with his wife and children. His main business (carried on by him under the name of Yong Joon San General Contractor) was a business in his sole proprietorship concerned with providing catering services to oil rigs and other structures operating off Brunei. He also had a much smaller business in Malaysia called Yong & Co., which was likewise in his sole proprietorship. It appears from the evidence presently available that Yong Joon San was making a very substantial income from his business activities, and especially from his catering business in Brunei; and that in addition he was making substantial sums on the New York Stock Exchange. One estimate given of his income in the year before his death was over U.S.$1,800,000. It has also been stated that, by the time of his death, he had accumulated a fortune in the region of U.S.$20,000,000.

E

The Puma helicopter which crashed was manufactured by S.N.I.A.S. in France in 1978. S.N.I.A.S. is a French company in the ownership of the French state. The helicopter in question was owned by an English company, British and Commonwealth Shipping Co. (Aviation) Ltd. ("British and Commonwealth"); but it was at all material times operated and serviced by Bristow Helicopters Malaysia Sdn. Bhd. ("Bristow Malaysia"), an associated company of Bristow Helicopters Ltd. ("Bristow U.K."), and was under contract to Sarawak Shell Bhd. and so was based at Miri Airport in Sarawak. The Bristow companies are ultimately owned by British and Commonwealth.

F

The Brunei Government ordered an inquiry into the accident. The inquiry was conducted by the Brunei Chief Inspector of Accidents, Mr. J. M. Holden. His report was submitted to the Director of Civil Aviation of Brunei on 20 July 1982. The main conclusion of the report was as follows:

G

H

"the most likely cause of the accident was a planetary gear failure in the second stage of the two stage epicyclic main gear box reduction

3 W.L.R.

Société Aerospatiale v. Lee Kui Jak (P.C.)

A gear; the associated metal debris caused jamming within the rotating assemblies, generating forces which fractured the common epicyclic ring gear and the main gearbox casing. This resulted in a gross instability in the rotor system which caused blades to strike the fuselage."

It was further concluded:

B "The initial cause of the accident was due to the mistaken health monitoring of the gearbox leading to a deterioration of the mechanical condition of the gearbox components."

(Another possible cause was briefly mentioned, but their Lordships were informed that this is no longer regarded as a serious possibility and it can therefore be disregarded).

C The point about "mistaken health monitoring of the gearbox" is explained in the body of the report. The maintenance practices to be followed in the event of gearbox contamination are set out in the S.N.I.A.S. Maintenance Manual, which refers to nickel or carbon steel particles taken from the filter and magnetic plug, and lays down a procedure to be followed in the event of over 50 square millimetres of such particles being collected. As is pointed out in the report, this implies that debris from the filter and magnetic plug should be laid out and measured on a cumulative basis until the maximum allowable measured area (50 square millimetres) is reached; at that stage, the relevant component (either main gearbox or main rotor head) should be returned to the factory and a new component fitted. The report continues:

E "On 30 January 1980 instructions had been received at Miri from Bristow Helicopters Ltd. in the United Kingdom, following advice from Aerospatiale, that 'metal particles which are less than 50mm sq., i.e. 6 x 8mm are acceptable.' This was attempting to confirm the information contained in the Standard Practices Manual.

F "Despite the above clarification, all the engineers concerned with the maintenance of Puma 9M-SSC at Miri misinterpreted the maximum allowable area of particles of 50mm² (50 square millimetres) and in all cases it was understood to mean the area of a square with 50mm sides (2,500 square millimetres).

G "According to Bristow's Deputy Chief Engineer at Miri, the practices recommended in the Maintenance and Standard Practices Manuals were carried out but there is no written record of the daily measured or cumulative total area of particle debris obtained from the filter and the magnetic plug. However, the actual debris was retained and subsequently handed over to the investigators who assessed the total area as 1,580mm² (1,580 square millimetres) or over 30 times the maximum allowable area."

It was however later stated in the report:

H "although the Standard Practices Manual is categorical in stating that a gearbox which has produced more than 50mm² of metal should be removed and returned to the factory, the Miri engineers had some justification for thinking that this instruction was not to be taken too literally."

In paragraph 3 of the report headed "Conclusions," finding 2 is as follows:

"Gross contamination of the main gearbox magnetic plug and filter had occurred during the six weeks preceding the accident. The particles had undoubtedly originated from the second stage planet pinion bearing surfaces. Maintenance personnel had wrongly interpreted the amount of allowable debris as defined in the Aerospatiale Standard Practices Manual, due to the mistaken interpretation of an unfamiliar metric term."

And in paragraph 4, headed "Recommendations," the first recommendation is as follows:

"Any possibility of misinterpretation of the terms used in the Puma Standard Practices Manual, on the allowable areas of debris from the main gearbox, should be corrected."

Proceedings were started by Yong Joon San's widow, Lee Kui Jak, on her own behalf as widow and (with her husband's brother) as administrator of her husband's estate; they are the respondents to the present appeal. For convenience their Lordships will refer to them as "the plaintiffs." Three sets of proceedings were started, in December 1981, in Brunei, France, and Texas respectively. The Brunei proceedings were issued on 9 December 1981 against Bristow Malaysia as first defendants and S.N.I.A.S. as second defendants; they were served on S.N.I.A.S. in December 1982. It was alleged that Bristow Malaysia were solely responsible for the accident; as against S.N.I.A.S., allegations were made of negligent design and manufacture, but no particulars were given. The French proceedings were against S.N.I.A.S. alone. No further steps were taken in those proceedings, and they have been discontinued long ago. The Texas proceedings were also issued on 9 December 1981. Among the plaintiffs was a Richard J. Kittrell; it appears that he is a New York attorney who was appointed administrator for the purpose of the proceedings, and was as such simply a nominal plaintiff. There were eight defendants in the Texas proceedings, who fall into three groups: (1) S.N.I.A.S., together with two United States associates of S.N.I.A.S.—Aerospatiale Helicopter Corporation ("A.H.C."), a Texas corporation, and European Aerospace Corporation ("E.A.C."), a Delaware corporation. (2) Bristow Malaysia, together with two United States associated companies—Bristow Helicopters Inc., Connecticut corporation, and Bristow Offshore Helicopters Inc., a Texas corporation. (3) Sarawak Shell Bhd., together with Shell Oil Co., a Delaware corporation. The plaintiffs' claim against S.N.I.A.S. was advanced under the Texas Wrongful Death Statute (section 71.031 of the Texas Civil Practice and Remedies Code), which can apparently be invoked notwithstanding that the deceased had no connection with Texas and that the accident causing death occurred elsewhere, jurisdiction being asserted on the basis that S.N.I.A.S. were doing business in Texas by selling their products to purchasers in Texas, i.e. to their subsidiary A.H.C.. The lawyers responsible for launching the Texas proceedings were Messrs. Speiser, Krause and Madole of New York, a specialist firm of aviation lawyers, acting on the instructions of the plaintiffs' Brunei lawyer, Mr. Szetu. The reasons for launching them were subsequently stated by Mr. Szetu (in an affidavit dated 30 January 1984) to be (1) the more favourable Texas law on product liability, and (2) the higher level of damages awarded in courts in the United States. Shortly after the Texas proceedings were commenced, the Texas lawyers acting for

3 W.L.R.

Société Aerospatiale v. Lee Kui Jak (P.C.)

A S.N.I.A.S. attempted to have the case removed to the Federal Court; but in mid-1982 the Federal Court remitted the case back to the state court.

B In the course of 1983, an agreement was reached whereby all proceedings as between the plaintiffs on the one hand, and the Bristow companies and the Shell companies on the other hand, were settled. A general release was granted to these companies by the plaintiffs and by
C plaintiff Kittrell. The amount payable, and no doubt paid, to the plaintiffs under the settlement was U.S.$430,000; of this sum, U.S.$107,500 was to go to Messrs. Speiser, Krause and Madole, and Mr. Kittrell. The settlement, together with an apportionment between the widow and her three children, was approved by the Chief Registrar in Brunei on 20 June 1984. S.N.I.A.S. were not parties to the settlement, and their Lordships were told that they were never invited to be parties to it.

Meanwhile, it appears that little progress was being made in the Texas proceedings against S.N.I.A.S. and their associated companies. However in March 1985 the plaintiffs decided to instruct fresh attorneys in the United States, changing from Messrs. Speiser Krause and Madole of New York to a Mr. Mithoff and Mr. Jacks, members of two comparatively small firms which practise in Houston, Texas, and which specialise in personal injury claims. Thereafter, it seems that they proceeded to obtain discovery with a view to establishing jurisdiction over the three Aerospatiale defendants. However in February 1986 a vigilant computer drew the attention of the Texas court to the lack of progress in these proceedings, and the court of its own motion took the formal step of listing the case for dismissal for want of prosecution. On E 14 March 1986, the plaintiffs filed a motion to retain; and on 28 May 1986 the defendants filed a motion to dismiss on the ground of forum non conveniens. The court decided not to dismiss the action for want of prosecution, but fixed a trial date for 10 November 1986. Briefs were filed on the motion to dismiss on the ground of forum non conveniens. This motion was opposed by the plaintiffs on two grounds: (1) that F where a claim is made under the Texas Wrongful Death Statute, as a matter of construction the doctrine of forum non conveniens has no application; and (2) that, in the alternative, the court should in any event exercise its discretion to refuse the defendants' motion on the ground of forum non conveniens. On 14 August 1986, the Texas court refused the defendants' motion. In accordance with the practice of that
G court, no reasons were given for the decision; it is impossible therefore to know whether the decision was made on the first or the second ground advanced by the plaintiffs, nor, if the decision was made on the second ground, for what reasons it was held that the Texas court should not give effect to the doctrine of forum non conveniens. Furthermore, under the procedure of the Texas court, no appeal lay from this decision. An attempt was made to have the decision reviewed by H petitioning the Court of Appeals for a writ of mandamus; but this failed, the petition being dismissed on 2 October 1986. A further petition to the Texas Supreme Court was dismissed on 5 November 1986; and a petition for a rehearing was dismissed on 3 December 1986. By then, the defendants had exhausted their remedies in Texas. Meanwhile the plaintiffs' new Texas attorneys had turned their attention to the substantive issues in the case, taking depositions from a number of employees of A.H.C. in Texas. The trial date of 10 November 1986 was vacated as impracticable; and a new date was fixed for February 1987. That date, too, has since been vacated; the trial in Texas is at present fixed for 1 June 1987. Between December 1986 and March 1987, a number of depositions were taken by the plaintiffs' Texas attorneys in France from employees of S.N.I.A.S..

In December 1986, having failed in their attempts to obtain dismissal of the proceedings against them and their associated companies in Texas, S.N.I.A.S. turned their attention to the possibility of obtaining an injunction from the Brunei court restraining the plaintiffs from continuing the Texas proceedings. Having taken advice from English and Brunei solicitors, it was decided to make an immediate application because it transpired that a judge would be available until 23 December 1986 but that thereafter no judge would be available until late January 1987. Accordingly, the application was made to Mr. Commissioner Rhind on 20 December 1986; on 22 December, he refused to grant an injunction, giving his reasons in writing later, on 16 January 1987. It is now accepted on both sides that, due to the limited time available, the evidence laid before the commissioner was inadequate and, to some extent, misleading. Their Lordships trust that, in these circumstances, they will not be thought to be lacking in courtesy if they do not refer to his judgment.

S.N.I.A.S. then lodged a notice of appeal and, having regard to the urgency of the matter, a Court of Appeal was specially assembled to hear the appeal in March 1987. The hearing began on 10 March. Substantial further evidence was put in by both sides in the course of the hearing of the appeal: indeed it was common ground between the parties that the Court of Appeal should consider the matter de novo. An additional reason for taking this course was that a full report of the decision of the House of Lords in Spiliada Maritime Corporation v. Cansulex Ltd. [1986] 3 W.L.R. 972 was available to the Court of Appeal; no such report had been available to Mr. Commissioner Rhind. Furthermore, during the hearing undertakings were given by both sides, no doubt with a view to fortifying their respective positions. The plaintiffs first stated that, if S.N.I.A.S. wished for trial by judge alone in Texas, the plaintiffs would agree to such a trial. Second, they accepted that, the law of Brunei being applicable both as to liability and quantum in respect of the trial of the matter in Texas, no claim lay against S.N.I.A.S. either (a) in consequence of strict liability, or (b) for punitive damages. In their turn, S.N.I.A.S. gave a number of undertakings. These run to nearly three pages; the full text is appended to this opinion. The most important are the following:

"5. That the Texas proceedings shall be permitted to continue until completion of pre-trial discovery. (S.N.I.A.S.' position is that they are willing to undertake that they will procure A.H.C. to make any further documentary discovery of documents in the possession custody or power of A.H.C. which plaintiffs may require. S.N.I.A.S. are unwilling to accept further deposition-taking in Texas unless the court takes the view that no injunction will be granted in the absence of such undertaking).

3 W.L.R.

Société Aerospatiale v. Lee Kui Jak (P.C.)

- A "6. To agree to a trial date in September/October 1987 or as soon thereafter as may be convenient to the court and to cooperate in every way practicable to keep such date effective.
- "7. To cooperate in every practicable way in the admission to the Bar of Brunei Darussalam as ad hoc members for the purposes of this action of: William Thomas Jacks and Richard Warner Mithoff.
- B "8. To take all such steps as may be necessary to obtain all relevant consents for the use in this action of any documents obtained by discovery in the Texas action."

The undertakings of S.N.I.A.S. included in addition two alternative clauses regarding the payment of the costs of the plaintiffs' Texas attorneys.

- C In addition, there were certain developments regarding the position of Bristow Malaysia. In the course of the hearing before the Court of Appeal, a contribution notice was served on Bristow Malaysia by S.N.I.A.S.. It has been suggested that this was in fact too late, because Bristow Malaysia were no longer parties to the action. But this was disputed, and in any event Bristow Malaysia have indicated their readiness to accept service within the jurisdiction of the Brunei court of
- D any third party notice issued by S.N.I.A.S.. It appears that, whereas Bristow Malaysia are vigorously resisting Texas jurisdiction on the ground that they have never done business in Texas, they have indicated their readiness to submit to the jurisdiction of the courts in Brunei to enable the whole case to be determined there. On the same day, 18 March 1987, S.N.I.A.S. accepted service of a writ issued against them
- E on 16 December 1986 (one day before the expiry of the limitation period) by the owners of the crashed helicopter together with the insurers of the hull.

- Their Lordships now turn to the judgments of the Court of Appeal. The leading judgment was delivered by Mr. Commissioner Kempster. He referred first to the speech of Lord Scarman in Castanho v. Brown & Root (U.K.) Ltd. [1981] A.C. 557. In his speech, at p. 573, Lord
- F Scarman recognised that, in a case where a party seeks to enjoin another party from proceeding against him in another jurisdiction, such an injunction can be granted "where it is appropriate to avoid injustice." He then said, at p. 574:

- G "I turn to consider what criteria should govern the exercise of the court's discretion to impose a stay or grant an injunction. It is unnecessary now to examine the earlier case law. The principle is the same whether the remedy sought is a stay of English proceedings or a restraint upon foreign proceedings."

- Next, he referred, at p. 575, to a much quoted passage from Lord Diplock's speech in MacShannon v. Rockware Glass Ltd. [1978] A.C. 795, 812, concerning the circumstances in which a stay of proceedings
- H may be granted:

"In order to justify a stay two conditions must be satisfied, one positive and the other negative: (a) the defendant must satisfy the court that there is another forum to whose jurisdiction he is amenable in which justice can be done between the parties at substantially less inconvenience or expense, and (b) the stay must not deprive the plaintiff of a legitimate personal or juridical advantage which would be available to him if he invoked the jurisdiction of the English court.’”

“Transposed into the context of the present case, this formulation means that to justify the grant of an injunction the defendants must show: (a) that the English court is a forum to whose jurisdiction they are amenable in which justice can be done at substantially less inconvenience and expense, and (b) the injunction must not deprive the plaintiff of a legitimate personal or juridical advantage which would be available to him if he invoked the American jurisdiction.”

Mr. Commissioner Kempster then proceeded to apply the principle thus stated by Lord Scarman. He first considered a submission advanced by Mr. Hunter for S.N.I.A.S. that justice could be done in Brunei at substantially less expense to them because, if held liable to the plaintiffs, they intended to seek contribution or indemnity from Bristow Malaysia who were not amenable to the jurisdiction of the court in Texas, and one set of proceedings in Brunei involving the plaintiffs, S.N.I.A.S. and Bristow Malaysia would be less expensive than two sets of proceedings, one between the plaintiffs and S.N.I.A.S. in Texas and another between S.N.I.A.S. and Bristow Malaysia in Brunei. Mr. Commissioner Kempster declined to accept this submission. He considered that a “desperate flurry of procedural steps” had been “procured” by S.N.I.A.S. to support this argument. He said:

“The contribution point does not appear to have been argued before Mr. Commissioner Rhind, though the convenience of Brunei for Bristows was urged, and had only belatedly been mentioned in the course of the attempts to challenge the jurisdiction of the Texan courts. A party seeking a discretionary remedy must get his tackle in order and proceed with due expedition and Aerospatiale had no good reason to defer the service of a contribution notice on Bristows in Brunei particularly after receipt of a letter in April 1983 telling them of the settlement between the plaintiffs and Bristows. A fortiori after their objections to the Texan jurisdiction had to all intents and purposes failed in August 1986. Securing the promise of Bristows to submit to the jurisdiction after inquiry by this court as to the real state of play comes, in my view, too late to allow a real rather than a hypothetical possibility of proceedings both in Texas and Brunei (lis alibi pendens) to weigh in the balance.”

He then turned to consider “personal or juridical advantages” redounding to the advantage of the plaintiffs by continuing the suit in Texas. He recognised that the plaintiffs no longer maintained that they had the advantage of strict liability or the prospect of higher damages in Texas; though he considered that there was a prospect of an early hearing in Texas. He further referred to “substantial pre-trial discovery of documents and witnesses” which had taken place and continued to take place due to the industry of the Texan attorneys acting for the plaintiffs, and to the fact that these attorneys were familiar with the case. He concluded:

“In my opinion the prospects of an early trial and the availability of a skilled professional team, both in Texas, constitute personal and juridical advantages of which the plaintiffs should not lightly be deprived.”

Société Aerospatiale v. Lee Kui Jak (P.C.)

A On a submission by S.N.I.A.S. that the Brunei courts were better able to apply Brunei law on liability and quantum, he declined to query the competence of the Texas judiciary on these matters. Costs he regarded as a neutral factor; so also, in the light of S.N.I.A.S.' undertaking to open letters of credit to cover a possible award of damages and costs, did he regard the availability of assets to satisfy any judgment against S.N.I.A.S.. He took into account the other undertakings of S.N.I.A.S.. On this aspect of the case, he concluded:

B "It transpires that no witnesses relevant to liability are presently to be found in Brunei and only a few relevant to damages. That the helicopter crashed here rather than in Malaysia was fortuitous; the only real links with this country being the residence of the deceased and his family, the applicability of its law and the fact that a report on the accident was prepared here. Applying the principles enunciated by Lord Scarman in Castanho in the light of the foregoing conclusions and undertakings I am satisfied that Aerospatiale has failed to demonstrate that justice can be done in Brunei at substantially less inconvenience and expense than in Texas and, in so far as it is necessary so to determine, that the injunction sought would deprive the plaintiffs of legitimate personal and juridical advantages."

D Mr. Commissioner Kempster then turned to consider whether, and if so how, the principles outlined in Castanho v. Brown & Root (U.K.) Ltd. [1981] A.C. 557 had been affected by the subsequent decision of the House of Lords in Spiliada Maritime Corporation v. Cansulex Ltd. E [1986] 3 W.L.R. 972. He said:

F "It remains to consider whether and if so how the principles outlined in Castanho have been affected by the subsequent decision of the House of Lords in Spiliada when, as in the instant case, 'parties to a dispute have chosen to litigate in order to determine where they shall litigate.' Lord Goff's speech does not purport to deal with the grant or refusal of an injunction restraining the continuance of proceedings overseas but it does, I think, nonetheless require us to consider the application to the material facts of the 'forum non conveniens' doctrine. After all it would be inelegant and anomalous to say the least if similar principles did not fall for consideration in the three related types of application giving rise to the authoritative decisions already cited. Which then is the 'appropriate' or 'natural' forum in the sense that litigation there is the more likely to secure the ends of justice? If it is Brunei, the jurisdiction with which, in 1981, the dispute might have been thought more closely connected, it will be proper to consider the exercise of our discretion but if, for the reasons already given when seeking to apply the Castanho principles, it is or has since become, as I believe, Texas it will be wrong in principle to consider such exercise. Likewise if we were not satisfied that any forum was 'appropriate' or 'natural.' However the problem is approached I am satisfied that Mr. Commissioner Rhind was right in finding that Texas is presently the 'appropriate' and 'natural' forum and that Aerospatiale fail in their application. The relief sought is not necessary in the interests of justice. I would dismiss the appeal accordingly."

Mr. Commissioner O'Connor delivered a concurring judgment to the same effect. The President of the Court, Sir Geoffrey Briggs, agreed.

It is plain from their judgments that the Court of Appeal were concerned, and understandably concerned, about the relationship between the decisions of the House of Lords in Castanho's case [1981] A.C. 557 and Spiliada's case [1986] 3 W.L.R. 972. Since a proper identification of the applicable legal principles lies at the heart of the present case, their Lordships consider that their first duty is to identify those principles, giving due consideration to those two decisions. That they should undertake this task is, they consider, all the more necessary because certain observations of Lord Scarman in Castanho's case [1981] A.C. 557 are substantially founded on the much-quoted dictum of Lord Diplock in MacShannon v. Rockware Glass Ltd. [1978] A.C. 795, 812, which has to a considerable extent been overtaken by the subsequent development of the law in Spiliada's case [1986] 3 W.L.R. 972, 984-987, and 991-993. For this purpose, no material distinction is to be drawn between the law of Brunei and the law of England.

The law relating to injunctions restraining a party from commencing or pursuing legal proceedings in a foreign jurisdiction has a long history, stretching back at least as far as the early 19th century. From an early stage, certain basic principles emerged which are now beyond dispute. First, the jurisdiction is to be exercised when the "ends of justice" require it: see Bushby v. Munday (1821) 5 Madd. 297, 307, per Sir John Leach V.-C.); Carron Iron Co. v. Maclaren (1855) 5 H.L. Cas. 416, 453, per Lord St. Leonards (in a dissenting speech, the force of which was however recognised by Lord Brougham, at p. 459). This fundamental principle has been reasserted in recent years, notably by Lord Scarman in Castanho v. Brown & Root (U.K.) Ltd. [1981] A.C. 557 and by Lord Diplock in British Airways Board v. Laker Airways Ltd. [1985] A.C. 58, 81. Second, where the court decides to grant an injunction restraining proceedings in a foreign court, its order is directed not against the foreign court but against the parties so proceeding or threatening to proceed. As Sir John Leach V.-C. said in Bushby v. Munday, 5 Madd., 297, 307:

"If a defendant who is ordered by this court to discontinue a proceeding which he has commenced against the plaintiff, in some other Court of Justice, either in this country or abroad, thinks fit to disobey that order, and to prosecute such proceeding, this court does not pretend to any interference with the other court; it acts upon the defendant by punishment for his contempt in his disobedience to the order of the court; . . ."

There are, of course, many other statements in the cases to the same effect. Third, it follows that an injunction will only be issued restraining a party who is amenable to the jurisdiction of the court, against whom an injunction will be an effective remedy: see, e.g. In re North Carolina Estate Co. Ltd. (1889) 5 T.L.R. 328, per Chitty J. Fourth, it has been emphasised on many occasions that, since such an order indirectly affects the foreign court, the jurisdiction is one which must be exercised with caution: see e.g., Cohen v. Rothfield [1919] 1 K.B. 410, 413, per Scrutton L.J., and, in more recent times, Castanho v. Brown & Root (U.K.) Ltd. [1981] A.C. 557, 573, per Lord Scarman. All of this is, their Lordships think, uncontroversial; but it has to be recognised that it does

3 W.L.R.

Société Aerospatiale v. Lee Kui Jak (P.C.)

A not provide very much guidance to judges at first instance who have to decide whether or not to exercise the jurisdiction in any particular case.

B The decided cases, stretching back over a hundred years and more, provide however a useful source of experience from which guidance may be drawn. They show, moreover, judges seeking to apply the fundamental principles in certain categories of case, while at the same time never asserting that the jurisdiction is to be confined to those categories. Their Lordships were helpfully taken through many of the authorities by counsel in the present case. One such category of case arises where an estate is being administered in this country, or a petition in bankruptcy has been presented in this country, or winding up proceedings have been commenced here, and an injunction is granted to restrain a person from seeking, by foreign proceedings, to obtain the sole benefit of certain foreign assets. In such cases, it may be said that the purpose of the injunction is to protect the jurisdiction of the English court. Indeed, one of their Lordships has been inclined to think that such an idea generally underlies the jurisdiction to grant injunctions restraining the pursuit of foreign proceedings: see South Carolina Insurance Co. v. Assurantie Maatschappij "De Zeven Provinciën" N.V. [1987] A.C. 24, 45, per Lord Goff of Chieveley; but their Lordships are persuaded that this is too narrow a view. Another important category of case in which injunctions may be granted is where the plaintiff has commenced proceedings against the defendant in respect of the same subject matter both in this country and overseas, and the defendant has asked the English court to compel the plaintiff to elect in which country he shall alone proceed. In such cases, there is authority that the court will only restrain the plaintiff from pursuing the foreign proceedings if the pursuit of such proceedings is regarded as vexatious or oppressive: see McHenry v. Lewis (1882) 22 Ch.D. 397 and Peruvian Guano Co. v. Bockwoldt (1883) 23 Ch.D. 225. Since in these cases the court has been presented with a choice whether to restrain the foreign proceedings or to stay the English proceedings, we find in them the germ of the idea that the same test (i.e. whether the relevant proceedings are vexatious or oppressive) is applicable in both classes of case, an idea which was to bear fruit in the statement of principle by Scott L.J. in St. Pierre v. South American Stores (Gath & Chaves) Ltd. [1936] 1 K.B. 382, 398, in relation to staying proceedings in this country, a statement of principle now overlaid by the adoption in such cases of the Scottish principle of forum non conveniens, which has been gratefully incorporated into English law.

G The old principle that an injunction may be granted to restrain the pursuit of foreign proceedings on the grounds of vexation or oppression, though it should not be regarded as the only ground upon which the jurisdiction may be exercised, is of such importance, and of such apparent relevance in the present case, that it is desirable to examine it in a little detail. As with the basic principle of justice underlying the whole of this jurisdiction, it has been emphasised that the notions of vexation and oppression should not be restricted by definition. As H Bowen L.J. said in McHenry v. Lewis, 22 Ch.D. 397, 407–408:

"I agree that it would be most unwise, unless one was actually driven to do so for the purpose of deciding this case, to lay down any definition of what is vexatious or oppressive, or to draw a circle, so to speak, round this court unnecessarily, and to say that it will not move outside it. I would much rather rest on the general principle that the court can and will interfere whenever there is vexation and oppression to prevent the administration of justice being perverted for an unjust end. I would rather do that than attempt to define what vexation and oppression mean; they must vary with the circumstances of each case."

In Peruvian Guano Co. v. Bockwoldt (1883) 23 Ch.D. 225, 230, Jessel M.R. gave two examples of vexatious proceedings. One, which he called pure vexation, occurs when the proceedings are so utterly absurd that they cannot possibly succeed. Another occurs when the plaintiff, not intending to annoy or harass the defendant, but thinking he could get some fanciful advantage, sues him in two courts at the same time under the same jurisdiction. He went on to say that similar, although not perhaps the same, considerations apply in a case where the actions are brought, one in a foreign country and one in this country. Referring to McHenry v. Lewis, 22 Ch.D. 397, he summed up the position as follows: that it is not vexatious to bring an action in each country where there are substantial reasons of benefit to the plaintiff. Now, it is easy to see why in many cases this is so, as indeed the 19th century cases show. For example, there may be assets available for execution in a foreign country, or another party may only be amenable to the jurisdiction of the courts of the foreign country. Indeed, it has been stressed that there is no presumption that a multiplicity of proceedings is vexatious (see e.g. McHenry v. Lewis, 22 Ch.D. 397, 400 per Jessel M.R.) and that proceedings are not to be regarded as vexatious merely because they are brought in an inconvenient place: see Hyman v. Helm (1883) 24 Ch.D. 531, 537, per Brett M.R. But their Lordships, bearing in mind the words of caution expressed by Bowen L.J. in McHenry v. Lewis, 22 Ch.D. 397, 407-408, quoted above, think it wise to remember the breadth of the jurisdiction. In particular, the possibility must be borne in mind that foreign proceedings may be restrained not only where they are vexatious, in the sense of being frivolous or useless, but also where they are oppressive; and also that, as Bowen L.J. observed, everything depends on the circumstances of the particular case, and new circumstances have emerged which were not, perhaps, foreseen by our Victorian predecessors. Their Lordships refer, in particular, to the fact that litigants may now be encouraged to proceed in foreign jurisdictions, having no connection with the subject matter of the dispute, which exercise an exceptionally broad jurisdiction and which offer such great inducements, in particular greatly enhanced, even punitive, damages, that they may tempt litigants to pursue their remedies there. In normal circumstances, application of the now very widely recognised principle of forum non conveniens should ensure that the foreign court will itself, where appropriate, decline to exercise its own jurisdiction, especially as the existence of any particular advantage to the plaintiff in that jurisdiction (e.g. availability of assets for execution within the jurisdiction) can usually be protected, if thought appropriate, by granting a stay upon terms. But a stay may not be granted; and if, in particular, the English court concludes that it is the natural forum for the adjudication of the relevant dispute, and by proceeding in the foreign court the plaintiff is acting oppressively, the English court may, in the interests of justice, grant an injunction restraining the plaintiff from pursuing the proceedings in the foreign court. As Bowen L.J. said in Peruvian Guano Co. v. Bockwoldt, 23 Ch.D. 225, 233, the court will interfere when a party is acting under

3 W.L.R.

Société Aerospatiale v. Lee Kui Jak (P.C.)

A colour of asking for justice "in a way which necessarily involves injustice" to others.

Now, as already recorded, in Castanho v. Brown & Root (U.K.) Ltd. [1981] A.C. 557, Lord Scarman expressed the opinion that it was no longer necessary to examine the earlier case law. He said, at p. 574:

B "I turn to consider what criteria should govern the exercise of the court's discretion to impose a stay or grant an injunction. It is unnecessary now to examine the earlier case law. The principle is the same whether the remedy sought is a stay of English proceedings or a restraint upon foreign proceedings."

C He then, at p. 575, proceeded to refer to the much-quoted dictum from the speech of Lord Diplock in MacShannon v. Rockware Glass Ltd. [1978] A.C. 795, 812, and said, at p. 575:

D "Transposed into the context of the present case, this formulation means that to justify the grant of an injunction the defendants must show: (a) that the English court is a forum to whose jurisdiction they are amenable in which justice can be done at substantially less inconvenience or expense, and (b) the injunction must not deprive the plaintiff of a legitimate personal or juridical advantage which would be available to him if he invoked the American jurisdiction."

E Now it is to be observed, in the first place, that that approach has been overtaken by events in the form of the decision of the House of Lords in Spiliada Maritime Corporation v. Cansulex Ltd. [1986] 3 W.L.R. 972. If Lord Scarman's approach in Castanho's case were to be adapted to take account of the statement of principle expressed in Spiliada's case as applicable in cases of stay of proceedings, it would presumably read as follows. To justify the grant of an injunction, the defendant must show: (a) that the English court is the natural forum for the trial of the action, to whose jurisdiction the parties are amenable; and (b) that justice does not require that the action should nevertheless be allowed to proceed in the foreign court.

F In practice, however, the principle so stated would have the effect that, where the parties are in dispute on the point whether the action should proceed in an English or a foreign court, the English court would be prepared, not merely to decline to adjudicate by granting a stay of proceedings on the ground that the English court was forum non conveniens, but, if it concluded that England was the natural forum, to restrain a party from proceeding in the foreign court on that ground alone. Their Lordships cannot think that this is right. Not only does it conflict with the observation of Brett M.R. in Hyman v. Helm, 24 Ch.D. 531, 537, referred to above: but it leads to the conclusion that, in a case where there is simply a difference of view between the English court and the foreign court as to which is the natural forum, the English court can arrogate to itself, by the grant of an injunction, the power to resolve that dispute. Indeed, in a passage in his speech in British Airways Board v. Laker Airways Ltd. [1985] A.C. 58, 80, Lord Diplock appears to have been ready to give credence to this approach. But, with all respect, such a conclusion appears to their Lordships to be inconsistent with comity, and indeed to disregard the fundamental requirement that an injunction will only be granted where the ends of justice so require. Furthermore, if it were right, it would lead to the remarkable conclusion that, in a case such as MacShannon v. Rockware Glass Ltd. [1978] A.C.

795, the Scottish court, having concluded that Scotland was the natural forum for the trial of the action, might for that reason alone grant an interdict restraining the plaintiffs from proceeding in England. Their Lordships are fortified in their opinion by the fact that, upon examining a number of authorities from the United States (for the citation of which they are much indebted to counsel), a country where the principle of forum non conveniens is recognised as applicable in cases of stay of proceedings, and also authorities from the law of Scotland in which that principle has long been so applicable, they can find no trace of any suggestion that the principles applicable in cases of stay of proceedings and in cases of injunctions are the same. On the contrary, the principles applicable in those countries in cases of injunctions to restrain foreign proceedings bear a marked resemblance to those which have been applicable for many years in this country. Certainly, this has long been the law in Scotland: see, e.g. Young v. Barclay (1846) 8 Dunl. (Ct. of Sess.) 774, where an interdict was granted restraining the pursuit of proceedings overseas on the ground that they were oppressive. There are numerous cases in the United States to the like effect. It is enough for present purposes to refer to Moore's Federal Practice, 2nd ed. (1986), vol. 7, part 2, para. 65.19.

For all these reasons, their Lordships are of the opinion that the long line of English cases concerned with injunctions restraining foreign proceedings still provides useful guidance on the circumstances in which such injunctions may be granted; though of course the law on the subject is in a continuous state of development. They are further of the opinion that the fact that the Scottish principle of forum non conveniens has now been adopted in England and is applicable in cases of stay of proceedings provides no good reason for departing from those principles. They wish to observe that, in Spiliada Maritime Corporation v. Cansulex Ltd. [1986] 3 W.L.R. 972, care was taken to state the principle of forum non conveniens without reference to cases on injunctions: see especially, at p. 989, per Lord Goff of Chieveley. They cannot help but think that the suggestion in Castanho v. Brown & Root (U.K.) Ltd. [1981] A.C. 557, 574, that the principle is the same in cases of stay of proceedings and in cases of injunctions finds its origin in the fact that the argument of counsel before the House of Lords appears to have proceeded very substantially upon that assumption. In the opinion of their Lordships, in a case such as the present where a remedy for a particular wrong is available both in the English (or, as here, the Brunei) court and in a foreign court, the English or Brunei court will, generally speaking, only restrain the plaintiff from pursuing proceedings in the foreign court if such pursuit would be vexatious or oppressive. This presupposes that, as a general rule, the English or Brunei court must conclude that it provides the natural forum for the trial of the action; and further, since the court is concerned with the ends of justice, that account must be taken not only of injustice to the defendant if the plaintiff is allowed to pursue the foreign proceedings, but also of injustice to the plaintiff if he is not allowed to do so. So the court will not grant an injunction if, by doing so, it will deprive the plaintiff of advantages in the foreign forum of which it would be unjust to deprive him. Fortunately, however, as the present case shows, that problem can often be overcome by appropriate undertakings given by the defendant, or by granting an injunction upon appropriate terms; just as, in cases of stay of proceedings, the parallel problem of advantages to the plaintiff in the domestic forum which is,

3 W.L.R.

Société Aerospatiale v. Lee Kui Jak (P.C.)

A prima facie, inappropriate, can likewise often be solved by granting a stay upon terms.

It follows that, through no fault of theirs, the Court of Appeal did not proceed upon the correct principles in considering whether or not to grant an injunction in the present case. It is necessary therefore for their Lordships to consider de novo, upon the applicable principles as stated by them, whether the decision to refuse an injunction should stand.

B Now if a question (which their Lordships accept could only be hypothetical) had arisen shortly after the commencement of proceedings by the plaintiffs in Brunei whether those proceedings should be stayed on the ground that there existed another forum, i.e. Texas, which was clearly more appropriate for the trial of the action, there can be no doubt that such a question would have been answered unhesitatingly
C in the negative. Obviously, there were strong connecting factors with Brunei as a forum. The fatal accident had happened there. In a sense that was fortuitous; but it carried with it the consequence that the applicable law governing the claim was the law of Brunei. Moreover that was by no means insignificant in the circumstances because, as compared with the law of Texas, no question arises under the law of Brunei of strict product liability; no question arises under D the law of Brunei of punitive damages; and, perhaps most important of all, the problem does arise under the law of Brunei of an award of damages for the so called "lost years," a matter which, in the experience of some of their Lordships, has proved to be difficult enough even for those judges who have experience of it: see, in particular, Pickett v. British Rail Engineering Ltd. [1980] A.C. 136, and Harris v. Empress Motors Ltd. [1984] 1 W.L.R. 212. In addition,
E the deceased was resident in Brunei and carried on his principal business there; and the plaintiffs, his widow and her co-administrator, are likewise resident in Brunei. Again, having regard to the very substantial income of the deceased, and the volatile nature of the oil industry upon which his business depended, it is plain that witnesses of fact, experienced in the conditions of that industry in Brunei, are likely to be called on the issue of quantum. As against these factors,
F there was absolutely nothing to connect the action with Texas at all.

Yet the Court of Appeal, like Mr. Commissioner Rhind, concluded that, by the time the matter came before them, Texas has become the natural forum for the trial of the action. In order to test that proposition it is necessary to examine what had happened to bring about, in their opinion, that change.

G It is primarily on the basis of the steps taken by the plaintiffs' Texas attorneys, in late 1986 and early 1987, that the Court of Appeal considered that the natural forum for the trial of the action had become Texas. In reaching that conclusion, they decided to disregard the question of proceedings by S.N.I.A.S. against Bristow Malaysia; as to that they were, in the opinion of their Lordships, in error, for reasons
H which will appear later. But they placed particular reliance on the work done in Texas by the plaintiffs' new Texas attorneys. In placing reliance on this factor, there is no doubt that they were influenced by the importance attached by the trial judge in Spiliada Maritime Corporation v. Cansulex Ltd. [1986] 3 W.L.R. 972 to the so-called "Cambridgeshire factor," a matter which was also recognised as relevant by the House of Lords: see p. 994-995, per Lord Goff of Chieveley. But, with all respect, the two cases are poles apart. In Spiliada's case the question at issue was the effect of wet sulphur upon the holds of ships. This question was of profound importance, not only to the shipping industry, but to the whole sulphur exporting industry in British Columbia. The first case in which the question was investigated in depth was concerned with a ship called the Cambridgeshire, and was plainly recognised as in the nature of a test case. Armies of lawyers and experts were engaged. An enormous amount of preparatory work was undertaken; the documentation was voluminous in the extreme. The scientific investigation was of a most fundamental kind, and indeed approached the limits of scientific knowledge. The trial of the Cambridgeshire action was begun and had proceeded for about a month when the application was made for a stay of proceedings in Spiliada's case, a parallel case raising the same profound scientific questions as those which had arisen in the Cambridgeshire. The application came on for hearing before Staughton J., the trial judge in the Cambridgeshire action. In these somewhat unusual circumstances, it is scarcely surprising that he regarded the building up of expertise and understanding among the teams of lawyers and experts in England as being a relevant factor to be taken into account when deciding whether or not to order a stay of the English proceedings in Spiliada's case; this view was shared by the House of Lords, where it was pointed out that, in addition, the parties in both actions were substantially the same—Cansulex Ltd. being defendants in both actions, and the plaintiff shipowners in both actions being insured by the same P. and I. club who were financing and controlling both sets of proceedings, and instructing the same lawyers in both.

Now compare that case with the present. Here there are no previous proceedings in Texas involving substantially the same parties. Here the issues do not begin to approach in complexity those involved in the Cambridgeshire and the Spiliada. Their Lordships do not wish for one moment to belittle the expertise or competence of Mr. Mithoff or Mr. Jacks; but the engineering issues which arise in the present case do not appear to be, in degree, of greater complexity than those which many lawyers, in England and in the United States, are very competent to deal with and can very readily assimilate. What has happened is simply that, during and after the period when S.N.I.A.S. was seeking to obtain dismissal of the Texas proceedings on the ground of forum non conveniens, the plaintiffs' Texas lawyers were, in accordance with the procedure in the United States (as to which their Lordships make no criticism) seeking, by means of the generous United States procedure of pre-trial oral discovery, evidence upon which they could found a case of negligence against S.N.I.A.S.. The extent of their success in this activity will no doubt be judged at the trial of the action. The nature of the case which they wish to advance against S.N.I.A.S. has now been made known and, although of course contested by them, is recognised by S.N.I.A.S. to be arguable. But their Lordships do not consider that the fact that the Texas lawyers have been so engaged during the period in question can possibly have the effect of now rendering Texas the natural forum for the trial of the action instead of Brunei. In truth, the matters relied upon by the plaintiffs (viz. superior means of gathering evidence to mount a case against S.N.I.A.S.; availability of expert counsel; the contingency fee system; prospects of an early trial) are not so much connecting factors with Texas which now render Texas the natural forum as advantages available to the plaintiffs in Texas of which, they submit, it would be unjust to deprive them. In any event, these points

Société Aerospatiale v. Lee Kui Jak (P.C.)

A have effectively been neutralised by undertakings given on behalf of S.N.I.A.S. that such evidence as has been obtained by Mr. Mithoff and Mr. Jacks will be available in the Brunei proceedings, that every effort will be made by S.N.I.A.S. to enable Mr. Mithoff and Mr. Jacks to have rights of audience in Brunei, and that they will cooperate in obtaining an early trial date there. No doubt both American attorneys
B would feel more at home in the courts in Texas; but that cannot be a matter of any relevance, especially as, in a case involving a claim assessed by the plaintiffs at many millions of dollars, they may well wish to instruct leading counsel from England, a course which they have indeed already taken in the injunction proceedings in Brunei and, of course, before their Lordships.

C It follows that, in their Lordships' opinion, the Court of Appeal, in concluding that Texas had replaced Brunei as the natural forum, took into account matters which they ought not to have taken into account. In the opinion of their Lordships, for reasons which are already apparent, the natural forum for the trial of the action remains, as it always has been, the courts of Brunei.

D It is against that background that their Lordships have to consider the crucial question, which is whether in the circumstances of this case an injunction should be granted to restrain the plaintiffs from further proceeding in Texas. The mere fact that the courts of Brunei provide the natural forum for the action is, for reasons already given, not enough of itself to justify the grant of an injunction. An injunction will only be granted to prevent injustice, and, in the context of a case such as the present, that means that the Texas proceedings must be shown in E the circumstances to be vexatious or oppressive.

Now it can no longer be suggested that the Texas proceedings are vexatious or oppressive on the ground that the plaintiffs are seeking, in an inappropriate forum, to impose a strict liability or liability for punitive damages which would not be available in the natural forum. These points have been effectively neutralised by the plaintiffs' undertaking that neither of them will be pursued, and by their further
F undertaking that they will not invoke jury trial which, coupled with the effect of the contingency fee system, might lead to a substantial enhancement of an award of damages. These points have therefore ceased to have such relevance as they might otherwise have had. There remains however a matter to which their Lordships attach great importance; and that is the question of a claim by S.N.I.A.S. over G against Bristow Malaysia.

As to that, the position is as follows. First, it is plain that the American lawyers first instructed by the plaintiffs regarded Bristow Malaysia as the plaintiffs' prime target. This is scarcely surprising in the light of the conclusions contained in the report submitted to the Brunei Department of Civil Aviation by Mr. Holden; and it is evidenced by the fact that, in the settlement of 1984, the plaintiffs did not invite H S.N.I.A.S. to contribute to that settlement, or indeed to be party to it. It was not until Mr. Mithoff and Mr. Jacks were instructed, some time after that settlement, that any serious effort was made to pursue the proceedings against S.N.I.A.S.. In these circumstances, it seems to their Lordships inevitable that, if the proceedings are brought to trial, S.N.I.A.S. will wish to seek contribution from Bristow Malaysia, rather than expose themselves to the possibility of being held wholly to blame for an accident for which, if they are responsible at all, their responsibility may prove to be relatively small as compared with that of Bristow Malaysia; and the necessity for their so proceeding is underlined by the fact that the claim now made by the plaintiffs amounts to well over U.S.$20,000,000, and the amount of the settlement between the plaintiffs and the Bristow and Shell companies, which would no doubt have to be taken into account in reduction of the plaintiffs' damages, amounts to no more than U.S.$430,000. In addition, S.N.I.A.S., having been served with proceedings in Brunei by the owners and insurers of the hull of the helicopter, wish to claim contribution or indemnity from Bristow Malaysia in respect of that claim.

The Court of Appeal did not regard the expressed desire of S.N.I.A.S. to seek contribution from Bristow Malaysia as sincere. They were impressed by the number of procedural steps taken shortly before the hearing before them: these, they considered, had been "procured" by S.N.I.A.S., and were "hardly suggestive of a long-held or sincere concern." Their Lordships do not however consider that the Court of Appeal were justified in so regarding them. There was no evidence before the court that the steps taken by Bristow Malaysia were "procured" by S.N.I.A.S.. True it is that the steps so taken were taken very late in the day; but having regard to the obvious desirability, in the interests of S.N.I.A.S., that it should be open to them to claim over against Bristow Malaysia in the Brunei proceedings, their Lordships do not consider that the mere lateness of those steps is productive of the inference drawn by the Court of Appeal, especially when it is borne in mind that, until December 1986, the attention of S.N.I.A.S. and their advisers was concentrated upon the Texas proceedings. Their Lordships do not doubt that the intention of S.N.I.A.S. in claiming over against Bristow Malaysia is sincere and, indeed, of great importance to them.

So their Lordships are faced with the following situation. Bristow Malaysia are contesting the jurisdiction of the Texas court; and there is nothing before their Lordships to suggest that the grounds upon which they are contesting that jurisdiction are other than substantial. On the other hand, Bristow Malaysia are prepared to accept service of third party proceedings in Brunei served upon them by S.N.I.A.S.. It follows that, if the plaintiffs are permitted to proceed with the Texas proceedings, on the evidence before their Lordships it is at least possible that Bristow Malaysia will not be party to those proceedings, with the effect that S.N.I.A.S., if held liable in Texas, will have to commence separate proceedings, presumably in Brunei, in order to seek an indemnity or contribution from Bristow Malaysia. This itself would involve multiplicity of proceedings. There are however two additional factors. First, Bristow Malaysia have already entered into a settlement with the plaintiffs, to which settlement S.N.I.A.S. are not party. If S.N.I.A.S. seek contribution or indemnity from Bristow Malaysia, Bristow Malaysia may wish to invoke that settlement as against the plaintiffs. Their Lordships do not wish to pre-empt any arguments which may be founded upon the settlement by Bristow Malaysia; but it is obviously desirable that, if Bristow Malaysia do take any such point, they should be able to do so in proceedings in which all three parties, the plaintiffs, S.N.I.A.S. and Bristow Malaysia, are involved.

The second complicating factor is of even greater importance. In seeking contribution from Bristow Malaysia, S.N.I.A.S. will have to invoke the relevant Brunei legislation which, their Lordships were

3 W.L.R.

Société Aerospatiale v. Lee Kui Jak (P.C.)

A informed, is in the same terms as section 6 of the English Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act 1935. Section 6(1)(c) provides:

“(1) Where damage is suffered by any person as a result of a tort (whether a crime or not)—. . . (c) any tortfeasor liable in respect of that damage may recover contribution from any other tortfeasor who is, or would if sued have been, liable in respect of the same damage, whether as a joint tortfeasor or otherwise . . .”

B Now, let it be supposed that the proceedings in Texas against S.N.I.A.S. are allowed to continue to proceed, and that in those proceedings S.N.I.A.S. are held liable to the plaintiffs. Then let it be further supposed that S.N.I.A.S. claim contribution or indemnity from Bristow Malaysia in Brunei, relying upon a judgment of the Texas court as showing that they, S.N.I.A.S., were liable in respect of the relevant damage. Would that judgment provide conclusive evidence that S.N.I.A.S. were so liable? Or would S.N.I.A.S. have to satisfy the Brunei court, independently of that evidence, that they were in law liable for such damage? If the latter were the case, S.N.I.A.S. would be exposed to two sets of proceedings in which the same issue of liability would have to be tried, and so would be exposed to the danger of inconsistent conclusions on that issue, with the conceivable result that they might be held liable to the plaintiffs in Texas without any right over against Bristow Malaysia in that court, and might be held not liable to the plaintiffs in Brunei, in which event they would have no claim over against Bristow Malaysia, even though negligence on the part of Bristow Malaysia may in fact have been a substantial cause of the accident.

E The point has arisen in Scots law in the recent House of Lords case of Comex Houlder Diving Ltd. v. Colne Fishing Co. Ltd. (unreported), 19 March 1987. In Scotland, the applicable statutory provision is section 3 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1940, which is not in identical terms to section 6 of the English Act of 1934. The right of contribution there arises, under section 3(2), “Where any person has paid any damages or expenses in which he has been found liable in any such action as aforesaid . . .” the words “any such action as aforesaid” refer back to the words in section 3(1):

“any action of damages in respect of loss or damage arising from any wrongful acts or negligent acts or omissions” in which “two or more persons are, in pursuance of the verdict of a jury or the judgment of a court found jointly and severally liable in damages or expenses. . . .”

G The House of Lords held that the words “any such action as aforesaid” in section 3(2), read in context, and in particular with reference to the words quoted from section 3(1), applied only to an action in the Scottish courts. It does not, of course, follow that a similar construction would be placed on different words in section 6 of the English Act of 1934, as applied in Brunei. But there is a danger that such a construction might be placed upon them, as is evidenced by the fact that, in Clerk & Lindsell on Torts, 15th ed. (1982), pp. 144–145, the view is expressed, with regard to section 1 of the Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1978, which likewise refers to “any person liable in respect of any damage suffered by another person,” that “a foreign judgment, it seems, gives no right to seek contribution from others liable in respect of the same damage.” This is a point which it is impossible for their Lordships to resolve on an interlocutory application such as the present; but in all the circumstances their Lordships do not consider that it can be dismissed as being without substance.

So S.N.I.A.S. are now, it appears, in the unenviable position that, if the plaintiffs are not restrained from continuing their proceedings in Texas, S.N.I.A.S. may well be unable to claim over against Bristow Malaysia in those proceedings; and that, if held liable to the plaintiffs in the Texas court, they may have to bring a separate action in Brunei against Bristow Malaysia in which they may have to establish their own liability to the plaintiffs before they can be entitled to claim contribution from Bristow Malaysia, with all the attendant difficulties which this would involve, including the possibility of inconsistent conclusions on the issue of liability.

Their Lordships are of the opinion that for the plaintiffs to be permitted to proceed in a forum, Texas, other than the natural forum, Brunei, with that consequence, could indeed lead to serious injustice to S.N.I.A.S., and that the plaintiffs' conduct in continuing with their proceedings in Texas in these circumstances should properly be described as oppressive. Furthermore, no objection to the grant of an injunction to restrain the plaintiffs from continuing with these proceedings can be made by them on the basis of injustice to them, having regard to the undertakings given by S.N.I.A.S.. It follows that, in their Lordships' opinion, an injunction should be granted.

For these reasons their Lordships are of the opinion that the appeal should be allowed, and that an injunction ought to be granted restraining the plaintiffs from further proceeding with their action against S.N.I.A.S. in the Texas court, either by themselves or by any other person on their behalf, such an injunction to be granted upon terms. As at present advised, their Lordships consider that such terms should be those contained in the following undertakings of S.N.I.A.S. set out in the appendix to this opinion, viz. 1; 2 (omitting the final parenthesis); 3; 4; 5 (omitting the final parenthesis); 6; 7; 8; 9B (substituting "20 March 1987" for "today's date" in both places where these words appear, and omitting the final parenthesis); and 12. Their Lordships wish to comment that, although the first of the letters of credit referred to in paragraph 1 of the undertakings is in a sum considerably less than that stated to be the amount of the plaintiffs' claim, nevertheless they were informed that the sum specified in the letter of credit was regarded by the plaintiffs' advisers as realistic; and further that they are prepared to allow the plaintiffs to continue the Texas proceedings until completion of pre-trial discovery simply because such discovery has already gone so far, and the trial in Brunei is likely to take place so soon, that it appears in any event to be unrealistic not to allow such discovery to be completed. If either party has any objection to the terms proposed by their Lordships, any such objection must be notified to their Lordships within 14 days, in which event their Lordships will give consideration to it; failing any such objection within such a period, the terms proposed by their Lordships will become final. So far as costs are concerned, the plaintiffs must pay the costs of S.N.I.A.S. before their Lordships and before the Court of Appeal. As regards the hearing before Mr. Commissioner Rhind, however, since it is apparent that neither party was fully prepared for that hearing, and that some misleading evidence was placed before the commissioner, their Lordships consider that each party should bear their own costs. Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty accordingly.

Appendix

Undertakings by S.N.I.A.S.

1. To provide the plaintiffs within 28 days with two irrevocable letters of credit drawn in their favour and confirmed by a first class bank within Brunei in the terms annexed hereto (Annexure A).
- B 2. Within 28 days to provide the plaintiffs' attorneys (Law Offices of Richard Warner Mithoff referred to herein as the attorneys) with the documents set out in the schedule hereto (Annexure B) in accordance with the agreement between Winstol D. Carter and Tommy Jacks referred to in paragraph [sic.] of the affidavit of Tommy Jacks. (S.N.I.A.S. say this is subject to confirmation from Carter of Fulbrights that such agreement exists with Jacks. No difficulty anticipated in this respect).
- C 3. In addition to the documents set out in Annexure B, to produce as discovery by list within 21 days all documents relevant to the matters in question between the parties in accordance with the Brunei Rules of Court save where already disclosed. Inspection to be within 14 days thereafter. All copies requested by the plaintiffs to be supplied within 14 days of such request. Plaintiffs to pay all reasonable copying charges.
- D 4. If and in so far as any representations are necessary to the French Ministry of Justice or any other authority to obtain permission for any act referred to herein, to make all such representations vigorously and with minimum delay and to inform the plaintiffs' attorneys upon their requests of the steps so taken.
- E 5. That the Texas proceedings shall be permitted to continue until completion of pre-trial discovery. (S.N.I.A.S.' position is that they are willing to undertake that they will procure A.H.C. to make any further documentary discovery of documents in the possession custody or power of A.H.C. which plaintiffs may require. S.N.I.A.S. are unwilling to accept further deposition-taking in Texas unless the court takes the view that no injunction will be granted in the absence of such undertaking).
6. To agree to a trial date in September/October 1987 or as soon thereafter as may be convenient to the court and to cooperate in every way practicable to keep such date effective.
7. To cooperate in every practicable way in the admission to the Bar of Brunei Darussalam as ad hoc members for the purposes of this action of: William Thomas Jacks and Richard Warner Mithoff.
- F 8. To take all such steps as may be necessary to obtain all relevant consents for the use in this action of any documents obtained by discovery in the Texas action.
- 9.A. Plaintiffs' proposed clause
To pay all reasonable costs of the firms Law Offices of Richard Warner Mithoff and Doggets, Jacks, Marston & Perlmutter, P.C (the two firms) relating to the Texas action and the Brunei action (in this appeal). Thereafter to accept as costs in the cause all costs reasonably incurred by the two firms in connection with Brunei action, it being understood that the two firms will have the main responsibility for the preparation and carriage of that action.
- G B. S.N.I.A.S.' proposed clause
To treat all reasonable costs of the firms Law Offices of Richard Warner Mithoff and Doggets, Jacks, Marston & Perlmutter, P.C (the two firms) relating to the substantive issues (but not the jurisdiction issues) incurred in the Texas action up to today's date as costs in cause in the Brunei action. In relation to costs incurred by the two firms after today's date, to treat all costs reasonably so incurred in connection with the Brunei action (other than any appeal by the plaintiffs from the decision of the Brunei Court of Appeal) as costs in cause in the Brunei action, it being understood that the two firms will have the main responsibility for the preparation and carriage of the Brunei action.
- H (Plaintiffs seek clause A. S.N.I.A.S. are prepared to agree to clause B, but if the court were to take the view that acceptance of clause A by S.N.I.A.S. were a condition precedent to the grant of the injunction they seek, they would agree to give an undertaking in the form contained in clause A).

10. There shall be liberty to apply to the High Court.

11. S.N.I.A.S. to seek leave forthwith to issue a third party notice and assuming such leave to be given, to serve a third party statement of claim on Bristow Malaysia within seven days hereof. Application for third party directions to be made immediately following service of third party statement of claim.

12. All prior agreements made by S.N.I.A.S.' Texas lawyers regarding authentication of documents or supplying information, to be filled in blank spaces left in the oral depositions to remain in effect.

13. S.N.I.A.S. will join in any application to the Brunei courts for the initiation of any procedures available in Brunei for obtaining the foregoing oral evidence before trial in France. (S.N.I.A.S. does not agree to this but will do so if the court directs that such undertaking ought to be given by S.N.I.A.S. if an injunction is granted).

Trusts—Trustee—Duty of trustee—Trustee of Hong Kong will holding property on trust for sale for trustee of American will—Hong Kong trustee postponing sale on instructions of American trustee—Whether breach of trust by Hong Kong trustee—Whether beneficiaries under American will having right of action against Hong Kong trustee

The testator appointed the first defendant executor and trustee of his American will which applied to all his American estate and all property which thereafter should become added to it. The plaintiffs, who were the testator's sons, and a charity were the beneficiaries under that will. By clause 10 the testator directed that if at the time of his death he owned a residence in Hong Kong and his brother or sister or both survived him, the first defendant "shall have no responsibility or duty with respect to such property . . . and my executor's and trustee's only duty and responsibility with respect thereto shall arise upon its receipt of the proceeds of said residence or upon the death of the survivor of my said brother and my said sister, whichever shall first occur . . ."

H

The testator appointed the second defendant executor and trustee of his Hong Kong will, by which the residue of his property outside the United States was to be held on trust for sale, with power to postpone sale, for the first defendant to be held upon the trusts of the American will. When the testator died his elderly brother and sister were living in his house in Hong Kong, and they continued to reside there rent free. In June 1981 the plaintiffs instructed the second defendant to sell the house, but in the interests of the testator's brother and sister, who were not beneficiaries under either will, the first defendant directed the second defendant not to sell the house although that was not in the interests of the beneficiaries of the American estate. Sale was postponed and the value of the house fell. The plaintiffs instituted proceedings claiming, inter alia, damages against the second defendant for breach of trust in delaying the sale of the house after June 1981. The judge awarded damages and the house was sold in 1985. On appeal by the second defendant the Court of Appeal of Hong Kong set aside that award and dismissed the plaintiffs' action.

On the plaintiffs' appeal to the Judicial Committee:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that by the terms of the Hong Kong will the second defendant held the house on trust for the first defendant and not the beneficiaries interested under the American will, so that the second defendant was under a duty to exercise its powers to sell or postpone sale pursuant to the lawful instructions of the first defendant; that clause 10 of the American will absolved the first defendant from any duty to the beneficiaries with regard to the house thus enabling the first defendant to disregard the interests of the beneficiaries and direct the second defendant to postpone sale in the interests of the testator's brother and sister, and in so doing the first defendant committed no breach of the trusts of the American will; and that, therefore, since the first defendant had properly carried out its duties in relation to the house as trustee of the American will, there were no special circumstances entitling the plaintiffs to bring proceedings directly against the second defendant, but that in any event no breach of the trusts of the Hong Kong will had been committed by the second defendant in implementing the lawful instructions of the first defendant, and the plaintiffs' action had properly been dismissed (post, pp. 87D-E, 88A, G-89B, 90D-E, 91C, D, 92G-H).

APPEAL (No. 17 of 1986) with leave of the Court of Appeal of Hong Kong by the plaintiffs, Joseph Hayim Hayim and George Isaac Hayim, from the judgment of the Court of Appeal of Hong Kong (Huggins V.-P., Cons and Fuad JJ.A.) given on 26 July 1985 allowing an appeal by the second defendant, Hong Kong Bank Trustee Ltd., from the judgment of Deputy Judge Barnett given in the High Court of Hong Kong on 16 January 1985. The Court of Appeal of Hong Kong dismissed the claims of the plaintiffs against the second defendants. The first defendant, Citibank N.A., took no part in the proceedings. The deputy judge had ordered that the property known as 41, Island Road, Deep Water Bay, Hong Kong, being property held by the second defendant as trustee of the Hong Kong will of Ellis Joseph Hayim deceased upon trust for sale, be sold by the second defendant; that inquiries should be made as to the date after 25 June 1981 by which the house should have been sold by the second defendant and the net loss (if any) of capital and income occasioned to the testator's estate by reason of the second defendant's failure to sell the house by that date; and that the second defendant should pay to the first defendant as trustee of the testator's American will upon trust for the second plaintiff half of that loss of income and for such persons as might be interested in the first plaintiff's interest and rights in the trusts under the American will half the loss of income up to his

5 May. The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by LORD TEMPLEMAN.

D In the year 1959 the testator, Ellis Joseph Hayim, purchased a house for his residence at 41, Island Road, Deep Water Bay, Hong Kong. The testator had two sons the plaintiffs, Joseph Hayim Hayim and George Isaac Hayim, who were then about 40 years of age. The Hong Kong house was occupied by the testator, his wife who died in 1966, his mother who also died in 1966, his brother Albert, his sister Maisie and Maisie's husband Reubin David Abraham who died in 1970. By his American will dated 13 July 1972 the testator disposed of his American estate defined as all his property in the United States of America and:

"all property which, pursuant to any inter vivos or any other testamentary disposition, shall at any time be added to and become a part of my American estate."

F The testator appointed the first defendant, Citibank N.A., to be the executor and trustee of his American will and directed the first defendant to divide the residue of his American estate into two equal moieties, one to be held upon protective trusts for the benefit of his son Joseph during his life and the other upon protective trusts for the benefit of his son George during his life. Subject to these dispositions and to legacies bequeathed to the sons' widows the residue of the American estate was given by the American will to the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee Inc. in furtherance of its charitable purposes. Clause 10 of the American will was in these terms:

G

H

"At the time of my death I may be the owner of a residence in Hong Kong. If either of my brother, Albert Joseph Hayim, and my sister, Maisie Ruby Abraham, shall survive me, then I direct that my executor and trustee shall have no responsibility or duty with respect to such property, including, without limitation, any duty to take title to such property, to collect the proceeds from its sale or to collect any rent from said property; and my executor's and trustee's only duty and responsibility with respect thereto shall arise upon its receipt of the proceeds of said residence or upon the death of the survivor of my said brother and my said sister, whichever shall first occur, and shall extend only to such property as it exists at the time of the death of such survivor or to the proceeds thereof."

By his Hong Kong will dated 25 April 1975 the testator appointed the second defendant, Hong Kong Bank Trustee Ltd., to be the executor and trustee of his Hong Kong will and gave all the residue of his property outside the United State of America to the Hong Kong Bank:

"Upon trust to sell call in and convert the same into money with power to postpone the sale calling in and conversion thereof so long as my trustee shall in its absolute discretion think fit without being liable for loss upon trust to pay or transfer the proceeds of such sale calling in and conversion to [the first defendant] or other the executor or trustee for the time being of my American will to be held by such executor or trustee upon the trusts of my American will or such of the same as shall then be subsisting and capable of taking effect."

The testator died on 6 June 1977 possessed of considerable wealth and his American will and his Hong Kong will were duly proved by the first defendant and the second defendant respectively. The Hong Kong residue included the Hong Kong house which became vested in the second defendant upon trust for sale with power to postpone sale and to hold the net proceeds of sale and rents and profits until sale upon trust for the first defendant to be held by the first defendant upon the trusts of the American will. Albert who was about 92 and Maisie who was about 87 in 1977 when the testator died remained in occupation of the Hong Kong house at first with the consent in writing of the first defendant, the plaintiffs and the Jewish charity. On 1 June 1981 however the plaintiffs by their legal advisers directed the second defendant to sell the Hong Kong house because the house was providing no income for the plaintiffs and the value of the house, which had been valued at HK$3,000,000 at the date of the testator's death in 1977 and had risen to HK$18,000,000 in 1981, was likely to diminish having regard to the uncertainties in 1981 of the future of Hong Kong real estate. It was argued that the second defendant had no right to postpone the sale of the Hong Kong house in order to provide a home for Albert and Maisie who were not beneficiaries interested in the trusts of the house. The plaintiffs offered to find alternative accommodation for Albert and Maisie where they would be better looked after. Albert was however opposed to any move and the first defendant took the view that it would be cruel to Albert and possibly fatal to Maisie whose health was declining to require them to leave the house. The Jewish charity on being apprised of the views of the first defendant was content to rely on the discretion of the trustees. The second defendant was instructed by the first defendant not to sell the house. The plaintiffs protested that the second defendant owed a duty to the plaintiffs and was not entitled to obey the instructions given by the first defendant.

On 4 November 1982 the testator's sister Maisie died aged about 92. On 15 January 1983 the plaintiffs began proceedings in the High Court of Hong Kong against the first and second defendants for an order that the house be sold and for damages to be awarded against the second defendant for breach of the trusts of the Hong Kong will by the delay of the second defendant in selling the house since June 1981. No relief was sought against the first defendant. The testator's son Joseph died on 14 October 1984 aged 65 and the action was

Hayim v. Citibank N.A. (P.C.)

A continued by George and by the personal representatives of Joseph. On 16 January 1985 Deputy Judge Barnett made the order sought by the plaintiffs against the second defendant. The testator's brother Albert died in May 1985 aged about 99. On 26 July 1985 the Court of Appeal of Hong Kong (Huggins V.-P., Cons and Fuad JJ.A.) allowed an appeal by the second defendant, set aside the orders made by Deputy Judge Barnett and dismissed the action brought by the plaintiffs on the ground that the second defendant had not committed any breach of trust. The house was sold on 18 September 1985 for HK$10,000,000. George and the personal representatives of Joseph now appeal to Her Majesty in Council to restore the order made by Deputy Judge Barnett for the assessment and payment by the second defendant of damages for breach of trust in postponing the sale of the house between 1981 and 1985.

C For the purposes of these proceedings the laws of the United States applicable to the American will and the laws of Hong Kong applicable to the Hong Kong will are assumed, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, to be of the same effect as the laws of England.

D The first question is whether the second defendant owed a duty to the beneficiaries interested under the American will not to obey the instructions of the first defendant to postpone the sale of the Hong Kong house in the interests of Albert and Maisie. Subject to the payment of or provision for the funeral and testamentary expenses and debts of the testator, administration costs and remuneration, the second defendant held the residue of the testator's property in Hong Kong and elsewhere outside the United States of America and the proceeds of sale upon trust for the first defendant. The power of the second defendant to postpone the sale was also held in trust for the first defendant and could only be exercised by the second defendant in accordance with the lawful directions of the first defendant. The interests and powers of the first defendant relating to the Hong Kong property were held by the first defendant upon the trusts and with and subject to the powers and provisions of the American will including clause 10 and the beneficiaries interested under the American will were the plaintiffs and the Jewish charity. The residue of the Hong Kong property consisted of the Hong Kong house valued at HK$3,000,000 and stocks shares and other investments valued at HK$10,000,000. The second defendant had no power or duty to decide whether any of the Hong Kong property should be sold or retained in the interests of the first defendant. It was for the first defendant to decide whether having regard to the trusts powers and provisions of the American will the Hong Kong property held by the second defendant in trust for the first defendant should be retained or sold. In the case of Hong Kong investments to which clause 10 of the American will did not apply the first defendant owed a duty to the beneficiaries interested under the American will to take advice and to decide whether the investments should be sold or retained in the best interests of the beneficiaries without regard to the interests of Albert and Maisie. The first defendant was under a duty to the beneficiaries interested in the American will to communicate its decisions to the second defendant and to ensure that those decisions were carried out even if necessary by obtaining the removal of the second defendant as trustee of the Hong Kong will or by obtaining a transfer of the Hong Kong property from the second defendant to the first defendant or as the first defendant directed. The second defendant had no power or duty to interfere in the administration of the trusts of the American will. The second defendant was bound to give effect to the lawful decisions of the first defendant in relation to Hong Kong property. The second defendant was not however entitled or bound to give effect to any decision of the first defendant which constituted a breach of the duty owed by the first defendant to the beneficiaries interested under the trusts of the American will. In the absence of clause 10, the decision of the first defendant to direct postponement of the sale of the Hong Kong house in the interests of Albert and Maisie and contrary to the interests of the beneficiaries interested under the American will would have been a breach of the duty owed by the first defendant as trustee of the American will to the beneficiaries under the American will and would have been unlawful. The second defendant knew that Albert and Maisie were not beneficiaries and knew that the decision made by the first defendant to direct postponement of the sale of the house was taken in the interests of Albert and Maisie and against the interests of the beneficiaries. In the absence of clause 10, the second defendant would have known or should have known that the instructions by the first defendant to postpone sale of the house were unlawful. The second defendant would have been liable to the beneficiaries under the American will for unlawfully complying with the unlawful decision of the first defendant. But if clause 10 entitled the first defendant to ignore the interests of the beneficiaries under the American will in the Hong Kong house and to make a decision in the interests of Albert and Maisie then the second defendant was bound to accept that decision and comply with the directions given by the first defendant to postpone the sale of the house.

The second and crucial question therefore is whether the first defendant in giving directions to the second defendant to postpone the sale of the Hong Kong house in the interests of Albert and Maisie was in breach of the duty owed by the first defendant to act in the best interests of the beneficiaries interested under the American will. Without clause 10 the first defendant would have owed a duty to the beneficiaries to decide whether the house should be sold or retained in the interests of the beneficiaries. The first defendant would have been under a duty to ignore the interests of Albert and Maisie.

Clause 10 did not deprive the first defendant of the power to decide and direct the second defendant to sell or retain the house. Clause 10 did not extinguish or modify the duty of the second defendant to give effect to any lawful decision of the first defendant in respect of the house. Clause 10 relieved the first defendant of any "responsibility or duty with respect to" the house. The only responsibilities and duties of the first defendant under the American will were responsibilities and duties owed to the beneficiaries interested under the American will. Clause 10 relieved the first defendant of any responsibility or duty owed to the beneficiaries in respect of the house. The first defendant, relieved of any responsibility or duty to the beneficiaries, was entitled to decide to direct the second defendant to postpone the sale of the house in the interests of Albert and Maisie. In considering whether to decide to direct the second defendant to postpone sale the first defendant was entitled to consider the beneficiaries but owed no duty to the beneficiaries

Hayim v. Citibank N.A. (P.C.)

A under the American will to consider them or decide in their favour and accordingly as against those beneficiaries the first defendant committed no breach of trust. If the first defendant made a decision to direct the sale of the house to be postponed in the interests of Albert and Maisie this was a decision which the first defendant was entitled to make by clause 10 of the American will and it was a decision to which the second B defendant holding the house and the proceeds of the house and the power to postpone sale of the house in trust for the first defendant was bound to accept and implement. It is of course unusual for a testator to relieve the trustee of his will of any responsibility or duty in respect of trust property, but a testator may do as he pleases and in the present case the provisions of clause 10 are explicable and understandable.

C When the testator made his American will in 1972 and when the testator made his Hong Kong will in 1975 it was plain that if (as happened) the Hong Kong house remained a home for the testator and for Albert and Maisie and if the testator predeceased Albert and Maisie, someone must decide whether and when Albert and Maisie, who were in the event about 92 and 87 years of age respectively at the death of the testator, should be obliged to leave the house. There were several D courses of action open to the testator if he did not wish to give an interest in the house to Albert and Maisie. First the testator could have conferred on his two sons power to decide whether and when Albert and Maisie should be dispossessed. By his American will or his Hong Kong will the testator could have directed that the house be not sold without the consent of his sons or of one of his sons. The testator did not confer any power of decision on both or either of his sons. Secondly E the testator could have allowed any decision with regard to Albert and Maisie and the house to be made by the beneficiaries interested in the American estate. If the testator had not inserted clause 10 of the American will, Maisie and Albert could have been allowed to remain in the Hong Kong house rent free with the consent of all the beneficiaries namely the plaintiffs and the Jewish charity. There would have been no need to exonerate the first defendant from any responsibility or duty in F respect of the house. Clause 10 is inconsistent with any intention on the part of the testator to leave Albert and Maisie to the mercy of the beneficiaries. Thirdly the testator could have allowed the decision with regard to Albert and Maisie and the house to be made by the second defendant, but in that case something like clause 10 would have been inserted in the Hong Kong will. Fourthly the testator could have allowed G the decision with regard to Albert and Maisie and the house to be made by the first defendant. It was logical that the first defendant should make a decision which must necessarily concern the plaintiffs on the one hand and Albert and Maisie on the other hand. The first defendant would know whether the income of the American estate was sufficient to provide for the plaintiffs without calling in aid any income from the Hong Kong house or from the proceeds of sale of the Hong Kong H house. The inevitable conclusion is that clause 10 was intended to enable the first defendant to decide that although Albert and Maisie were not beneficially interested in the house nevertheless Albert and Maisie should be allowed to remain in the house. The testator gave effect to that intention by a provision which relieved the first defendant from all responsibility and duty to the beneficiaries in respect of the house.

Mr. Nugee submitted that the only object and effect of clause 10 was to enable the first defendant to wash its hands of any problems concerning the house so long as Albert and Maisie survived. But if the beneficiaries agreed, there was no need to relieve the first defendant from responsibility. And if the beneficiaries did not agree then the first defendant would have to decide. If one beneficiary wished Albert and Maisie to occupy the house free of rent while the second beneficiary wished Albert and Maisie to occupy the house but to pay a rack rent and the third beneficiary wished the house to be sold with vacant possession, then the second defendant holding in trust for the first defendant and only concerned under the trusts of the Hong Kong will would be entitled and bound to apply to the first defendant for a decision. Clause 10 of the American will and the terms of the Hong Kong will are not apt to transfer from the first defendant to the second defendant power to decide whether the Hong Kong house should be sold or retained in the interests of the beneficiaries under the American will or otherwise. If the testator had wished to place responsibility for a decision on the second defendant he would have provided by the Hong Kong will that the second defendant should hold the proceeds of sale of the house in trust for the beneficiaries. In fact the testator by the Hong Kong will directed the second defendant to hold the proceeds of sale of the house in trust for the first defendant and it was for the first defendant to decide when the house should be sold. Clause 10 relieved the first defendant of any responsibility or duty with respect to the house and therefore authorised the first defendant to make a decision that the sale of the house should be postponed without regard to the interests of the beneficiaries—an unusual but understandable provision if the testator wished the first defendant and no one else to decide whether and when Albert and Maisie should be required to leave the house. The first defendant did not commit a breach of the trusts of the American will by directing the second defendant to postpone sale. The second defendant did not commit a breach of the trusts of the Hong Kong will in complying with the lawful directions of the first defendant.

On behalf of the plaintiffs, Mr. Nugee disputes these conclusions. He argues in the first place that the first defendant committed a breach of trust of the American will by deciding to postpone the sale of the house. He says that clause 10 could not have been intended to absolve the first defendant from any duty to the beneficiaries, because in that event the first defendant could have used the house for its own purposes or allowed the second defendant to commit a breach of duty with respect to the house, for example, the duty to insure. But clause 10 in express terms relieved the first defendant from any duty in respect of the house. No doubt the testator was content to trust the first defendant. If the second defendant failed to insure or failed to implement any decision of the first defendant then the first defendant would have been entitled but not bound to take proceedings against the second defendant. Clause 10 enabled the first defendant to ensure that the house was retained by the second defendant yielding no rent during the lives of Albert and Maisie though under the trusts of the American will Albert and Maisie were not beneficiaries. Clause 10 was in the circumstances designed to enable Albert and Maisie to remain in the house as long as the first defendant thought fit. If clause 10 were exploited for any other purpose the beneficiaries could complain and the court could find that the first defendant had not properly exercised the discretion conferred on the first defendant to postpone the sale of the house either in the interests of the beneficiaries or in the interests of Albert and Maisie: see In re

3 W.L.R.

Hayim v. Citibank N.A. (P.C.)

A Hastings-Bass, decd. [1975] Ch. 25, 41. In the circumstances which prevailed at the date when the testator made his American will, clause 10 was intended to enable the first defendant to be kind to Albert and Maisie without breach of any duty owed to the beneficiaries.

B If the first defendant did not commit a breach of trust of the American will by directing the second defendant to postpone sale, nevertheless Mr. Nugee submits in the second place that the second defendant committed a breach of trust by complying with those directions. The second defendant, he said, was not absolved by clause 10 of the American will. Under the trusts of the Hong Kong will, it was submitted, the second defendant owed a duty to administer the trusts of the house in the interests of the beneficiaries interested in the house under the American will; the second defendant knew that those beneficiaries did not include Albert and Maisie. Their Lordships take the view that under the trusts of the Hong Kong will the house was not held by the second defendant on the trusts of the American will. The house was held by the second defendant in trust for the first defendant. If for example Albert and Maisie had predeceased the testator, the power to decide whether the sale of the house should be postponed would have been exercised by the second defendant in accordance with the directions of the first defendant. It would have been for the first defendant as trustee of the American will to decide whether the house should be retained as an investment or sold and converted into cash available for reinvestment. The trusteeship of the American will cannot be duplicated. The only trustee of the American will was the first defendant. The second defendant owed a duty to the first defendant and not a duty to the beneficiaries under the American will.

E The authorities cited by Mr. Nugee only demonstrate that when a trustee commits a breach of trust or is involved in a conflict of interest and duty or in other exceptional circumstances a beneficiary may be allowed to sue a third party in the place of the trustee. But a beneficiary allowed to take proceedings cannot be in a better position than a trustee carrying out his duties in a proper manner.

F In Travis v. Milne (1851) 9 Hare 141, 150, Turner V.-C. observed that beneficiaries interested in the estate of a deceased partner can only sue the surviving partners in

G “special circumstances . . . where the relation between the executors and the surviving partners is such as to present a substantial impediment to the prosecution by the executors of the rights of the parties interested in the estate against the surviving partners.”

In that case the executors were accused of breach of trust in carrying on business in partnership with the surviving partners and with the capital of the deceased partner. The executors could not prosecute proceedings against the surviving partners without involving themselves in conflicts of interest and duty.

H In Sharpe v. San Paulo Railway Co. (1873) L.R. 8 Ch.App. 597, 609–610, James L.J. said:

“a person interested in an estate or a trust fund could not sue a debtor to that trust fund, or sue for that trust fund, merely on the allegation that the trustee would not sue; but that if there was any difficulty of that kind, if the trustee would not take the proper steps to enforce the claim, the remedy of the cestui que trust was to file his bill against the trustee for the execution of the trust, or for the realisation of the trust fund, and then to obtain the proper order for using the trustee's name, or for obtaining a receiver to use the trustee's name, who would, on behalf of the whole estate, institute the proper action, or the proper suit in this court."

In Yeatman v. Yeatman (1877) 7 Ch.D. 210 it was held that a mere refusal by a personal representative to sue for recovery of a debt owed to the estate would not, in the absence of special circumstances, justify a residuary legatee or next of kin in suing the debtor. Hall V.-C., at p. 216, said that the court would have to be satisfied that "it was a proper case for proceedings to be taken, although not necessarily and absolutely certain that they would be successful."

In Beningfield v. Baxter (1886) 12 App.Cas. 167, 178-179, Lord Selborne said:

"When an executor cannot sue, because his own acts and conduct, with reference to the testator's estate, are impeached, relief, which (as against a stranger) could be sought by the executor alone, may be obtained at the suit of a party beneficially interested in the proper performance of his duty."

In Meldrum v. Scorer (1887) 56 L.T. 471, 473, Kay J. considered "it to be quite settled that a mere refusal to sue on the part of a trustee does not entitle a cestui que trust to sue in his own name." A beneficiary under a settlement inter vivos of a legacy of £8,000 was allowed to sue the personal representatives who, with notice of the settlement, paid the legacy, to one out of two of the settlement trustees and therefore did not obtain a good receipt from the trustees. The sole trustee who had been paid the legacy absconded.

In Wong Yu Shi v. Wong Ying Kuen (No. 1) [1957] H.K.L.R. 420 the estate of a son included a share in the estate of his father. A beneficiary interested in the son's estate obtained an order for an account against the personal representatives of the father and against the personal representatives of the son on the basis of wilful default but only because both sets of personal representatives had been guilty of breaches of trust.

In In re Field, decd. [1971] 1 W.L.R. 555 a plaintiff was allowed to sue on a cause of action vested in personal representatives where the personal representatives refused to sue and there was no one interested in the estate except the plaintiff and the widow of the deceased and the widow had a personal interest in the defeat of the action.

These authorities demonstrate that a beneficiary has no cause of action against a third party save in special circumstances which embrace a failure, excusable or inexcusable, by the trustees in the performance of the duty owed by the trustees to the beneficiary to protect the trust estate or to protect the interests of the beneficiary in the trust estate. By the Hong Kong will the testator conferred on the first defendant the power to give instructions binding on the second defendant to sell or to retain the Hong Kong house. By clause 10 of the American will the testator relieved the first defendant from any responsibility to the beneficiaries interested in the American estate in respect of the Hong Kong house. As a result of clause 10 the first defendant did not therefore owe any duty to the beneficiaries. The first defendant lawfully instructed the second defendant to postpone sale and the second defendant lawfully complied with those instructions. Mr. Nugee referred

LORD TEMPLEMAN said that, unlike the House of Lords, the hearing of an appeal in the Privy Council was a single hearing and counsel should have raised the matter at the hearing of the appeal while the facts were fresh in the recollection of the court and while any special circumstances could be considered. The remaindermen ought to have been joined. Finally there was no merit in the application.

The appellant, who dealt in spare parts for military ships and aircraft, wished to supply spare parts as required for Olympus marine engines; in order to do so he needed to be able to refer to the manufacturer's manual of the aero version of the engine. The Ministry of Defence, which had classified that manual as "restricted," had disseminated without restriction certain of its relevant information in documents of tender and had supplied copies of the manual to purchasers of aircraft containing the engine. The appellant, through a colleague, obtained the loan from a service man of the manual and was charged with unlawful reception of a document, contrary to section 2(2) of the Official Secrets Act 1911¹. The jury were directed, in effect, that the appellant's guilt depended on what the service man had authorised the defendant's colleague to do and how the service man wanted dissemination of the manual to be restricted. The appellant was convicted. A

Held, allowing the appeal, that the onus was on the Crown under section 2(1)(a) of the Act of 1911 to prove that the communicator of the information, the appellant's colleague, was not authorised to communicate it to the recipient appellant so that the true question for the jury was whether the Ministry of Defence, by wide dissemination of the manual and its information without restriction on further use, had or might have impliedly authorised anyone to use it as he thought fit on coming into possession of it; that a proper approach for the jury was for them to inquire whether they were sure that the Ministry of Defence had not by its actions impliedly authorised the general dissemination of the manual to anyone who might be interested; that, therefore, what the service man himself might have thought was only a part of the evidence and was not the governing factor; and that, accordingly, the jury had been misled and the conviction would be quashed (post, pp. 99D, 100B-C, 101B, D). APPEAL against conviction.

The appellant, Peter Anthony Galvin, on 10 July 1986 in the Crown court at Warwick before Judge Harrison-Hall and a jury was convicted on one count charging unlawful reception of a document, namely, Air Publications No. AP 102C/0402/3A, the manufacturer's manual of the Olympus aero engine, contrary to section 2(2) of the Official Secrets Act 1911, as amended and another count charging conspiracy to use information for the benefit of a foreign power, namely, Argentina, contrary to section 2(1)(aa) of the Act of 1911, as amended, and section 1(1) of the Criminal Law Act 1977. He was sentenced to six months' imprisonment on the count under section 2(2) and to one day's imprisonment on the count under section 2(1)(aa). In addition he pleaded guilty to a count of corruption, for which he was sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment and to a count of handling, for which he was sentenced to two years' imprisonment. He was found not guilty by direction on a count charging unlawful reception of another document. Counts charging five co-defendants of the appellant do not call for report. He applied for and was granted leave to appeal against conviction on the grounds that the evidence showed that the information in the manual was already within the public domain; that the Crown had failed to prove that the manual was "official information" and/or not already lawfully within the public domain so as to constitute a wrongful communication; that the trial judge erred in rejecting a submission that F

1 May. LORD LANE C.J. read the following judgment of the court. On 10 July 1986 in the Crown Court at Warwick the appellant, as he now is, leave having been given by this court, was convicted on one count of unlawful reception of a document, contrary to section 2(2) of the Official Secrets Act 1911, in respect of which he was sentenced to six months' imprisonment, and one count of conspiracy to use information for the benefit of a foreign power (Argentina), contrary to section 2(1)(aa) of the Official Secrets Act 1911 and section 1(1) of the Criminal Law Act 1977, in respect of which he received one day's imprisonment to run concurrently.

E The indictment originally contained 13 counts. Six defendants in all were involved. The appellant also pleaded guilty to one count of corruption and one of handling, for which he was sentenced to 18 months' and 2 years' imprisonment respectively to run concurrently. His total sentence is therefore one of 2 years' imprisonment. He was acquitted on the judge's direction of another count of unlawful reception of a document.

F This appeal is only concerned with the first two counts, namely unlawful reception which became count 5 and conspiracy which became count 9. He appeals against the conviction on each of those counts.

The case against the appellant on these two counts concerned the document called Air Publications No. AP102C/0402/3A, a manufacturer's manual relating to the Rolls-Royce Olympus aero engine, a document hereinafter referred to as the Olympus AP.

G The Olympus engine was used to power the Vulcan Bomber which was operated by the Royal Air Force ("R.A.F.") until the aircraft became obsolete in 1980, and is still used in Concorde. There is a marine version of the same engine, which was and is used to power naval vessels of as many as 14 nations, including Argentina and Libya. Many of the parts were common to both the aero and marine versions. Spare parts manuals relating to the marine version would have been supplied to anyone using the engines. Those manuals would contain the Rolls-Royce, but not the Ministry of Defence ("M.o.D.") or North Atlantic Treaty Organisation ("N.A.T.O.") reference numbers. No restriction was placed by Rolls-Royce or the United Kingdom Government on republication of these marine manuals. However the Olympus AP was officially classified as "Restricted," a word which was printed on every page of the publication. The Argentines have never used the Olympus aero version.

In 1981, on the demise of the Vulcan aircraft, the M.o.D. sold a large quantity of Olympus aero engine parts to a company dealing in secondhand aero engine spares—Taylors of Stafford. The tender document contained Rolls-Royce part numbers and the corresponding M.o.D./N.A.T.O. reference numbers. Some of the parts themselves had the M.o.D. and N.A.T.O. numbers indelibly stamped upon them.

At about the time of and after the Falklands war, Argentine wanted spares for its Olympus marine engines. Despite the fact that, surprisingly, no statutory embargo existed, Rolls-Royce refused to supply spares directly or indirectly to the Argentines. Eventually the Argentines started negotiations, at first indirectly, and then later directly, with a company called Aviation and Marine International (“CAS”) to get spares for their Olympus marine engines. CAS were buyers and sellers of spares for military ships and aircraft. The appellant was the managing director and in effect the owner of CAS. A man called Bonfield was general manager. Another man called Tucker was manager of military projects in the same company.

The Argentines supplied to CAS lists of the parts which they required. CAS tried to obtain the necessary spares from various sources. Rolls-Royce refused point blank to supply them with any spares. CAS obtained a small quantity from a company called Sky Trade International Ltd. These were sold through various devious channels by CAS to the Argentines.

Finally CAS tried Taylors of Stafford. Here they met a difficulty. Taylors still had large quantities of Olympus parts but it proved impossible, without a copy of the Olympus AP, which they did not have, to identify whether they had those parts required by the Argentines. CAS therefore set about obtaining the document by somewhat recondite means, no doubt believing, wrongly, that by supplying these parts to the Argentines they were committing a criminal offence, and so wishing to conceal as far as possible the nature of their business.

The method they adopted was as follows. Tucker had a friend called Colin Bain. Bain was in the spring of 1984 employed by APME Ltd.—a subsidiary of Pall Europe Ltd. Both APME and Pall Europe had contracts with the M.o.D., which meant that Bain himself had R.A.F. contacts, one of whom was Chief Technician Owen, at the old War Office building, which houses a technical library. One of the items in that library was a copy of the Olympus AP. Tucker brought Bain to see the appellant and Bain agreed to supply the necessary manual which he would obtain from Government Technical Libraries. The appellant knew the manuals were classified and no doubt thought that he was not entitled to possess them.

On 11 May 1984 Bain got Owen to lend him the Olympus AP for a few days on the pretext that it was required by APME or Pall Europe. Owen would not have lent the manual if he had known of the true purpose. Owen’s commanding officer, Squadron Leader Ball who was present at the time, would also have refused to lend the documents had he known the truth.

Bain gave the manual to Tucker and Tucker gave it to the appellant, who entrusted it to his wife as he, the appellant, was off to the Sudan. It was then photocopied at the CAS offices, the word “Restricted” having first been obliterated from all the pages on which it appeared. The original then went back to Owen, who had no idea what had been

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Galvin (C.A.)

A happening to it meanwhile. Owen of course got no reward. Bain did. The amount is not clear.

B As will become apparent, it is important to see the extent to which by early summer 1984 the Olympus AP had become available to people outside the circle of those to whom publication had originally be restricted. Squadron Leader Ball gave evidence that he himself had "declassified" the document in 1980 on the demise of the Vulcan. There was however evidence that Squadron Leader Ball was in no position to declassify a document such as this, this being the privilege of a different body altogether.

C As already explained, Taylors of Stafford had been supplied by the M.o.D. with the large tender document containing both the Rolls-Royce and the M.o.D. and N.A.T.O. reference numbers of all the parts to be sold, and no doubt other companies in the spare parts trade who were interested in the Olympus spare part sale would have received a similar tender document. No restrictions were placed by the M.o.D. on resale by Taylors or upon dissemination of the tender document. Indeed the object of Taylors' purchase was obviously resale to anyone interested and the reference numbers would be an essential element in that process of resale.

D In February 1983 the trustees of the Midland Air Museum bought from the M.o.D. one of the obsolete Vulcan aircraft complete with its four Olympus engines. Four months later, in June, the trustees were sent a copy of the Olympus AP. Although that copy was marked "restricted," no condition was imposed by the M.o.D. upon its use or distribution.

E In February 1984 another Vulcan aircraft with its engines and a copy of the Olympus AP was sold to a private individual. The word "Restricted" on the manual gave him, he said, no concern. No limitations were put upon his use of the information contained in the manual.

Those being in outline the facts, we turn to the law in order to see how the two matched. Section 2(2) of the Official Secrets Act 1911 reads as follows (omitting the irrelevant words):

F "If any person receives any [secret official code word, or pass word, or] . . . document, or information, knowing, or having reasonable ground to believe, at the time when he receives it, that the . . . document, or information is communicated to him in contravention of this Act, he shall be guilty of an offence . . ."

G We should perhaps add here that the words in square brackets were added by the Official Secrets Act 1920. Mr. Caplan for the appellant did not pursue his original contention that the word "secret" governed more than the remaining words within those brackets.

H The prosecution put their case as follows. When Bain communicated the Olympus AP to CAS, he was acting in contravention of section 2(1)(a) of the Act, and Galvin knew or had reasonable ground to believe that that was the case. So one turns to section 2(1)(a), as amended, which provides, so far as is material:

"If any person having in his possession or control any . . . document, . . . which he has obtained owing to his position as a person who holds . . . a contract made on behalf of [Her] Majesty, or . . . who is . . . employed under a person who holds . . . such . . . contract,— (a) communicates the . . . document . . . to any person, other than a person to whom he is authorised to communicate it, . . . shall be guilty of an offence.”

The contention of the prosecution continues in this way. (a) The document—the Olympus AP—was obtained by Bain as described in section 2(1)(a) because—(i) Bain obtained it from Owen owing to his, Bain’s, employment with APME who were indisputably under contract to the M.O.D. (i.e., a contract made on behalf of Her Majesty); (ii) there was evidence on which the jury could properly come to the conclusion so as to feel sure that he was not authorised to communicate it to CAS or the appellant; (iii) he communicated it to CAS and the appellant. (b) The appellant, to turn back to section 2(2), had reasonable ground to believe that the document was communicated to him in contravention of section 2(1)(a).

Mr. Caplan submitted to the trial judge that there was no case for the appellant to answer. The judge rejected that submission. Mr. Caplan contends before us that that decision was wrong. He based much of his argument on the fact that, if the contentions of the prosecution are correct, the reception of all sorts of documents and information may well fall foul of the Act when the information or document may be freely available to all and sundry and could not possibly be regarded as either “official” or “secret.”

He suggests that Parliament cannot have intended that these sections of the Act should cast their net so wide. In support of his argument he draws attention to the long title of the Official Secrets Act 1889, which was the precursor of the Act of 1911. That title reads as follows: “An Act to prevent the Disclosure of Official Documents and Information.” Mr. Caplan contends that one is entitled to have regard to those words in construing the Act, and that the title makes it clear that the document or information which Parliament intended to protect was that of an official nature and once the document or information gets into the “public domain,” as he describes it, it ceases to be official information and ceases to be within the mischief of these sections.

One can have regard to the title of a statute to help solve an ambiguity in the body of it, but it is not, we consider, open to a court to use the title to restrict what is otherwise the plain meaning of the words of the statute simply because they seem to be unduly wide.

We were referred to the decision of Avory J. in Rex v. Crisp and Homewood (1919) 83 J.P. 121. Crisp was a clerk in the War Office. He gave to Homewood, the director of a firm of tailors, documents containing particulars of army clothing contracts between the War Office and clothing manufacturers. The two men were charged under section 2(1)(a) and (2) of the Act of 1911. The defendants advanced arguments similar to those of Mr. Caplan. Avory J. held that the enacting words of the statute were not to be cut down or limited by the title of the Act; that the Act of 1911 was intended to go much further than its predecessor; that it was sufficient for the prosecution to prove that Crisp had obtained the documents owing to his position as a person holding office under His Majesty; and that section 2 applied to any document or information of an official character obtained in that way, provided that he communicated it to some person to whom he was not authorised to communicate it. Avory J. accordingly rejected a submission of no case.

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Galvin (C.A.)

A Mr. Caplan seeks to derive help from the Canadian case, Boyer v. The King (1948) 94 C.C.C. 195, a decision of a five-judge Quebec Court of King's Bench (Appeal Side). Marchand J. said at p. 244:

"I would add that the Official Secrets Act, by its very title, indicates that its provisions are not applicable to what is already published or made public and coming within the public domain."

B The Canadian Official Secrets Act was in very similar terms to our own. However the observations of Marchand J. were not echoed by any of the other four judges; the dictum was obiter; Marchand J.'s judgment dissented from the judgments of the majority; in any case what he said does not accord with the judgment of Avory J. in Rex v. Crisp and Homewood, 83 J.P. 121, which in our view correctly expresses the law.

C In our judgment the words of these sections of the Act of 1911 are not susceptible to the interpretation which the appellant seeks to put upon them. They unambiguously define the type of material which is protected, the type of person who is under a duty not to communicate it, the circumstances under which the recipient of such communication may be guilty of an offence and the matters which may offer him an excuse.

D However desirable it might be for these sections to be construed in the way that Mr. Caplan invites us to construe them, it would be going beyond our proper powers to do so.

E That is not the end of the matter however. One of the matters which the prosecution must prove under section 2(1)(a) is that the communicator (Bain) of the information was not authorised to communicate it to the recipient (the appellant).

F Authorisation may be either express or implied. No difficulty arises over the express aspect. Implied authorisation is not so easy to define. There are obvious parallels with the situation in civil law where a person who has received confidential information from another is under an obligation, enforceable by action, not to disclose that information or use it for his own or someone else's benefit. The "owner" of such information cannot enforce the duty of confidence if he himself has already disclosed the information to the public.

G Two cases in point were cited to us. Franchi v. Franchi [1967] R.P.C. 149. In that case Cross J. was faced with the problem of deciding to what extent an application by the plaintiffs for a Belgian patent amounted to such a disclosure to competitors in the United Kingdom.

The following dictum appears at p. 152:

"Clearly a claim that the disclosure of some information would be a breach of confidence is not to be defeated simply by proving that there are other people in the world who know the facts in question besides the man as to whom it is said that his disclosure would be a breach of confidence and those to whom he has disclosed them."

H We were also referred to the decision of Bowen C.J. sitting in the Supreme Court of New South Wales in Interfirm Comparison (Australia) Pty. Ltd. v. Law Society of New South Wales [1977] R.P.C. 137, in which Bowen C.J. made it clear that the mere disclosure of a secret to a member of the public by the plaintiffs would not suffice to destroy the confidentiality of a document, and that it required disclosure to the world before such confidentiality would be destroyed.

It will be clear already that the provisions of the Act of 1911 cause enough trouble without additional complications. There were in the present case two such complications. First, the Argentine situation. All or almost all of those concerned with these transactions were, it seems, under the erroneous impression that the sale of spare parts for the Olympus engine to the Argentines was illegal. There was as a result some understandable confusion on the part of defendants, civilian witnesses and the police witnesses as to what Bain was or was not authorised to do with the manual. Secondly, chief technician Owen took the view that he had only "authorised" Bain to use the manual for the purpose which Bain had, falsely, said he was borrowing it and that Bain was therefore not authorised to pass on the manual to the appellant.

In our judgment that was not the real issue in the case. The true question for the jury was, leaving aside the feeling that this information should not have been used for the benefit of the Argentines, and leaving aside what Owen thought he was authorising, whether the M.o.D. by disseminating the manual and the information contained in it as widely as they already had done, and without restriction as to its further use, had or may have impliedly authorised anyone who came into possession of it to make such use of it as that person saw fit.

This was a question of fact for the jury. As the evidence stood the jury might have decided the point either way. There was certainly sufficient evidence to justify them finding that there was no such implied authorisation. The judge was correct to reject the submission of no case.

The question that remains is whether the jury were given a sufficiently clear direction on the point in issue. The material passage in the summing up reads:

"So far as this count is concerned, the Crown case is that he was offered the document and although for this purpose the information might have been available to him without restriction the communication of the document itself was subject to restriction in the sense that what you have to do is look and say what was the understanding at the time this document was handed over by Owen to Bain? As far as that is concerned, you may well think at the end of the day that so far as Owen was concerned, he was not interested in any of the confidentiality or restricting disclosure of the part numbers, and so forth, in the document because none of those matters were confidential, but so far as the document is concerned, it was something that belonged to the Ministry which was not a lending library, and he did not want it to go further than the restricted circle of Mr. Bain and, as it were, his employers, and that 'if Mr. Bain wanted to part with it he should have asked me and told me why and then I would have considered it further,' but it would be fair to say that both parties knew that at the time although nothing was said it was not intended that the document should go out of Bain's possession in this way. Thus, say the Crown, and rightly, this was a communication in breach of the Act because it is being communicated to someone else not authorised to receive it even though the information in it is not dangerous or confidential, it is just a document. How many people tell you things but they will not lend you their books?"

We hasten to say that the judge has our sympathy. He was faced with the unenviable task of trying to explain these sections in a way

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Galvin (C.A.)

A which the jury could understand, and he was relying on the way in which the prosecution had advanced their propositions. We do not criticise him in any way at all.

The result was, as is apparent from the passage cited, however, that everything was said to hinge on what Owen authorised Bain to do and on how Owen wanted any dissemination of this manual to be restricted. On that basis the result was a foregone conclusion.

B A proper approach was for the jury to inquire whether they were sure that the M.o.D. had not by their actions impliedly authorised the general dissemination of the document to any one who might be interested. What Owen himself may have thought was only a part of the evidence and was not the governing factor. In our judgment this was a fatal misdirection.

C It only remains to deal with the conspiracy count, which alleged that Galvin and Bonfield conspired together and with CAS to use information which was in their possession and which had been obtained in contravention of the Official Secrets Act 1911 for the benefit of a foreign power, namely, Argentina.

It is agreed on all hands that the same considerations apply to this count as applied to the former.

D The result is that the appeal may be allowed and the conviction on each of these two counts must be quashed.

Conflict of Laws—Sovereign immunity—Diplomatic immunity—Embassy internal memorandum—Memorandum severely critical of plaintiff—Action by plaintiff for damages for libel—Memorandum disclosed on discovery—Whether memorandum protected by absolute privilege

The defendant was a former ambassador of a friendly foreign state. At the material time he was not an accredited diplomat, but he was regarded by the embassy staff and by his government as having authority. He was subsequently re-appointed ambassador. His name was subscribed to an internal embassy memorandum, which was later admitted to have been sent on his orders, although not written or sent by himself, addressed to the counsellor at the embassy. The memorandum pointed out the counsellor's misconduct in granting the plaintiff embassy concessions and informed him of his transfer to another post. It was severely critical of the plaintiff. The plaintiff brought an action claiming damages for libel allegedly contained in the memorandum, alleging publication to, inter alios, the chargé d'affaires at the embassy and to the country's foreign affairs ministry. The defendant accepted responsibility for the memorandum and pleaded diplomatic immunity, but purported to waive the immunity for the action. He also pleaded that the memorandum was the subject of absolute privilege. The judge held that there had been no publication outside the embassy, accepted the plea of absolute privilege and dismissed the action.

On appeal by the plaintiff:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that where an action was based on the contents and publication of an embassy document the court faced conflicting aspects of public policy, namely, the need to confine to a minimum curtailment of a litigant's right to seek redress for a wrong committed in England and the need to confine to a minimum meddling by the court in the affairs of a foreign sovereign; that normally the latter aspect should prevail unless the circumstances of a particular case warranted its disregard (post, p. 116A–B, C–D); that the concept of international comity and inviolability of diplomatic documents led to the conclusion that the dispute was not justiciable in English courts; and that, accordingly, the judge had rightly held that the memorandum was protected by absolute privilege (post, pp. 117H, 118F, 120A–C).

Per Kerr L.J. The waiver of the immunity from suit of the defendant did not destroy the claim for immunity of the document, since that was justified by the character of the document, irrespective of the defendant's submission to the court's jurisdiction against him personally (post, p. 121G–H).

APPEAL from Stocker L.J., sitting as an additional judge of the Queen's Bench Division.

On 3 May 1983 the plaintiff, Mr. Muhammed Fayed, issued a writ seeking damages for libel contained in a memorandum dated 7 September 1982 which was published, or caused to be published by the defendant, Mr. Muhammed Mahdi al-Tajir, to Mr. Nabil Hijazi who was counsellor at the Embassy of the United Arab Emirates. The defendant was the head of the embassy at the time pending his re-appointment as the ambassador. Copies of the memorandum were sent to the chargé d'affaires and the foreign affairs ministry of the Emirates. The defendant, in his defence, pleaded that he had diplomatic status but stated that he waived it for the present proceedings. He also pleaded that the memorandum, being an internal document of the embassy of his country, was privileged. However, the memorandum was disclosed on discovery in the proceedings.

Stocker L.J. dismissed the action holding that the memorandum was protected by absolute privilege.

By a notice of appeal dated 14 March 1986 the plaintiff appealed on the grounds, inter alia, that (1) the judge erred in law in holding that the communication by the defendant of the words complained of to Mr. Nabil Hijazi was protected by absolute privilege, the sole reason why he did not give judgment for the plaintiff; (2) the judge erred in apparently holding, for the first time, that the class of absolute privilege applied by the Court of Appeal in Chatterton v. Secretary of State for India in Council [1895] 2 Q.B. 189, 190, 192–193, to “officers of state” and to communications “relating to matters of state,” in the context of the British Crown, would extend to cover communications between the diplomats or other servants of a foreign state, that being the only class of absolute privilege relied upon by the defendant; (3) in particular, the judge erred in law in apparently treating the memorandum complained of in that action as a communication “relating to matters of state” and the individuals concerned, the defendant and Mr. Nabil Hijazi, as being “officers of state” within the Chatterton principle; (4) whether or not absolute privilege should be so extended was a question best left to Parliament, in the absence of any case law directly in point, particularly in view of the foreign policy implications which would in effect require to be assessed de novo; (5) In any event, even if, contrary to the plaintiff’s submissions, communications passing between the ambassador of a friendly foreign state and one of the senior embassy officials ordinarily did require to be protected by absolute privilege, the judge erred on the facts before him in upholding the defence because at the time the memorandum was published the defendant, it was conceded, was neither the ambassador nor accredited to the Court of St. James in any other capacity; (6) the appropriate test to apply in deciding whether to extend the Chatterton principle was whether there were “overwhelmingly strong reasons of public policy” which rendered it necessary so to do: Gibbons v. Duffell (1932) 47 C.L.R. 520, 534, and thus the judge erred in holding that there was such a necessity for the hitherto very limited and special protection of absolute privilege in the circumstances confronting him; (7) in particular, no such necessity could be demonstrated in circumstances where (a) qualified privilege would ordinarily attach to official embassy documents and (b) the authors of such documents would be protected by diplomatic immunity from suit arising under the Vienna Convention, as embodied in the Diplomatic Privileges Act 1964, which the instant case the sovereign state concerned had chosen to waive; (8) The judge further failed to take any or any sufficient account of the following considerations: (a) the principle described by Lopes L.J. in Royal Aquarium and Summer and Winter Garden Society Ltd. v. Parkinson [1892] 1 Q.B. 431, 451, to the effect that “[absolute privilege] seems rather to attach to the person or character of the person writing or speaking the defamatory matter, whereas [qualified privilege] to the occasion when the defamatory matter is written or spoken,” (b) the doubts expressed by the Court of Appeal in Szalatnay-Stacho v. Fink [1947] 1 K.B. 1 and Richard v. Naum [1967] 1 Q.B. 620 as to whether the absolute privilege enjoyed by communications relating to matters of state would extend to documents published by the officials of foreign governments, (c) the unchallenged evidence of Mr. Nabil Hijazi that it would not have been within the scope of the defendant’s authority, even if he had been ambassador at the material time, to order Mr. Hijazi’s transfer back to the United Arab Emirates, which purported to be the object of the memorandum complained of; and (9) the judge misdirected himself as to the effect of the passages cited from the speech of Lord Wilberforce in Buttes Gas and Oil Co. v. Hammer [1932] A.C. 888, 930–932. Those related to the entirely separate question of jurisdiction to review the transactions of sovereign states, which was so remote from the

A present issue of absolute privilege as to afford no guidance one way or the other and in the present case it was not disputed that the judge had jurisdiction to determine the issues in accordance with English law.

B By a respondent's notice the defendant sought to have the judge's judgment affirmed on the grounds, inter alia, that (1) if, contrary to the judge's decision and to the defendant's submissions, the public interest of the United Kingdom did not require that absolute privilege should be attached to the communication of the words complained of to Mr. Nabil Hijazi, absolute privilege should nonetheless attach to that communication as an aspect of the state immunity which was enjoyed by the United Arab Emirates in respect of all documents and archives of its embassy in the United Kingdom and in particular communications emanating from that embassy concerning the employment of the officers of that embassy and the absolute privilege claimed in the defence survived the waiver of the diplomatic immunity on whichever of those two bases that privilege was properly to be founded; and (2) if, as was the plaintiff's submission, only a qualified privilege were to be attached to the communication of the words complained of to Mr. Nabil Hijazi, that privilege would be defeasible upon proof of malice yet an inquiry as to the presence or absence of malice would involve an examination of the motives of the United Arab Emirates in the person of its officers in effecting Mr. Nabil Hijazi's transfer from its embassy in London to its foreign affairs ministry in Abu Dhabi and that was not an inquiry on which a United Kingdom court should embark.

Cur. adv. vult.

19 February. The following judgments were handed down.

F MUSTILL L.J. This curious case springs from a dispute within the London Embassy of the United Arab Emirates.

G The defendant is Mr. Muhammed Mahdi al-Tajir. For some years he was ambassador of the United Arab Emirates ("the Emirates") to the Court of St. James. The Emirates are a federation of Arab states, one of which is the Emirate of Dubai. At the material time, H. H. Sheikh Rashid was ruler of Dubai and vice-president of the Emirates. During August 1982 the defendant resigned as ambassador of the Emirates in London, for reasons which suggest that it was contemplated throughout that in due course he would resume his office. For about the next 12 months he continued to concern himself with the affairs of the Emirates in two ways. First, he maintained his position as adviser to the ruler of Dubai, a role which he had performed for many years. Second, he appears to have acted H for internal purposes as de facto head of mission. During this period there was no person occupying the office of ambassador. Although, upon the defendant's resignation as ambassador, he ceased to be on the list of those recognised as diplomats accredited to the Court of St. James, his status was such that, in the words of the trial judge, he was regarded both by the foreign ministry in the United Arab Emirates and by the staff at the embassy in London as having authority. On 15 November 1983 the defendant was re-appointed as ambassador in London, and he continued to hold that post until November 1986, when he once more resigned: an event which occurred after the trial of the present action but before the argument of the appeal.

During the interregnum between the resignation of the defendant in August 1982 and his re-appointment in November 1983 there was no ambassador in post. The senior official in the embassy and formal chef de mission was Mr. Mirza al-Sayegh, the chargé d'affaires. The second in command was the counsellor, Mr. Nabil Hijazi. The third secretary was Mr. Al Hashimi.

The plaintiff, Mr. Muhammed Fayed, is a businessman with substantial interests in the United Kingdom. He had for a number of years been prominent in the affairs of the Emirates, and had been on close terms with the defendant. One of the fruits of this relationship had been the procurement by the defendant on his behalf of certain privileges at Heathrow Airport, notably concerning the use of the V.I.P. lounge, and access for his limousines to various restricted areas. These privileges had been renewed for him from year to year through the intermediacy of Mr. Nabil Hijazi.

In course of time the relationship between the plaintiff and the defendant took a turn for the worse: so much so that on 7 September 1982, during the interval between the resignation of the defendant as ambassador and his subsequent re-appointment, a memorandum came into existence in terms sharply critical of the plaintiff. I return at a later stage to the circumstances in which this document came to be written. It is sufficient for present purposes to say that it was addressed to Mr. Nabil Hijazi (the counsellor), with copies to Mr. Mirza al-Sayegh (the chargé d'affaires) and to the ministry of foreign affairs in Abu Dhabi. The document was subscribed with the word "ambassador" followed by the Arabic equivalent of "per pro," then the signature of Mirza al-Sayegh, and finally the name of the defendant.

Since this memorandum is the document in suit in the present action I must set out its text in full. In translation, it read:

"EMBASSY OF THE UNITED ARAB EMIRATES

"Date 7/9/1982

"Greetings,

"I was dismayed to learn that you have contacted the airport authorities for the purpose of granting Mr. Muhammed Fayed two passes to enter Heathrow Airport in his car in the name of the embassy. I was extremely annoyed to receive such a report as I have personally warned you of the consequences of having any dealings with that person under the name of the embassy. You have promised to cancel all the arrangements made by the embassy in his favour. You made that promise several weeks ago in the presence of Mr. Mirza Al-Sayegh. However, this has not been fulfilled. I was surprised to learn from my colleagues in the embassy that Mr. Fayed started to use the V.I.P. lounge at the airport impersonating the identity of the adviser of Sheikh Zayed. In addition he used two car passes. This has caused great embarrassment to me and to the embassy staff, as it happened without their knowledge. The matter has come to the notice

Mustill L.J.

A of the British Foreign Office and also to the notice of the ministry of foreign affairs in Abu Dhabi. We have rectified the situation by withdrawing the above status and cancelling the tickets. You are well aware of the outcome if Mr. Fayed had managed to enter prohibited goods into this country using the above capacity and in the name of the embassy. This could have caused deterioration in the relationship B between the embassy and the authorities concerned, relationships which we were able to strengthen since the establishment of this embassy till the present, let alone the deterioration of the relationship between the embassy and H.H. Sheikh Zayed as a result of impersonating the identity of the adviser of His Highness by an unknown person.

C "Therefore, I have decided to transfer you to the head office of the ministry of foreign affairs in Abu Dhabi, referring the whole matter to the ministry to take whatever action they deem necessary. I have informed the departments concerned in the embassy that your diplomatic status has now been withdrawn and instructed them to claim any possessions under your charge which are the property of the embassy, such as the car and the house leased for your use.

D "This takes effect from today's date.

"I have also notified the British Foreign Office of this action.

"Finally, would you please accept my sincere thanks and appreciation of your previous service in this Embassy which I hope will continue in the ministry of foreign affairs in the future, effect and then take full charge of the responsibilities of Mr. Nabil Hijazi.

F "Copy to the ministry of foreign affairs in Abu Dhabi to complete the arrangements of transfer in accordance with normal procedure."

G As contemplated by its terms, this document was delivered to and read by Mr. Nabil Hijazi, and also by certain officials in the ministry at Abu Dhabi. This led to the temporary recall of Mr. Nabil Hijazi for discussions, but ultimately he returned to his post as counsellor in London. Meanwhile, Mr. Nabil Hijazi has shown the memorandum to the plaintiff. His motives for doing so were controversial, but there is no suggestion that his act was the consequence of any express authorisation by the defendant or anyone else.

H On 3 May 1983, the plaintiff issued the writ in the present action, claiming damages for libel contained in the memorandum, and alleging publication to Mr. Nabil Hijazi. An injunction was also claimed. The writ was followed on 27 May 1983 by a statement of claim also alleging that the defendant wrote and published the letter to Mr. Nabil Hijazi or caused it to be so written and published. It was pleaded that the plain and ordinary meaning of the words was that:

"(i) The plaintiff had obtained two passes to enter Heathrow Airport in his car under false pretences, that is to say by pretending to be acting on behalf of the embassy of the United Arab Emirates. (ii) The plaintiff had impersonated the identity of an adviser Sheikh Zayed in the V.I.P. lounge at Heathrow Airport. (iii) The plaintiff had been using these devices with a view to importing unlawfully prohibited goods into the United Kingdom.”

Next, on 28 June the defendant swore an affidavit setting out that he had in the past resigned as ambassador, but that his re-appointment was awaiting confirmation from the United Kingdom authorities. He went on to summarise his relationship with the ruler. He concluded:

“10. It will be observed from the statement of claim that the plaintiff complains of a document purporting to be an inter-departmental memorandum published within the [United Arab Emirates] embassy and dated 1 September 1982. At that date I was no longer ambassador and had left the country the previous month to return to Dubai, and I was at that time visiting Germany with H.H. Sheikh Rashid who was undergoing medical treatment in Baden Baden. I neither wrote nor signed the memorandum. I have no knowledge of the circumstances in which it came to be written.

“11. I am advised that, since I have arrived in this country to take up my appointment as ambassador, the Foreign Office having been notified of my appointment, I am immune from the jurisdiction of this court . . .

“13. In any event it is my respectful submission that this . . . court should decline to investigate in these libel proceedings or at all an internal communication made within a foreign embassy. If there are to be proceedings in respect of such a communication, then in my respectful submission they would be more conveniently dealt with, with less oppressive consequences for me, in the courts of Dubai where, so my solicitors advise me having made inquiries of their own, civil remedies for falsehoods and penal provisions for defamation exist, in addition to the remedies available via the Sharia or religious law where a person's reputation has been injured.”

This affidavit was followed by an application to a Queen's Bench master for an order to set aside service on the ground:

“the defendant having been out of jurisdiction when the writ was issued and/or serving and striking out the endorsement on the writ and/or the statement of claim and/or dismissing or staying this action, upon the grounds that the defendant is immune from the jurisdiction of this . . . court and/or that it is oppressive for this action to be brought in England when it would be dealt with conveniently by a court in the United Arab Emirates and/or that the content and circumstances of publication of the memorandum complained of in this action are such that its author is protected by an absolute privilege and/or that this . . . court cannot or should not inquire into it, should be dismissed.”

The application was dismissed on 11 July 1983, and although a notice of appeal was lodged, it appears that this was never proceeded with. One month later the defendant's reinstatement as ambassador became effective.

The next step took place during January 1984, when a defence was served, denying that the defendant had written or published or caused to be written or published the letter in question. The pleading concluded:

“6. Further or in the alternative, the document reproduced in paragraph 1 of the statement of claim appears on its face to be an

3 W.L.R.

Fayed v. Al-Tajir (C.A.)

Mustill L.J.

A interdepartmental memorandum of the embassy of the United Arab Emirates. Communications relating to matters of state, made by one officer of state to another, are absolutely privileged and cannot be made the subject of an action for libel.

B “7. The defendant was the ambassador of the United Arab Emirates to the Court of St. James until 1 August 1982, and since his reappointment in 1983 is again the ambassador of the United Arab Emirates. For the avoidance of doubt, and for the purpose of this action only, he hereby expressly waives any claim of his to diplomatic immunity.

C “8. Further or in the further alternative, this . . . court should decline jurisdiction upon the ground that it is not the convenient or appropriate forum for the resolution of this action. Each party is a citizen of the United Arab Emirates and ordinarily resident in Dubai. The plaintiff’s complaint is in respect of a document which appears on its face to be in his own language and to have passed from one fellow countryman of his to another, within the embassy of his own country. The Emirate of Dubai has courts and a law of defamation.”

D Nothing of any materiality then happened until 15 November 1985, when the plaintiff re-amended his statement of claim to allege publication to a list of 12 persons: it is unnecessary to state the details. Soon afterwards, in response to an interrogatory the defendant deposed:

E “As to Nabil Hijazi I did not send the said memorandum to him. A memorandum containing the said words was written and sent to Nabil Hijazi by Mirza Al-Sayegh Chargé d’Affaires on or about 7 September 1982. At a meeting between, inter alia, myself and the said Mirza Al-Sayegh he sought my advice as to whether such a memorandum should be sent. I advised him that he should act in what he considered to be the best interests of the United Arab Emirates and its embassy for which, after my resignation as ambassador he was then responsible and did not seek to dissuade him from his proposed course. I have therefore given instructions to my solicitors to amend my defence so as to accept responsibility for publication of the said memorandum to Nabil Hijazi.”

There was then a consequential amendment to the defence, maintaining the denial that the defendant wrote or sent the letter, but admitting that he caused it to be sent.

G Thus matters stood when the action came to trial. A substantial issue which had to be explored by the judge, but which did not arise before us, was whether there was publication in the United Kingdom to any of the persons named in the list added to the statement of claim by re-amendment: for it was conceded that the defence of absolute privilege could not be established if such wider publication occurred and was a natural consequence of the initial publication to the addressee. In the event, the judge held that so far as there was any publication outside the embassy, this was neither intended by the defendant nor the natural and probable consequence of the publication by him to Mr. Nabil Hijazi. There was no appeal against this finding.

H Accordingly, the issue left for decision was whether the publication by a person acting as ambassador although not accredited as such, to the counsellor of the embassy with a copy to chargé d’affaires, of a document concerning the conduct of the addressee in his official capacity, and the termination of his posting, was actionable at the suit of the plaintiff in the English court. The judge held that it was not, on the ground set out in paragraph 6 of the defence—namely that the document, being a communication by one officer of state to another, relating to a matter of state, was the subject of absolute privilege and could not be made the subject of an action for libel.

On the hearing of the appeal, the arguments on both sides were cast in wider terms than before the judge. Accordingly, it is convenient to begin with a survey of the statutes and reported decisions touching on this branch of the law. These may be arranged according to subject matter, as follows.

1. The immunity from production of certain categories of state documents. It is unnecessary to enter here into the complexities, not yet fully resolved, of “class privilege.” It is sufficient to say that since the 18th century the courts have recognised the need to abstain from requiring the production of communications addressed by or to high officers of state relating to matters within their competence. As Lord Ellenborough C.J. said, in relation to letters from the Under Secretary of State for the Colonial Department to the Secretary of State, “I do not like the breaking in upon this correspondence”: Anderson v. Hamilton (Note) (1816) 8 Price 244, 246.

2. The refusal by the court to allow certain categories of documents, or copies of them, to be proved and put in evidence at the trial: see Home v. Lord Bentinck (1820) 2 Brod. & B. 130 and Chatterton v. Secretary of State for India in Council [1895] 2 Q.B. 189.

3. The recognition, by treating the publication as the subject of absolute privilege, that the publication of certain categories of state documents does not found a cause of action in damages. Such publication has been referred to as an “act of state.” That documents of this kind may be the subject of absolute privilege is undoubted, and it is clear that the court must take into account the position occupied by the sender and the recipient, and the nature and subject matter of the communication. The precise boundaries of the protection have, however, yet to be established: contrast Chatterton v. Secretary of State for India in Council (despatch by Secretary of State to Under-Secretary concerning the removal of the plaintiff to the half pay list); Royal Aquarium and Summer and Winter Garden Society Ltd. v. Parkinson [1892] 1 Q.B. 431 (oral report by member of London County Council to a meeting of the council concerning the grant of licences); M. Isaacs and Sons Ltd. v. Cook [1925] 2 K.B. 391 (report by Australian High Commissioner to Prime Minister on commercial matters involving the interests of the Commonwealth); Gibbons v. Duffell (1932) 47 C.L.R. 520 (report on subordinate by police inspector to superintendent); Jackson v. Magrath (1947) 75 C.L.R. 293; Peerless Bakery Ltd. v. Watts [1955] N.Z.L.R. 339 (communication by Minister of Industry and Commerce to the Secretary of the Wheat Commission); Merricks v. Nott-Bower [1965] 1 Q.B. 57 (minute by deputy commissioner of police to commissioner regarding transfer of senior officers); Reg. v. Lewes Justices, Ex parte Secretary of State for Home Department [1973] A.C. 388 (letter by assistant chief constable to Gaming Board in response to a request for information concerning an application for a gaming licence) and Hasselblad (G.B.) Ltd. v. Orbinson [1985] Q.B. 475 (letter of complaint to Commission of European Community).

4. The immunity from suit of an officer of the Crown in respect of acts done abroad otherwise than under colour of legal right. This also is

Fayed v. Al-Tajir (C.A.)

Mustill L.J.

A referred to as immunity in respect of an “act of state.” It is unnecessary to cite the authorities since they are far from the present point.

5. The refusal of the court, save in exceptional cases, to inquire into the validity and policy of foreign municipal legislation so far as it relates to matters done purportedly in furtherance of such legislation within the territory of the foreign state. This also is often referred to as an example of “act of state.” Here again, citation is unnecessary.

B 6. The abstention by the court, in certain circumstances, from adjudication upon the act of a foreign sovereign state—at least when the act is done within the territory of the foreign state. This doctrine, also described as being concerned with “act of state,” was discussed in Buttes Gas and Oil Co. v. Hammer [1982] A.C. 888.

C 7. The refusal by the court to entertain any claim against a foreign sovereign or state, or a diplomatically accredited officer thereof, except in respect of certain types of transaction, unless the immunity is waived by the sovereign or a person having the power to communicate a waiver on his behalf: the State Immunity Act 1978. This principle does not deny the existence of a cause of action against the sovereign or his officer, but rather makes it impossible for the cause of action to be enforced: see Dickinson v. Del Solar [1930] 1 K.B. 376, 381.

D 8. The recognition by the state and by the courts that the person of the foreign sovereign and his accredited officers should be protected from affront: article 29 of the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, as set out in Schedule 1 to the Diplomatic Privileges Act 1964.

E 9. As an aspect of the principle just stated, the recognition by the state and by the courts that the correspondence of the sovereign and the documents of his diplomatic mission touching on its functions should be kept inviolate, in the sense that they must be protected from harm, and from perusal and use without the sovereign’s consent: see for a partial re-enactment of this long established principle of international law, article 24 of the Vienna Convention.

F I have divided the cases and statutes into categories to illustrate why in my judgment the application of them by analogy to a new situation should be embarked on with caution. Thus, the doctrine that certain types of document are invulnerable has developed over the years from a notion that they should not be taken out of the hands of high officers of state, to a refusal to allow them to be given in evidence, and finally to a ruling that such documents (or more accurately the publication of them) are the subject of absolute privilege. These consequences are not the same, as was pointed out by Roche J. in M. Isaacs and Sons Ltd. v. Cook [1925] 2 K.B. 391, 398, and Starke J. in Gibbons v. Duffell, 47 C.L.R. 520, 529. Granted, it is usually of no moment to either party whether the plaintiff fails for want of proof, or because the publication is incapable of founding a cause of action: see the observations of Lord Wilberforce in Buttes Gas and Oil Co. v. Hammer [1982] A.C. 888, 930, and Starke J. in Gibbons v. Duffell, 47 C.L.R. 520, 530. But the distinction may be important in a case such as the present, where the document, its contents and its publication are admitted in the pleadings, and where the document is disclosed on discovery and put in evidence at the trial without objection.

H Again, there is a risk that the terminology may prove misleading. The types of case identified as items 4, 5 and 6 above have all been discussed in terms of the label “act of state.” Yet they are really quite unrelated, as regards their effect, boundaries and underpinnings of policy. There is a temptation to believe, because the events with which the present action is concerned were in one sense “foreign” and because they bear some resemblance to the type of English communication which has been characterised as an “act of state” in the passage from Fraser on Libel and Slander (Law and Practice), 7th ed. (1936), p. 127, quoted in more than one of the cases, that we are here concerned with a “foreign act of state.” This might encourage the court to explore the limits of that doctrine, such as were discussed in I. Congreso del Partido [1983] 1 A.C. 244, and treat them as applicable here. In my judgment this would be a mistake.

Furthermore, although it is quite clear that the protection is derived in every one of these cases from considerations of public policy, it is equally clear that these considerations are not the same throughout. Thus the rationale of cases such as Chatterton v. Secretary of State for India in Council [1895] 2 Q.B. 189, is that the direct interests of the community in the United Kingdom demand that an officer of a certain status should be able to communicate candidly on certain subjects without running the risk of being brought before the court as defendant or witness, and examined on the accuracy or honesty of what he has written. Plainly, there is no such direct interest where the document passes between two persons quite unconnected with the government and administration of the realm, on matters which are equally so unconnected. If there is to be the protection now claimed by the defendant it must either rest on the grounds of comity which in one shape or another underlie items 5 to 9 above, or on some other ground altogether.

For these reasons I would prefer not to venture any extension of the principle exemplified by Chatterton v. Secretary of State for India in Council, to documents created within and for the purposes of a foreign diplomatic mission. Rather, I would look to see whether there is any ground upon which immunity should be granted because the United Kingdom has an interest in conceding to other states those privileges which it would in kindred circumstances wish to be accorded by the foreign state.

Before addressing this question it is convenient to deal with four reported cases which might be said to shed light on the present problem.

The first is Hart v. Gumpach (1872) L.R. 4 P.C. 439. The defendant was the inspector general of customs of the Chinese government at a time when a unique condominium existed after the Treaties of Tientsin. The plaintiff had been professor of mathematics and astronomy at a college of western language and science which had been established by the Chinese government. The plaintiff raised an action before a court in China, which had jurisdiction over disputes between British subjects. Amongst his complaints was an allegation that the defendant had libelled him in a letter written to the head of a body called the Foreign Board at Peking. On appeal to the Privy Council against a verdict in favour of the plaintiff it was held that the communication was at least subject to qualified privilege. The Board did not, as I understand their opinion, reach a distinct conclusion on whether it was also entitled to absolute privilege, there being insufficient facts upon which to decide the question, and since a retrial was ordered it must, I think, be taken that a case for absolute privilege was not made out. But this cannot in my judgment be regarded as any authority against the defendant in the present case, for the circumstances of the two actions are quite different. The one concerned a claim by one British subject against another in respect of acts done abroad, in fulfilment of an office in a government which, so far as the court was concerned, was in one sense “local,” and in another not. Here by contrast the claim springs from dealings between foreigners in England in relation to the business of a

3 W.L.R.

Fayed v. Al-Tajir (C.A.)

Mustill L.J.

A government which is not in any sense local, but which has an embassy here entitled to the protection of the English state and the English court.

Next, there was M. Isaacs and Sons Ltd. v. Cook [1925] 2 K.B. 391. The plaintiffs carried on business in London as auctioneers of fruit. The defendant was High Commissioner of the Commonwealth of Australia in the United Kingdom. In the course of his duties he wrote a report on the outcome of sales of Australian fruit, in terms which the plaintiffs alleged were defamatory of themselves. The defendant contended that the report was absolutely privileged. The plaintiffs argued for the contrary view, primarily on the ground that the matter was of a commercial nature and did not concern a state matter, such as was involved in Chatterton v. Secretary of State for India in Council [1895] 2 Q.B. 189. On a preliminary issue, Roche J. held in favour of the defendant. In my judgment, there are two reasons why this decision does not point to any conclusion in the present case. First, because the question whether the principle stated in Fraser on Libel and Slander (Law and Practice) 1st ed. (1893), p.95, and adopted in Chatterton v. Secretary of State for India in Council [1895] 2 Q.B. 187, 191, and other cases had any application at all to a communication between persons who were not, in the most direct sense, officers of the Crown, does not appear to have been canvassed. Second, because the closeness of the relationship between the Commonwealth of Australia and the United Kingdom involved considerations of public policy much more immediate than those called forth by the need to maintain cordially reciprocal relations with foreign states. I think it unsafe to make any assumption as to what Roche J. would have held if the suit had concerned the transactions of persons, who owed no allegiance to the Crown, regarding the business of a foreign state.

At first sight, the next case in chronological sequence, namely Szalatnay-Stacho v. Fink [1947] K.B. 1, appears much closer to the present point. It is, however, necessary to examine rather carefully what the case actually decided. The plaintiff, a Czech national, was the Czechoslovak diplomatic representative in Egypt during the second world war. The defendant, also a Czech national, was the chief military prosecutor of the Czech army. The defendant had received a number of written statements concerning the activities of the plaintiff whilst on diplomatic service. He forwarded these statements to the Military Office of the President of the Czech Republic (in exile), with a covering letter which explained that since the plaintiff was a civilian the defendant had no jurisdiction to bring criminal proceedings against him, but that the charges made in the statements were so grave that he considered it his duty to bring them to the attention of the President. He then went on to enumerate sections of the Czech criminal law which were alleged to have been contravened. Ultimately this letter came to the notice of the plaintiff, who brought an action in libel in the English court, to which the defendant responded with a plea of absolute privilege.

At first instance, this plea was upheld. Henn-Collins J. took little time to dispose of arguments that the publication was privileged because the dossier was an act of state, or a step in the proceedings of a military tribunal, so as to bring it within the protection afforded by the reported cases. As to the former, the communication did not take place at a sufficiently high level to qualify as a state matter, of the kind contemplated in Chatterton v. Secretary of State for India in Council [1895] 2 Q.B. 189. As to the latter, it had nothing to do with disciplinary proceedings, and did not touch any matter over which the military tribunal had any jurisdiction.

The judge did however give effect to another consideration. Expert evidence had established that an action such as the one before him would be inconceivable in Czechoslovakia, since the defendant was a state official and acting as such. Having reached this point, the judge continued (1945) 174 L.T. 191, 193:

“That raises the question whether, by the comity of nations, His Majesty’s courts should extend to communications such as this, passing between Czech nationals on Czech affairs, the same protection as their own domestic courts would afford. It is, of course, only by comity that protection could be afforded, even to the acts of state of a foreign government, for we, here, have no direct interest in the good government of any foreign power, however friendly—but equally, of course, we have an indirect interest; and it has been indicated in Hart v. Gumpach, L.R. 4 P.C. 439, that in some circumstances it may be against the public interests of this country to entertain a suit involving an inquiry into reports made by an officer in the service of a foreign state to the government of that state, and that one of those circumstances would be the fact that such a communication would be protected in the foreign state. That, as I have found, is the case with this communication. Is it proper in this case to apply the doctrine which the Privy Council thought it might be proper to apply in the very circumstances which have arisen here? If the comity of nations is ever to be applied, it should surely be applied where the document in question was published in this country only because the foreign government, being our allies, were our guests while their unhappy country was occupied by our common enemy. I therefore think I ought to apply it, and to hold that this dossier is absolutely privileged.”

On appeal, the case took a rather strange course. Counsel for the defendant expressly disclaimed the ground of comity on which Henn-Collins J. had decided in his favour, and also any argument based on act of state, the sole ground relied upon being that the defendant’s report was a step in judicial proceedings. The Court of Appeal rejected this argument for very much the same reasons as were given in the court below. It was, however, considered necessary also to discuss the argument which the defendant had disclaimed. Delivering the judgment of the court, Somervell L.J. said, at p. 11:

“Before considering this reasoning, it is necessary, in order to deal with Mr. Slade’s first argument under this issue, to consider the question on somewhat wider lines. The application of the principle of absolute privilege to foreign official documents is one on which there is little, if any, direct authority. The principle in our law is based on public interest, and, as it seems to us, would not necessarily apply to corresponding foreign documents. At the material time the Czechoslovak government was in this country as our ally in the war. This was an unprecedented state of affairs. Whatever may be the position in normal circumstances it may well be that in these circumstances the public interest would justify the application to Czechoslovak official documents of the principle applied to our own documents.”

Somervell L.J. then went on to discuss the question whether the document was the first step in criminal proceedings, and after dealing with this continued, at p. 12:

3 W.L.R.

Fayed v. Al-Tajir (C.A.)

Mustill L.J.

A “Henn-Collins J. based his decision, as we have stated, on a different principle. Although the document was made and published in England, he felt that he must consider what would have been the rights of the parties if the action had come before a Czechoslovakian court. In Hart v. Gumpach, L.R. 4 P.C. 439, the observations were obiter and the position was, as it seems to us, essentially different. The action was brought before Her Majesty’s Supreme Court for China. It was between two British subjects, both in the service of the Chinese Government, and was based on false representations alleged to have been made by the defendant in his official capacity in China. In that case, therefore, everything had happened in China, the country whose law it was suggested might be applied to the documents. Here everything happened in England. Having due regard to the exceptional position of the Czechoslovak Government, we do not think that the principle of the comity of nations compels or entitles the courts of this country to apply Czechoslovak law to acts done here, in proceedings in tort between Czechoslovak citizens, that law giving a general protection in civil suits to acts done by officials, which is not afforded under our law. This would be to make an inroad on a very fundamental principle. If there is to be such an application of foreign law in the circumstances set out it would, in our opinion, have to be expressly provided for by legislation. We, therefore, decide that this document was not absolutely privileged.”

E Although these passages might perhaps be regarded as obiter dicta since they were dealing with a proposition which had not been advanced, I would have thought it right to give effect to them, if they had been directly in point. But I do not think that they are. The document in suit here is not just a “foreign official document” but an embassy document; the issue is not whether the court should allow to the defendant such immunities from liability or suit as he would have enjoyed if he had been sued in his own country under his own law, but whether the litigation is of a kind upon which the English court should engage itself at all. This being so, I believe that Szalatnay-Stacho v. Fink [1947] K.B. 1, does not preclude this court from tackling the present problem de novo.

F Finally, there was Richards v. Naum [1967] 1 Q.B. 620. The subject matter of the alleged libel was a report by a colonel in the office of special investigations in the United States Air Force, stationed in England, to a general in that force, concerning the continued employment of the plaintiff, a civilian investigative officer. If the court had decided whether absolute privilege attached to such a document, the case would have been of the greatest interest. But it did not, the sole conclusion expressed being that the law was insufficiently certain, and the facts and the law so likely to be intertwined, that the issue was not one which could appropriately be decided as a preliminary point. Unfortunately, therefore, Richards v. Naum does not advance the present discussion.

H In these circumstances, I am unable to find in any statute or decided case a rule of law which leads directly to a solution of the issue now before the court. Specifically, there is to my mind nothing material in the cases in the first three categories listed above, all of which are concerned with what may be termed “United Kingdom act of state,” for these are founded on considerations of public policy which have no bearing on the present case. I therefore do not pause to discuss the questions, much pressed in argument, whether if this line of authority had been relevant the positions occupied by the defendant, Mr. Nabil Hijazi and the plaintiff, and the nature and circumstances of the document and publication sued upon, were such as to bring this action within its scope. If there is to be immunity from liability, it must rest on the other aspect of public policy, described briefly by the word "comity." Here it seems to me that there are matters which provide an important background to any consideration of the problem, even though not pointing unequivocally to a solution, namely that (i) the law of nations, as reflected in the Vienna Convention treats embassy documents as sacrosanct, and (ii) there are situations in which the English court will find it inexpedient to investigate the actions of a foreign state or legislature, even though they fall within its formal jurisdiction.

Against this background, one returns to the question: Should the English court engage upon an inquiry as to the merits of a letter written or caused to be written by one person exercising high supervisory functions in a foreign embassy to a senior official of that embassy concerning the latter's continued employment at the embassy, and raising questions as to the conduct of the plaintiff (a foreign national) in relation to privileges obtained for him by the embassy? We are here, as elsewhere in this field, faced with conflicting aspects of public policy: the need to confine to an absolute minimum any curtailment of the right of a litigant to bring an action for recompense in respect of wrong committed in England, and the need to confine to an absolute minimum any meddling by the English court in the affairs of a foreign sovereign. In general, it would seem to me that the latter consideration should prevail, unless there is some objection in general or in the circumstances of this particular case.

So far as concerned the general objections, the plaintiff relied on the following. First, that there was no need to grant absolute privilege to communications of this kind, since qualified privilege would furnish the defendant with all the protection which in justice he could reasonably require. In my view, whilst this objection might have force if we were considering immunity based on "act of state," it is beside the point here, since the issues of justification and malice which would often be opened up by a plea of qualified privilege would require precisely that inquiry into the workings of the foreign embassy which (if I am right in the general approach suggested above) an English court ought to abjure.

Next, it is urged that diplomatic immunity is sufficient to secure the interests of justice and to maintain the dignity of the foreign sovereign, and that there is no need to superimpose on this a doctrine which would enable a person to publish damaging material in England without any cause of action even coming into existence. I can see much more force in this argument, but I must disagree. The respect owed by one state to the sovereign of another and to his diplomatic representatives is allied to but not the same as a voluntary abstention by the courts of the receiving state from inquiring into the conduct of his embassy. A foreign sovereign might well take the view that his dignity would be impaired rather than maintained by insisting on a personal immunity for one of his officers in respect of a civil suit, and I believe that in practice such an attitude is nowadays by no means uncommon. But this is not inconsistent with an attitude on the part of the court that the matter is not apt for investigation, and that the author of an embassy document such as the present should be answerable (if at all) for what he says only in the courts of his own country.

Allied to the argument just discussed is the point that whereas the statutes confer on the diplomat, both inviolability of person and immunity

Fayed v. Al-Tajir (C.A.)

Mustill L.J.

A from suit, there is in the case of documents an express reference only to inviolability. I do not find this argument convincing. The statutes and conventions do not form a complete code for the operation of public policy in the field of comity, as witness the various versions of the doctrine of foreign act of state, all of which are creations of the common law. I can B see no reason why the fact that a particular ground of policy does not have statutory recognition should prevent the court from giving it whatever weight may be thought fit.

C Finally, it is contended that if immunity is granted in circumstances such as these, the net will be cast wider than if the subject had been a communication between officers of the Crown. This is factually correct, in the sense that persons of less rank than the high officers of state contemplated by the Chatterton line of authority would be enabled to avoid liability. I do not however regard this as a valid objection, since the D considerations of policy are quite different, and may be expected to yield different results in the individual case.

E Those were the grounds upon which the plaintiff contended that communications of this general type were not the subject of immunity.
There were in addition certain aspects of this particular case where, so it was argued, the court should not uphold the pleaded defence. First, it D was submitted that since the document in suit has not been the subject of any contested application for disclosure and adduction in evidence, but has rather been disclosed voluntarily in the list of documents, admitted in the pleadings and put in evidence without objection: so that no question of violating embassy documents can arise. This is true enough, but the conduct of the trial has lain in the hands of the defendant individual, not of E the Government of the Emirates. No renunciation by the government of its right to be free from the inspection of its affairs by the English court (if indeed such a renunciation could be effective) is to be inferred merely from the fact that it has taken no step to intervene: and in any event, I have not founded my conclusion in favour of the defendant directly on article 24 of the Vienna Convention, but have rather used it as a part of the general background against which the considerations of public policy are to be F assessed. Similarly, I do not regard it as conclusive that in this particular instance no inquiry into the merits of the dispute will be required, since there are no pleas of justification or qualified privilege; for it seems to me that the decision by the court as to whether or not an action of this kind should be entertained ought not to depend on a decision by the individual parties as to the way in which they choose to contest it.

G Equally, I do not think it an answer that the defendant was not an ambassador at the relevant time. This would indeed have been important if the case were to be assimilated to the Chatterton line of authority, for as Lopes L.J. observed in Royal Aquarium and Summer and Winter Garden Society Ltd. v. Parkinson [1892] 1 Q.B. 431, 451, that kind of immunity appears to attach to the person rather than the character of the document.
H However, for the reasons already stated I believe that the reverse is true when questions of comity are involved, and if I am right in treating this as the type of document which the English court ought not to admit as the foundation of a suit, the formal position of the writer should not be conclusive.

For these reasons therefore I would arrive at the same conclusion as the judge, albeit by a rather different route. Since the matter in fact proceeded to trial I would give effect to the conclusion by holding that the document was subject to absolute privilege. Whether at an earlier stage the court's unwillingness to enter on the matter could have been demonstrated by staying the proceedings need not now be discussed. (In this connection I should mention that neither party contended that the interlocutory proceedings before the master during 1983 had the result of creating an issue estoppel, or otherwise affecting the outcome of the trial itself).

In conclusion, I must draw attention to the waiver of diplomatic immunity contained in paragraph 7 of the defence which had been a source of concern in two respects, both arising from the defendant's dual capacity as head of the mission (which consequent authority to waive diplomatic immunity for all members of the mission, including himself) and as litigant (with consequent power to determine the shape of the issues before the court). First, because of the apparent inconsistency between the waiver of immunity and the assertion of absolute privilege. I say "apparent" because on reflection I do not consider that there is any real conflict between the two; since although both immunities derive ultimately from the same general concept of comity, the means by which this concept is put into effect are not indetical, and do leave room for a stance enabling the foreign sovereign at the same time to permit his representative to put himself formally in peril of a judgment, and yet to permit him also to raise a defence which will maintain the assertion that embassy transactions are not a proper subject for inquiry.

The second ground for hesitation was the form in which the waiver of sovereign immunity was expressed. I have no doubt that this was inappropriate. The defence was a document formulated on behalf of the defendant qua individual litigant, not ambassador, and was not the correct vehicle for a renunciation of the immunities belonging to the foreign sovereign. If my conclusion on the main issue had been that the appeal ought to be allowed, and judgment given for the plaintiff, it would have been for careful consideration whether the court of its own motion should make inquiries so as to satisfy itself that the defendant did indeed have authority to convey the waiver. In the event, however, the waiver has no potential effect on the outcome of the proceedings. Bearing in mind that the defendant was not an accredited diplomat at the time when the action was commenced, and that it proceeded to trial and judgment without any question being raised, I think it legitimate to allow the matter to rest.

For these reasons, therefore, I would dismiss the appeal.

CROOM-JOHNSON L.J. I have read the judgments of both Kerr and Mustill L.JJ. I agree with them and have nothing to add.

KERR L.J. The memorandum whose contents and publication form the basis of this action for libel was in every respect a "diplomatic" or "embassy" document in the sense that it appertained to the embassy in this country of a friendly sovereign state. It was the property of the embassy or of the foreign state. It was an inter-departmental memorandum on embassy paper addressed by one embassy official to another, both acting within the course of their official duties. Publication of its contents by or on behalf of the defendant took place only within the embassy and to its ministry of foreign affairs. And the contents of the document related to the plaintiff only in the context of matters which were of concern to the embassy, to the dignity of the state which it represented, and to their joint relations with H.M. Government. The fact that the contents may not have been of a high degree of importance to the foreign state in comparison with their seriousness for the plaintiff's reputation must be irrelevant to the status of

A the document as such. Even without each and every of the attributes of the document enumerated above—and I express no opinion about the point at which the line falls to be drawn—there can be no doubt that the document falls within article 24 of the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations which provides (Schedule 1 to the Diplomatic Privileges Act 1964): “The B archives and documents of the mission shall be inviolable at any time and wherever they may be.” As Mustill L.J. said at the beginning of his judgment, this is a curious case. It is curious that a dispute arising out of a document of this nature should have found its way into our courts. Since it did, it is not surprising that this resulted from a curious combination of circumstances. The document, or a copy of it, came into the possession of the plaintiff. When he issued his writ, the defendant was not the C ambassador. He had been the ambassador and knew that he would shortly be re-appointed. In the interim he exercised the authority of head of mission internally, to the knowledge of all concerned. He had neither written nor dictated the memorandum. But he had discussed the problems reflected in its contents in the course of his position as de facto head of mission. He was therefore in a doubly ambivalent situation. First, he was not the author of the memorandum. But when an action for defamation was brought upon it, he felt that he must accept responsibility for it in the D circumstances. Secondly, when he was then re-appointed to the post of ambassador and his defence fell to be served, this expressly waived his diplomatic immunity, for reasons and in circumstances which are unclear, as mentioned below. At the same time, however, and more or less in the same breath, he has maintained throughout, on various grounds and in different ways, that an action founded upon this embassy document is not E properly justiciable in our courts. This is no doubt a situation without precedence in our jurisprudence. But in the upshot, because of this curious combination of circumstances, it is necessary to decide as a matter of principle whether or not this action is properly maintainable and should be allowed to proceed, in which case our courts would have to adjudicate on the issues raised by the contents and publication of this document.

F What would that involve in practice? In the normal course of an action of this kind it must involve the truth or otherwise of the allegations concerning the plaintiff; the circumstances in which these allegations were made, for the purpose of seeking to establish a prima facie defence of qualified privilege; and then no doubt the usual issue as to the good faith or possible malice of the person responsible for them. Having G regard to the contents of the document, the full ventilation and exposure of these issues, and the decision of our courts upon them, would be bound to intrude upon the internal policies and practices of this embassy, and thereby reflect upon the United Arab Emirates in a manner which might affect relations with this country.

However, the embarrassment for United Arab Emirates which could result from the public discussion of the issues likely to be raised in this particular case is not in itself any ground for deciding whether this dispute H is properly justiciable in our courts. That question must be decided as a matter of principle by reference to the nature and status of the document on which the claim is based. But the likely consequences of justiciability for the dignity of a foreign friendly state and its embassy in this country illustrate the need for the application of a rule of public policy in order to decide that question.

I share entirely the views of Mustill L.J. that the justiciability of the dispute raised by this document cannot be determined by a process of attempting to put the present case into one of the categories of related issues raised by earlier cases in different contexts in times when international relations may have been less sensitive. The present case is sufficiently unparalleled in our corpus juris to require an independent approach, undeterred by the traditional reluctance of our courts to create new applications of rules of public policy. In that connection, and in the same way as Mustill L.J., I have reached the clear conclusion that the broad concept of international comity, in combination with the settled rule within that concept expressed by the "inviolability" of diplomatic documents, require us to hold that this dispute is not justiciable in our courts. In the context of an action for defamation this consequence can be expressed by holding that the publication of this document in the circumstances of this case is protected by absolute privilege; and I so hold. But the appropriate terminology is secondary to the non-justiciability of this dispute as a matter of principle. In that connection I think that it is irrelevant at what point and by what procedural means the objection to its justiciability is raised; viz. whether by an application to strike out the action, or by objecting to the production or admissibility of the document on discovery or in evidence, or by a defence of absolute privilege. The principles of comity and "inviolability" must be the same in all cases, at any rate where the action is founded upon the contents and publication of an embassy document.

Despite the novelty of the issue raised by this case, it seems to me that this conclusion is consistent with the general tenor of the authorities to which we were referred and not inconsistent with any of them. I derived the greatest direct assistance from the learned discussion of this question in the judgment of Bissonnette J. in the Supreme Court of Quebec in Rose v. The King [1947] 3 D.L.R. 618, with which the other members of the court agreed. The facts were briefly as follows. The defendant was a Canadian subject who had been convicted on charges of conspiracy with a group of Russian and Canadian subjects to violate the provisions of the Official Secrets Act 1939 in various ways which were prejudicial to the safety of Canada. Part of the evidence against him was contained in documents which Gouzenko, a cypher clerk in the Russian embassy in Ottawa, had stolen from the embassy files of the Russian Military Attaché, Zabotin, the central figure in a spy ring, which Gouzenko had handed over to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The documents were produced by Gouzenko as a witness at the trial and formed an important part of the evidence for the prosecution. The defendant Rose thereupon claimed that the documents were inadmissible on the ground that they were privileged and immune from use in any legal proceedings. Bissonnette J. summed up this argument, at p. 639:

"He maintains, and I feel well seized of his argument, both in his statement and at the hearing, that immunity, being an absolute privilege resulting from jus gentium, every court of justice, as soon as the matter sub judice permits establishing that this privilege is put in peril, is, erga omnes, without jurisdiction or competence to hear or to receive the deposition of a diplomatic agent and to take cognizance of documents which he offers in evidence, without the consent of the state that he represents."

The judgment continues with a lengthy and detailed review of the principles of international law relevant to this argument, with copious citations from text books of high authority. The fact that most of these were French is

3 W.L.R.

Fayed v. Al-Tajir (C.A.)

Kerr L.J.

A irrelevant, since the principles are those of jus gentium, and it was expressly pointed out that there was no relevant Canadian statute which affected the issue. The judge's conclusion that diplomatic documents were "inviolable" anticipated the use of the same term in the Vienna Convention of 1961, as do many passages from his judgment. The interesting point for present purposes, however, is the width of his conclusion about the concept of inviolability. He said, at p. 646:

B "International law creates a presumption of law that documents coming from an embassy have a diplomatic character and that every court of justice must refuse to acknowledge jurisdiction or competence in regard to them."

C This conclusion is supported by Denza on Diplomatic Law (1976), (published by Oceana Publications Inc. and the British Institute of International and Comparative Law) in the author's commentary on article 24 of the Vienna Convention, at p. 110, to which we were also referred.

D In Rose v. The King [1947] 3 D.L.R. 618 Bissonnette J. went on to hold that the immunity of diplomatic documents from use in legal proceedings was not absolute and that it did not avail the defendant in that case. He held that it could not be invoked by a Canadian citizen in litigation between his government and himself; nor when the documents revealed an abuse of diplomatic privilege by the foreign state which constituted a threat to the safety of the receiving state; nor—semble and quaere—in cases where no one connected with the foreign state or its embassy claimed any privilege for the documents. But none of these considerations applies here. Having read and re-read the judgment of Bissonnette J. I find that it fully supports my instinctive conclusion that the contents and publication of this embassy document must be treated as immune from the process of our courts for the purposes of an action such as the present. It falls within the concept of "inviolability" in the wide sense stated above, and no possible exception to that concept can be of any relevance in the present case.

F I equally agree with the remarks of Mustill L.J. expressing doubts about the circumstances concerning the defendant's waiver of diplomatic immunity. These involve two aspects which need to be emphasised. First, there is no inconsistency in principle between a waiver of the diplomatic immunity of a defendant and the assertion of a claim for immunity of a diplomatic or embassy document whose contents are sought to be introduced into the proceedings against him. Admittedly, the co-existence of the waiver and of the assertion is extraordinary in the present case, because every issue raised against the defendant, whose personal immunity has been waived, stems from the contents and publication of a document whose immunity has been asserted in the same breath. But I cannot see that this makes any difference in principle. It merely produces an extraordinary and apparently unprecedented situation. The waiver of the immunity from suit of the defendant does not destroy the claim for immunity of the document, since this is justified by the character of the document, irrespective of the defendant's submission to the court's jurisdiction against him personally.

H The second aspect is that the fact and circumstances of the waiver of the defendant's immunity are perplexing and unsatisfactory. It is elementary that only the sovereign can waive the immunity of its diplomatic representatives. They cannot do so themselves. For that reason alone the defendant's defence filed in the proceedings against him is not an appropriate vehicle for the manifestation of the sovereign's decision to waive the defendant's immunity. Moreover, a waiver which only purports to be manifested in this manner gives rise to doubts as to whether it really represents the act and will of the sovereign. In the present case I have remained throughout in the gravest doubt about the knowledge and understanding of the sovereign, the United Arab Emirates, concerning the issues and perhaps even the pendency of these proceedings. But, in the same way as Mustill L.J., I do not see that any purpose would be served at this stage by taking these aspects any further. I would only add that if I had felt any doubt about the correctness of the judge's decision in favour of the defence of absolute privilege, then I would—for myself—not have been willing to reverse his decision and allow this action to proceed without having made an attempt, through the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, to ascertain the attitude of the United Arab Emirates to this action.

Kerr L.J.

Employment—Unfair dismissal—Compensation—Assessment—Salary paid in lieu of notice and sum paid under employers' redundancy scheme—Whether "just and equitable" to deduct payments from compensatory award—Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 (c. 44), s. 74(1)(2)(b)

The employee was dismissed for redundancy on 20 July 1984 and was given a sum of money which included a payment of wages in lieu of notice of £704, a statutory redundancy payment of £703.95 and a payment under the employers' own redundancy scheme of £845. On 7 January 1985, the employee found new employment. In August 1985 an industrial tribunal held that the employee had been unfairly dismissed and they assessed compensation in the knowledge that on 30 September the employers' factory would close and all the remaining workforce would be made redundant. They calculated the compensatory award according to the provisions of section 74(1) of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978¹ and assessed his loss of earnings between 20 July 1984 and 30 September 1985, deducting from it the sum of £704, the payment in lieu of notice. The tribunal also deducted the payment of £845 from the total award.

3 W.L.R.

Addison v. Babcock F.A.T.A. Ltd. (C.A.)

On appeal by the employee against the amount of the compensation, the appeal tribunal held, inter alia, that the five weeks' wages in lieu of notice which the employee in fact received should not have been deducted in assessing the compensatory award under section 74(1) and that, moreover, he should be compensated for the difference between the wages in lieu of notice he actually received and the six weeks' wages in lieu of notice he would have received if instead of being unfairly dismissed on 20 July 1984 he had been made redundant on 30 September 1985, which difference amounted to £140.

On appeal by the employers:—

Held, allowing the appeal, that in considering in the light of good industrial practice what was just and equitable compensation to be awarded for unfair dismissal under section 74(1) of the Act of 1978, a tribunal should take into account and give the employer credit for any payments in lieu of wages and other benefits but not those wages earned by the employee from alternative employment during the period covered by the payment in lieu; that the industrial tribunal should have increased the compensation by the amount which the employee would have received in lieu of notice if he had been made redundant on 30 September 1985 less the amount of money the employee actually earned during those six weeks from the alternative employment which he had in fact found; and that the order of the appeal tribunal should be varied accordingly (post, pp. 134E—135B, G—136D, 143A—D).

APPEAL from the Employment Appeal Tribunal.

The employee, Michael Addison, applied to an industrial tribunal for compensation for unfair dismissal by his employers, Babcock F.A.T.A. Ltd. The tribunal, in awarding compensation for unfair dismissal, required the employee to give credit for certain payments made by the employers. The employee appealed to the Employment Appeal Tribunal on the ground, inter alia, that the industrial tribunal had erred in law in requiring him to give credit for payment of salary in lieu of notice, when assessing his compensatory award in accordance with section 74(1) of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978, and in deducting a payment of £845 payable under the employers' own redundancy scheme from the total award. The Employment Appeal Tribunal [1987] I.C.R. 45, on 7 July 1986, allowed the employee's appeal by varying the award of compensation.

The employers appealed on the grounds that the appeal tribunal had erred in law (1) in deciding that (a) in calculating the compensatory award under section 74 of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978, an industrial tribunal should not deduct from the amount to be awarded to the employee sums already received by the employee from the employer as pay in lieu of notice, (b) therefore the sum of £704 paid by the employers to the employee in July 1984 as pay in lieu of notice should not have been deducted from the compensatory award under section 74, and (c) the employers should pay a further sum of £140 to the employee in relation to pay in lieu of notice which would have been received by the employee after September 1985 had he not been unfairly dismissed in July 1984; and (2) in failing to decide that (a) the sum of £704 had been correctly deducted from the compensatory award by the industrial tribunal in that the payment of that sum in July 1984 had reduced the loss suffered by employee in respect of the unfair dismissal and it was just and equitable in all the circumstances to deduct that sum, and (b) the industrial tribunal should have awarded the employee an additional £240 in the compensatory award.

Cur. adv. vult.

5 March. The following judgments were handed down.

RALPH GIBSON L.J. This is an appeal by Babcock F.A.T.A. Ltd., the employers, from a decision of the Employment Appeal Tribunal given on 7 July 1986 whereby they increased a compensatory award made by the industrial tribunal upon a claim by the employee, Mr. Addison, based upon unfair dismissal. The amount in issue is not large but the points of principle which have been discussed are of importance. They concern the proper treatment in the calculation of a compensatory award of sums paid or payable by employers "in lieu of notice."

H

3 W.L.R.

Addison v. Babcock F.A.T.A. Ltd. (C.A.)

Ralph Gibson L.J.

A The employee was dismissed in July 1984 on the ground of redundancy. It was later determined that his dismissal was unfair. The industrial tribunal had to assess the proper compensatory award. The employee had been paid the sums calculated to be due by the employers who, in dealing with the grave misfortune of redundancy, were both generous and careful in following good industrial practice. The sums paid to the employee (rounding out the figures) were as follows.

B Redundancy payment—5 weeks at £140.79—£704; payment in lieu of notice—5 weeks at £140.79—£704; ex gratia payment—6 weeks at £140.79—£845. The £845 was described as company severance pay.

C Before the industrial tribunal and at both stages of appeal the facts have been to a large extent not in issue. It was common ground that if he had not been dismissed on 20 July 1984, the employee would have been dismissed on the ground of redundancy on 30 September 1985 when the employers made the entire workforce redundant. The task of the industrial tribunal was therefore to calculate, pursuant to section 74(1) of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978:

D “such amount as the tribunal considers just and equitable in all the circumstances having regard to the loss sustained by the complainant in consequence of the dismissal . . .”

and that loss would include the earnings and benefits which he would have been paid and which he might reasonably be expected to have received but for the dismissal in 1984.

E The award of the industrial tribunal was made up as follows: (i) Basic award: after deduction of the redundancy payment already made nothing was due. (ii) Total loss of earnings from 20 July 1984 to 19 August 1985, the date of the hearing. The employee obtained new employment on 7 January 1985. On the same date the wages which he would have been earning with the employers were increased. For the period from 20 July 1984 to 7 January 1985 the loss was 24 weeks at £125.23, a total of £3,005. From 7 January 1985 to 19 August 1985 the loss was 32 weeks at £132.74, a total of £4,247. From that total gross loss of £7,252 the industrial tribunal deducted the actual earnings of the employee after 7 January 1985 in the total sum of £2,969, leaving a net loss of £4,283. In addition the industrial tribunal deducted £704, the amount paid to the employee as five weeks' pay in lieu of notice calculated from 20 July 1984. After deducting that sum the award for loss of earnings was £3,579. (iii) For future loss for the six weeks from 19 August 1985 to 30 September 1985, when the employee would in any event have been made redundant, the industrial tribunal awarded £240, being six weeks at the net loss, or the difference between the earnings he would have been receiving from Babcock F.A.T.A. and his actual earnings in his new job. (iv) The industrial tribunal calculated sums for loss of B.U.P.A. health insurance cover, £233; loss of statutory industrial rights, £50; and loss of pension rights, £200: a sum of £483 in all. (v)

H The industrial tribunal then deducted from the total award the sum of £845 which had been paid to the employee as “company severance pay,” by way of ex gratia payment, as set out above. The reason for making that deduction given by the industrial tribunal was that there could be no claim to an ex gratia payment and the receipt of it by the employee in September 1985 was speculative.

Mr. Addison appealed to the Employment Appeal Tribunal. He contended that it was wrong in law to deduct the £704 which had been paid to him in lieu of notice, and wrong to deduct the £845 which he had received as an ex gratia payment. He also complained that the industrial tribunal had failed to increase the awards for redundancy and for wages in lieu of notice by reference to the extra year of work which the employee would have achieved with the employers if he had been allowed to stay in their employment until 30 September 1985. The sums would have been increased by one week's earnings. It is to be noted that the employee did not claim that he should receive both the £704 which the industrial tribunal had deducted and the £844 which he contended he would have received as wages in lieu of notice on 30 September 1985 if he had still been in the employment of the employers.

Before the appeal tribunal the area of dispute concerned two parts of the award. It is convenient to deal first with the deduction of £845 which the industrial tribunal made from the sum calculated as the net loss of earnings between 20 July 1984 and 30 September 1985 in respect of the £845 paid to the employee as an ex gratia payment under the company's severance pay scheme. Mr. Pannick submitted that the deduction could be justified, but the appeal tribunal rejected that submission and held that the £845 should not have been deducted. The employers have not appealed against that part of the order of the appeal tribunal and, in my view, they were right not to pursue the point.

The employers had acknowledged that if the employee had remained in their employment he would have been paid the sum of £845 as an ex gratia payment under the company's severance pay scheme precisely as the remaining staff were going to receive the appropriate sum under that scheme on 30 September 1985. That sum was accordingly a "benefit which he might reasonably be expected to have had but for" the unfair dismissal in July 1984 and it mattered not, on the facts of this case, that there was no enforceable legal obligation to pay under the scheme. He was paid the sum of £845 in July 1984. He would have received at least that sum in September 1985 under the same scheme. Therefore there was no reason to deduct £845 from his net loss of earnings.

There was in issue a sum of £210 by which the employee claimed that his ex gratia payment would have been increased under the company's severance pay scheme if he had stayed to 30 September 1985. The appeal tribunal held that in principle he was entitled to the amount claimed subject (in default of agreement) to proof of the figure; and they directed that, if need be, the case be remitted to the industrial tribunal for the issue of amount to be resolved. There has been no attempt to disturb that part of the order of the appeal tribunal.

The other area of dispute before the appeal tribunal was the proper handling of the sums paid or payable to the employee "in lieu of notice." That has been the live issue in this court. Before coming to the judgment of the appeal tribunal, it should be noted that the phrase "wages in lieu of notice" is a convenient and well understood phrase but it is commonly applied to a variety of circumstances. In fact in this case notice was given and wages were paid over the period of notice: by letter of 19 July 1984 the employee was told that his "official date for calculation purposes" would be 24 August 1984, that is to say, after expiry of the five weeks' notice. He was also told that he would not be required to work after 20 July 1984. He was paid in advance for the period of notice. Throughout this case the parties have been content to treat the employment as terminating on 20 July 1984. Nothing turns on that point in the circumstances of this case.

3 W.L.R.

Addison v. Babcock F.A.T.A. Ltd. (C.A.)

Ralph Gibson L.J.

A It was contended for the employers that the deduction of £704 paid for wages in lieu of notice was correct because the industrial tribunal had calculated the loss of wages from 20 July and not from 24 August when the five weeks' period of notice expired. The compensatory award was required by section 74 to be based on the loss sustained and the employee could not recover for the loss of wages which he had been B paid in full. The right way to deal with the benefit of wages in lieu of notice which, as the employers conceded, the employee could reasonably be expected to have received on 30 September 1985 was to allow a sum of six weeks instead of five weeks (by reason of the notional further year's employment) and to deduct from that sum what he was in fact at that time then earning so as to leave a claim of six times £40 or £240 in all. The appeal tribunal [1987] I.C.R. 45 rejected that argument and C ruled that there should be added to the award calculated by the industrial tribunal the sum of £844, representing the £704 which had been deducted and an additional £140 for the extra week.

D It seems to me that there is some risk of confusion in the process of correcting deductions by adding back. In order that we may receive the assistance of counsel in ensuring that the ultimate order of this court is correct, I will set out what I understand the full award would be if based upon the appeal tribunal's order:

(i) Loss of earnings from 20 July 1984 to 19 August 1985 ...	£7,252
Less actual earnings	£2,969
	£4,283
(ii) Future loss: 6 weeks at £40 to 30 September 1985	£240
(iii) Loss of B.U.P.A. benefit, industrial rights, pension	£483
(iv) Additional sum for statutory redundancy	£140
(v) Additional sum for payment in lieu of notice	£140
TOTAL	£5,286

F The £704 and £845 which the appeal tribunal ruled should not be deducted do not separately appear in that calculation because I have taken the figures for loss of earnings in the full amount without those deductions which the industrial tribunal had made. It is further to be noted that the amount for one week's wages added for the notional payments in September 1985 is at the gross rate of pay earned in July G 1984. It was not sought on this appeal to vary those amounts by reference to any increase in earnings after January 1985.

H It seems to me that the appeal tribunal approached the matter of the payment in lieu of notice as an issue to be decided by reference to a special principle of law. They referred to section 74(1) of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 and noted that the question of deduction of payments in lieu of notice had been the subject of a number of decisions. They referred first to T.B.A. Industrial Products
Ltd. v. Locke [1984] I.C.R. 228 and noted that in that case Browne-Wilkinson J., giving the judgment of the appeal tribunal, had said, at
p. 231:

"There cannot be any circumstances in which the . . . employer is not to be given credit for the payments he has made to the employee on account of his claims for wages and other benefits."

They referred next to Finnie v. Top Hat Frozen Foods [1985] I.C.R. 433, a decision of the appeal tribunal sitting in Scotland, in which Lord McDonald followed Clydebank Co-operative Society Ltd. v. Mackie (unreported), 22 August 1983, a decision of the appeal tribunal sitting in Scotland, in holding that a payment in lieu of notice need not be deducted from the compensatory award. Faced thus with two apparently conflicting decisions of the Employment Appeal Tribunal, they decided that they should follow Finnie v. Top Hat Frozen Foods [1985] I.C.R. 433 rather than what was said in T.B.A. Industrial Products Ltd. v. Locke [1984] I.C.R. 228 and concluded [1987] I.C.R. 45, 50:

“However, for the reasons set out by Lord McDonald in Finnie v. Top Hat Frozen Foods [1985] I.C.R. 433, we believe that the approach to section 74 and the phrase ‘just and equitable’ have to be looked at, not in the light of common law principles but in the light of good industrial practice, even though the duty to mitigate is specifically dealt with by section 74(4). Accordingly, if the decision in T.B.A. Industrial Products Ltd. v. Locke [1984] I.C.R. 228 is in conflict with that in the Finnie case, we prefer the decision of the Finnie case and propose to follow it. We do this first because we believe it accords with good industrial practice; secondly because comity requires that similar principles should be adopted both in the English and the Scottish divisions of this appeal tribunal; and thirdly because in the sphere of industrial relations it is more important that the law should be clear than clever.”

The reasoning of the appeal tribunal in this case, and in the cases cited appears to me to have proceeded thus. The decision in Clydebank Co-operative Society Ltd. v. Mackie (unreported), 22 August 1983 was based upon or supported by the view of the lay members that “in good industrial practice the statutory entitlement to wages in lieu of notice is regarded as something to which an employee is automatically entitled, irrespective of any other payments which may be due.” In Finnie’s case the fact that the entitlement was not statutory but contractual was held to be no ground of distinction. If an employee is paid wages in lieu of notice and is lucky enough to get new employment during the period of notice he is not required to pay back or give credit for the wages earned from the new employer. If an employee is not so fortunate as to get new employment during the period of notice he should be entitled to have his statutory, or contractual, entitlement to wages in lieu of notice regarded as a matter apart and to have compensation for unfair dismissal calculated irrespective of it. The lay members of the appeal tribunal in the present case were in full agreement with the view expressed as to good industrial practice by the appeal tribunal in the two Scottish cases and that “management/union negotiations would be prejudiced if this well recognised principle were departed from.” Therefore there should be no deduction of the £704 and there should be added the additional sum of £140 by which the sum payable for wages in lieu of notice would have been increased if the employee had been dismissed for redundancy on 30 September 1985.

It seems to me that in this process of reasoning there have been run together, as if for these purposes indistinguishable, earnings from a new employer during a period of notice and wages paid or payable by the old employer in respect of the period of notice. In the result, in my

Addison v. Babcock F.A.T.A. Ltd. (C.A.)

Ralph Gibson L.J.

A judgment, the conclusion of the appeal tribunal on this point was wrong in law for the following reasons.

In the absence of an agreement, express or implied, to the contrary effect it seems to me to be clear that the respondent employers are to be given credit for all payments they have made to the employee on account of claims for wages and other benefits. In Hilti (Great Britain) Ltd. v. Windridge [1974] I.C.R. 352 the dismissed employee was paid a sum of £239.52 which was expressed to be four weeks' wages in lieu of notice. The employee was, in fact, entitled to six weeks' notice. However, £239.52 represented £13.20 in excess of his net wages for the full six weeks. It was held by the National Industrial Relations Court that the excess was deductible from the balance of the compensation assessed. Sir Hugh Griffiths, presiding in the court, said, at p. 357:

C "Miss Alton has argued that there should be no deduction from the £239.52 [the four weeks' gross pay]—her first argument is that it was paid under a mistake of law and therefore it does not fall to be deducted in the calculations. This court has said more than once that it wishes to eschew any legalistic approach to the resolution of industrial problems. The industrial tribunal is charged with doing that which is just and equitable between the parties. If an employee seeks to recover a large sum of money, it is neither just nor equitable to disregard such sums as he has in fact received from the employer consequent upon his dismissal. Accordingly the whole sum paid by the employer consequent upon the dismissal should be brought into account in doing justice between the parties."

E Sir John Brightman, giving the judgment of the National Industrial Relations Court in Everwear Candlewick Ltd. v. Isaac [1974] I.C.R. 525, cited that passage and relied upon it. I do not think that that basis of approach has been doubted since it was first stated and I would hold it to be correct.

F By section 74(1) the industrial tribunal is directed to assess the amount of the compensatory award "In such amount as the tribunal considers just and equitable in all the circumstances having regard to the loss sustained by the complainant in consequence of the dismissal;" and, in so doing, to apply the common law rule concerning the duty to mitigate. That rule requires a dismissed employee to take reasonable and proper steps to obtain other employment. It is not open to the industrial tribunal or the Employment Appeal Tribunal, in my judgment, to devise by decision a rule of law which conflicts with the statutory provisions whether or not based upon or supported by a principle of good industrial practice.

the court was requested by the parties, in the event that either appeal or cross-appeal should be allowed, to substitute its own award of compensation. The statutory provisions then in force in section 116(1) and (2) of the Industrial Relations Act 1971 were essentially the same as those now contained in section 74(1), (2) and (4) of the Act of 1978. Sir John Donaldson, after reference to the statutory provisions, continued, at pp. 49–50:

“The Contracts of Employment Act 1963, as amended by the Act of 1971, entitles a worker with more than ten years’ continuous employment to not less than six weeks’ notice to terminate his employment. Good industrial practice requires the employer either to give this notice or pay six weeks’ wages in lieu. The employee was given neither. In an action for damages for wrongful, as opposed to unfair, dismissal he could have claimed that six weeks’ wages, but would have had to give credit for anything which he earned or could have earned during the notice period. In the event he would have had to give credit for what he earned in the last two weeks, thus reducing his claim to about four weeks’ wages. But if he had been paid the wages in lieu of notice at the time of his dismissal, he would not have had to make any repayment upon obtaining further employment during the notice period. In the context of compensation for unfair dismissal we think that it is appropriate and in accordance with the intentions of Parliament that we should treat an employee as having suffered a loss in so far as he receives less than he would have received in accordance with good industrial practice. Accordingly, no deduction has been made for his earnings during the notice period. We have no information as to whether the £25·60 per week is a gross or a take-home figure. The relevant figure is the take-home pay since this and not the gross pay is what he should have received from his employer. However, neither party took this point and we have based our assessment of this head of loss on six weeks at £25·60 per week or £153·60. The employee drew £3 unemployment benefit for a short period, but we were not asked to make any deduction for this and have not done so. Finally, we have taken no account of the extent to which the employee’s income tax liability may be reduced by his period of unemployment, since we consider that the sums involved will be small and that such a calculation is inappropriate to the broad, common sense assessment of compensation which Parliament contemplated in the case of unfair dismissal of a man earning the employee’s level of wages.”

It is relevant to add that, earlier in the judgment, Sir John Donaldson, after reference to section 116 of the Act of 1971, pointed out that the object was to compensate, and compensate fully, but not to award a bonus. The principle there stated has been applied in many cases. In Everwear Candlewick Ltd. v. Isaac [1974] I.C.R. 525, after reference to Norton Tool Co. Ltd. v. Tewson [1973] 1 W.L.R. 45, to J. Stepek Ltd. v. Hough (1973) 8 I.T.R. 516 and to Hilti (Great Britain) Ltd. v. Windridge [1974] I.C.R. 352 mentioned above, Sir John Brightman said, at pp. 527–528:

“The principle behind these three cases is clear. If an employee is unfairly dismissed without due notice and without pay in lieu of notice, he is prima facie entitled to compensation equal to his net

3 W.L.R.

Addison v. Babcock F.A.T.A. Ltd. (C.A.)

Ralph Gibson L.J.

- A pay for the proper period of the notice. No deduction is to be made for anything which the employee may earn elsewhere, for example, from another employer, during the period for which he should have received notice. If an employee is dismissed without due notice but receives a sum which is equal to his pay for a shorter period than the requisite notice, that sum is to be taken into account in the
- B sense that the employee will not receive compensation for loss of wages during that (short) period, but will receive compensation for loss of wages during the balance of the proper period of notice, and no deduction is to be made for anything which the employee earns elsewhere during the requisite period of notice. If an employee is dismissed without due notice but is given by his employer a sum which actually exceeds his net pay for the due period of notice, he
- C obviously receives no compensation for loss of wages during the period of notice because he has lost none, but he is bound to bring into account any additional sum which has been paid to him by his former employer. We underline the words 'by his former employer.' The position would be different if during the period of due notice he had received money from another employer."
- D There was a departure from that principle in Tradewinds Airways Ltd. v. Fletcher [1981] 1 R.L.R. 272. In that case the employee was entitled to 12 weeks' notice: he received no payment in lieu of notice. He obtained alternative employment during the notice period. The industrial tribunal awarded his loss of wages for the full weeks of the notice period without requiring him to bring into account his earnings from his new employment. The appeal tribunal reversed the decision of
- E the industrial tribunal. After reference to the decision in Norton Tool Co. Ltd. v. Tewson [1973] 1 W.L.R. 45, which had been treated as laying down as a rule of law that loss of wages during the notice period was to be considered an irreducible minimum to which the employee is invariably entitled, the appeal tribunal said that, if the National Industrial Relations Court intended to lay that down as a rule of law, they were
- F wrong to do so because the whole law on the matter was contained in the provisions of the statute. In T.B.A. Industrial Products Ltd. v. Locke [1984] 1 C.R. 228, to which reference has already been made, Browne-Wilkinson J., giving the judgment of the appeal tribunal, declined to follow the decision in Tradewinds Airways Ltd. v. Fletcher [1981] 1 R.L.R. 272 and said [1984] 1 C.R. 228, 233-234:
- G "the decision . . . is quite inconsistent with the earlier cases. We have to decide which authority to follow. In the realm of industrial relations (where settlement by negotiation must be the prime objective) it is even more undesirable than usual that there should be conflicting decisions. If we were satisfied that the decision in the Norton line of cases was wrong in principle or, due to changes in industrial relations practice, had ceased to be appropriate, we would
- H say so but suggest that the parties should correct the matter in the Court of Appeal rather than produce conflicting authority in this tribunal. But in our judgment the line of authorities stemming from the Norton case is not unsound in principle and there has been no change in the law or practice which merits a departure from it. There is no doubt that in assessing compensation under section 74 of the Act of 1978 the industrial tribunal in deciding what compensation is just and equitable has to have regard to the loss sustained by the employee in consequence of the dismissal. In order to ascertain that loss, one has to discover what the employee would have received if he had not been unfairly dismissed. This appeal tribunal in the Tradewinds case had regard to what, as a matter of contract and the common law remedy for breach of contract, the employee would have got. At common law there is no doubt that the employee is bound to mitigate his loss by seeking alternative employment during the notice period and, if successful, his damages for breach of contract are reduced by the amount of his earnings during the notice period from his new employment. The Tradewinds case therefore identifies this as his loss. In making exactly the same assessment (i.e. the loss suffered by the employee) the Norton line of cases starts from a different premise, i.e. that the employer would act not only in accordance with his contractual duties but also in accordance with good industrial practice which would require (in the absence of gross misconduct) that an employee who is summarily dismissed should at the time of his dismissal be paid a payment in lieu of notice covering the notice period. If such good industrial practice is adopted, there is no right for the employer to recover any part of it from the ex-employee if, during the notice period, he obtains alternative employment. Therefore, on this basis the loss suffered by the employee is the full amount of his wages during the notice period without any deduction for wages from the alternative employment."

For my part I would uphold the principle established by the National Industrial Relations Court in the Norton case and followed since in the Employment Appeal Tribunal but, in my judgment, it is necessary to clarify the extent to which it states a rule of law. Mr. Pannick invited the court to reject the Norton principle if and so far as it could be held to apply so as to entitle the employee to recover any sum for wages in lieu of notice in addition to loss of earnings caused by the dismissal. I will come later in this judgment to the application of the principle to the facts of this case.

I would uphold the principle, first, because it is not shown to have worked unfairly or in a manner contrary to the intention of Parliament in the limited form in which it was stated and applied in the cases cited. The first step in the reasoning of the court in the Norton case is that when a payment is made of wages in lieu of notice at the time of the dismissal the employee would not have to make any repayment upon obtaining further employment during the notice period. That is in accordance with the normal intention of both sides when such a payment is made without stipulation of any special terms. The next step in the reasoning is, in my respectful opinion, of a different nature: because good industrial practice requires that the employer either give the notice or pay six weeks' wages in lieu, the employee, who is given neither notice nor payment, should not be worse off and therefore he also should not have to give credit for wages earned from another employer during the period of notice notwithstanding the direction that the rule as to the duty to mitigate shall be applied. I do not doubt that the industrial practice referred to was a good practice and right to be applied in a case such as Norton Tool Co. Ltd. v. Tewson [1973] 1 W.L.R. 45 and such a case must be typical of a very large proportion of the cases coming before industrial tribunals. In such a case the employer,

3 W.L.R.

Addison v. Babcock F.A.T.A. Ltd. (C.A.)

Ralph Gibson L.J.

A if he was acting fairly, would pay the sum due in lieu of notice. It is usually convenient for the employer if the dismissed employee leaves the premises and if the wages for the whole period are paid in advance; and it is convenient for the employee to be released to look for other work; and the immediate receipt of wages for the period of notice, coupled with the chance of getting other employment during that period, may soften a little the blow of losing employment. In the Norton case the period of notice was six weeks. In J. Stepek Ltd. v. Hough, 8 I.T.R. 516, where payment in lieu of wages was not made in full, the period was eight weeks. Not surprisingly there was no attempt in these cases to show that the circumstances in which full payment was not made justified or explained departure from the normal good industrial practice. It seems to me, however, that circumstances may arise in which, having regard to the length of notice required, and the known likelihood of the employee getting new employment within a short period of time, or for other sufficient reason, an employer may show that a payment less than the wages due over the full period of notice did not offend good industrial practice. The employer might tender two months' pay in respect of a six-month period of notice and ask to be informed if the expected new job was for any reason not obtained. I am unable to accept that any rule of law exists which requires that in all circumstances, irrespective of the terms upon which a payment in lieu of notice was made, and of any justification for not making payment in full of wages in advance for the full period of notice, the employee is entitled in claiming a compensatory award under section 74 to disregard wages earned from another employer during the notice period. The number of cases in which an employer will be able, in the view of an industrial tribunal, to justify departure from the general practice will probably be small. But in my view no rule of law exists to prevent the industrial tribunal from considering such a case or from giving effect to it if it is established.

Next, and before dealing with the extension of the principle which has been effected by the appeal tribunal by the decisions in Finnie v. Top Hat Frozen Foods [1985] I.C.R. 433 and in this case, it is necessary to consider the limits of the principle. The employee is to be treated as having suffered a loss in so far as he recovers less than he would have received in accordance with good industrial practice. As Mr. Pannick submitted in this court, it seems to me that the principle, when applicable on the basis of good industrial practice, secures to the dismissed employee the opportunity to earn during the period of notice without giving credit for earnings from another employer against wages due during the period of notice. It does not secure to him anything in addition to the amount of wages due during the period of notice: he can only get the extra if he gets the new job and thereby earnings from another employer. If the employer has paid the wages due in lieu of notice at the time of dismissal, the employer has complied with good industrial practice. If the employee does not get employment during the period of notice, no principle of good industrial practice can secure to the employee any further payment by way of lost wages in respect of the period of notice: he has received the wages for that period and if he is to recover the same amount again it must be by reference to some rule of law outside the provisions of the Act of 1978 and in my view no such rule exists.

The next step in the reasoning of the appeal tribunal was that, if an employee is not so fortunate as to get new employment during the period of notice, he should be entitled to have his statutory or contractual entitlement to wages in lieu of notice regarded as a matter apart and that compensation for unfair dismissal should be calculated irrespective of that entitlement: the principle was stated in Clydebank Co-operative Society Ltd. v. Mackie (unreported), 22 August 1983:

“an employee dismissed with wages in lieu of notice, if fortunate enough to obtain immediate employment elsewhere, reaps a financial benefit. We do not see why, if he has been unfairly dismissed and is not so fortunate he should not be entitled to have his statutory entitlement to wages in lieu of notice regarded as a matter apart and compensation for unfair dismissal calculated irrespective of it.”

On the facts in Finnie v. Top Hat Frozen Foods [1985] I.C.R. 433 the employee was unfairly dismissed on 9 May with three months' pay in lieu of notice to which he was entitled under his contract. The industrial tribunal made the basic award and, in addition, a compensatory award over a period of three months after the lapse of which time the claimant should be able to get another job. The award included sums for loss of use of a company car and of certain other perquisites over the period of three months but the industrial tribunal awarded nothing for loss of wages because he had been paid wages for the three months in lieu of notice. The appeal tribunal held, at p. 437:

“Wages in lieu of notice . . . is an independent payment to which an employee has a separate right under statute [or] under contract [and] therefore that the industrial tribunal ought to have allowed three months wages . . . as part of the compensatory award.”

I am unable to accept that such a ruling was correct. By making the payment in lieu of notice the employer had complied with good industrial practice. The employee was under the duty to take proper and reasonable steps to find other employment so as to mitigate his loss resulting from the dismissal. The industrial tribunal found that after three months he should be able to get another job and there could be no loss of wages after that date. Such loss as resulted from the dismissal was covered by the award. The provisions of the Act of 1978 provide in my judgment no basis for an award of the amount of wages over the three months of the period of loss, as found by the industrial tribunal, in addition to the basic award and the wages due for that period already paid. Similarly, if the wages in lieu of notice had not been paid, but the employee had obtained new employment within the three month period, or it was held that new employment was available to him within that period, this compensatory award could not on account of lost wages include anything more than the wages due for that period. Whether the wages in lieu of notice are paid or not, the employee need not give credit for sums earned in new employment during that period (subject as discussed above to a finding, when payment was not paid in full, that the course taken by the employer was justified) but the employee can only recover once for wages lost in the period of loss determined by the industrial tribunal. I would add that, on the basis of the reasoning of the appeal tribunal in Finnie's case, I can see no reason why the right to wages in lieu of notice as an independent right should be limited to the unfortunate dismissed employee who does not find new employment

A during the period of notice. If it is an independent right, the fortunate dismissed employee is also entitled to it. The fortunate dismissed employee could therefore recover wages in lieu of notice, compensation for wages lost over the period of notice and give no credit for earnings from the new employer. Such a result seems to me to be plainly in conflict with the provisions of the Act of 1978.

B I therefore conclude that the appeal tribunal in this case went wrong in law in ruling that the sum of £704 paid in July 1984 for the five weeks starting on 20 July was not to be deducted from the award for lost wages which had been calculated from 20 July 1984 and therefore included the wages for that period of five weeks.

C But there remains the question whether the compensatory award thus corrected is just and equitable having regard to the loss sustained by the employee. Mr. Hogarth submitted that upon the basis for compensation accepted by the industrial tribunal, namely, that the employee should be compensated for what he had lost by being dismissed on 20 July 1984 compared with being made redundant on 30 September 1985, the compensatory award must include the payment in lieu of wages which the employee would have received on 30 September 1985, namely, £844, which was the sum in effect awarded by the appeal tribunal. In short, Mr. Hogarth contends that the right result was achieved even if the reasons given cannot be supported. Good industrial practice, he argues, would require that the £844 be paid in full and, if so paid, no credit would be required against it for earnings received in other employment. Mr. Pannick, on the other hand, contended that the principle of Norton's case could have no application. He acknowledged
D that the remaining employees who, at the date of the hearing on 19 August 1985 were to be made redundant on 30 September 1985, would be paid wages in lieu of the appropriate period of notice in accordance with good industrial practice; and that the appropriate period for the employee would have been six weeks; but the requirements of good industrial practice in the case of this employee had been satisfied in July 1984 and he had then had the opportunity to earn in other employment
E without giving credit. It was conceded that the cut-off date for loss of earnings for the purpose of calculating the compensatory award should be extended from 30 September for the period of six weeks, because the employee if not dismissed in July would have received earnings to that date; but it was said that there was no justification for ignoring the fact that the employee had mitigated his loss by getting other employment.
F His loss over that period of six weeks was £40 per week or £240 and not
G £844; and that period of six weeks was not a period of notice.

I have found this last question to be difficult. I have reached the conclusion that the principle in Norton Tool Co. Ltd. v. Tewson [1973] 1 W.L.R. 45 is not applicable to the loss of earnings over the six weeks from 30 September 1985 and that the compensatory award for that period cannot exceed the net loss, namely, £240. It seems to me that the H principle is to be applied to the occasion of dismissal when good industrial practice requires that the payment in lieu of wages be paid, and that if it is not paid the employee should nevertheless have the opportunity of earning wages in new employment without giving credit. It cannot, as I think, operate as a separate rule of law so as to entitle a claimant to a sum larger than his demonstrated loss by reference to a period which was not a period of notice. The point can be tested thus. If the employee in January 1985 had got a new job in which he earned more than in his job with the employers, instead of less, the continuing loss would have ended then and his compensatory award would have been so calculated. He could not, I think, have claimed in addition the sum of £844 on the basis that if he had not been dismissed in July 1984 he would have received wages in lieu of notice in September 1985. The fact that a continuing loss causes the compensation period to run to 30 September 1985 cannot entitle him to be treated as receiving a second notice to terminate his employment with an accompanying period in which no credit need be given in respect of wages earned in other employment.

Accordingly, I would allow this appeal to the extent contended for by Mr. Pannick. I have set out above what I understand the full award would be as based upon the order of the appeal tribunal. From that sum of £5,286 there should be deducted a sum of £704 paid as wages in lieu of notice and the sum of £140 added by the appeal tribunal as additional payment in lieu of notice. The award is thus reduced to £4,442. To that there must be added the sum of £240, the additional net loss for six weeks following 30 September which, subject to checking of my arithmetic, produces an award of £4,682. The disputed amount of £210 claimed as an additional payment under the company severance pay scheme remains to be disposed of by agreement or on remission to the industrial tribunal pursuant to the order of the Employment Appeal Tribunal.

BINGHAM L.J. I agree that this appeal should be allowed to the extent proposed and for the reasons given by Ralph Gibson L.J. and Sir John Donaldson M.R.

SIR JOHN DONALDSON M.R. The only criticism which is, or can be, directed at Babcock F.A.T.A. Ltd., the employers, is that they dismissed the wrong man when, in July 1984, they found that they had to make one of their platers redundant. The employee's dismissal therefore ranks as an "unfair dismissal" and, under section 74(1) of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 he became entitled to a compensatory award of "such amount as the tribunal considers just and equitable in all the circumstances having regard to the loss sustained by the complainant in consequence of the dismissal in so far as that loss is attributable to action taken by the employer."

This appeal concerns the amount of that award.

Section 74 provides a comprehensive code designed to guide industrial tribunals in the assessment of a just and equitable award. However, apart from subsection (1), which I have quoted, only subsections (2), (3) and (4) are material to this appeal. They read as follows:

"(2) The said loss shall be taken to include—(a) any expenses reasonably incurred by the complainant in consequence of the dismissal, and (b) subject to subsection (3), loss of any benefit which he might reasonably be expected to have had but for the dismissal. (3) The said loss, in respect of any loss of any entitlement or potential entitlement to, or expectation of, a payment on account of dismissal by reason of redundancy, whether in pursuance of Part VI or otherwise, shall include only the loss referable to the amount,

Sir John
Donaldson M.R.

A if any, by which the amount of that payment would have exceeded the amount of a basic award (apart from any reduction under section 73(7) or (9)) in respect of the same dismissal. (4) In ascertaining the said loss the tribunal shall apply the same rule concerning the duty of a person to mitigate his loss as applies to damages recoverable under the common law of England and Wales or of Scotland, as the case may be.”

B In substance section 74 re-enacts section 116 of the Industrial Relations Act 1971, and I have no reason to resile from the view which, in an earlier guise or disguise, I expressed in Norton Tool Co. Ltd. v. Tewson [1973] 1 W.L.R. 45, 48, namely that the amount of the award is governed by the statute and nothing else, that it involves a discretionary element and is not to be assessed by adopting the approach of a conscientious and skilled cost accountant or actuary, but that the discretion has to be exercised judicially and upon the basis of principle, the object being to compensate, and compensate fully, but not to award a bonus.

C The assessment of any compensation, whether in an industrial relations context or otherwise, must always involve a comparison between what was, is and will be and what would (or should) have been—between the actual past, present and future and the hypothetical past, present and future. The future must be conjectural on both sides of the equation, although the conjecture as to the actual future will sometimes, and perhaps usually, be more firmly based than that concerning the hypothetical future. In the context of section 74, both will have to take account of the chances of accident to the claimant, ill health, fair dismissal, redundancy, retirement (whether voluntary or compulsory), and of the claimant leaving his employment of his own volition. Weighing these imponderables, there often comes a point at which an industrial tribunal can reasonably, fairly and properly say to itself “Well after that point of time, we just cannot foresee either what is likely in fact to happen or what would have been likely to have happened. Accordingly the claimant has proved no loss beyond that time and we disregard any later period in making our award.” What is unusual in this case is that the tribunal knew with virtual certainty not only the actual, but also the hypothetical, facts and, ironically, it is this which has thrown up problems which otherwise might have been lost in the wash of speculation. Let me therefore set out both sides of the equation—the actual and the hypothetical.

G What actually happened

H The employee received oral notice of dismissal on 16 July 1984, which was confirmed in writing on 19 July, telling him that his employment would be terminated on 24 August, but that he would not be required to work after 20 July. On 26 July he received a further letter enclosing a statement of what was due to him and, I assume, a cheque for that amount. This statement showed that he was being paid (in round figures) £704 as a redundancy payment, a further £704 as five weeks' gross pay “in lieu” and ex gratia payments totalling £845, based upon six weeks' gross pay (two weeks provided by the employers and four weeks by Babcock International). The expression “in lieu” used by the employers was presumably a contraction of “in lieu of notice” which was not entirely accurate, since the employee had in fact been given notice as contrasted with being dismissed summarily. However, in an industrial context, the meaning was clear. The sum was being paid at once instead of week by week, the employee was free to seek other employment during the running of the notice and the employers would not seek to take account of any earnings from such other employment in reduction of their liability to the employee. And, still less, would they expect him to repay any part of this sum if he did achieve such earnings. All this was in accordance with good industrial practice. These sums, together with a small tax refund, amounted to £2,271.

In the event the employee could not find alternative employment until 7 January 1985 and then it was at a rate of £93 per week, which was less than he had previously been earning. This employment was secure at least until the end of 1985, which, as will appear, is all that is material.

What would and should have happened

Some other plater should have been dismissed instead of the employee. Had that occurred, the employee would have worked and continued to receive his wages from the employers until 30 September 1985. Until 7 January 1985, which coincidentally was the date when he obtained alternative employment, he would have continued to be paid at the rate of £125.23 net of deductions and thereafter at the rate of £132.74 also net. The payments which he had received on dismissal were based upon his gross wage of £140 per week. However, on 30 September the employers would justifiably, and therefore "fairly," have given the employee and the other platers six weeks' notice of dismissal on the ground of redundancy. He would then, in accordance with the practice of the employers, which was not only "good industrial practice," but even generous, have been paid £844 as money "in lieu," a further £844 as a redundancy payment and a sum, the precise amount of which is still in dispute but would possibly have been of the order of £1,055, as an ex gratia payment. As was the case when the employee was in fact dismissed, he would have been free to seek other employment during the running of the notice and would not have been accountable for any earnings received as a result of that employment.

In setting out what actually happened and what would have happened, I have deliberately omitted reference to such matters as B.U.P.A. health insurance cover, pension rights and loss of statutory industrial rights. These were taken into account by the industrial tribunal, but are not relevant to this appeal.

The industrial tribunal's decision

The industrial tribunal first assessed the employee's loss of earnings from 20 July 1984 up to the date of the hearing on 19 August 1985. This was a perfectly straightforward calculation. On the debit side they put what he would have earned if he had continued in the employment of the employers and on the credit side they put £704 "money in lieu" and the sums which the employee had earned in his alternative employment beginning on 7 January 1985. They then assessed the employee's loss between 19 August 1985 and 30 September 1985, the actual date when the other platers received notice of dismissal on grounds of redundancy, and the date upon which, hypothetically, the employee would have received such a notice, if he had not been dismissed in July 1984. This again was a straightforward calculation. The loss was £240.

3 W.L.R.

Addison v. Babcock F.A.T.A. Ltd. (C.A.)

Sir John
Donaldson M.R.

- A The industrial tribunal ignored the effect of the redundancy payment received by the employee, save to note that it extinguished any right to a basic award. The industrial tribunal gave the employers credit for the ex gratia payment of £845 made to the employee in July 1984 against the total sum which would otherwise have been awarded to him in respect of his loss of wages. Consistently with this approach, they did not have to bring into account, and did not bring into account, the ex gratia payment which the employee would have received if he had continued in the employment of the employers until the other platers were dismissed. The final figure awarded was £3,457.00.
- B

The Employment Appeal Tribunal's decision

- C The appeal tribunal [1987] I.C.R. 45 varied the industrial tribunal's award in three respects, which are now accepted as being correct. They held that (a) the employers should not have been given credit against their legal liability for the £845 ex gratia payment paid to the employee in July 1984, since it was ex gratia and was intended to be in addition to any legal entitlement, although, of course, the employers at that time considered that there was no such entitlement; (b) the employee was entitled to a further £140 as representing the increased redundancy payment which he would have received if he had been made redundant in September 1985, when this would not have constituted an unfair dismissal, as compared with the amount which he in fact received in July 1984, when it was such a dismissal; (c) some further figure to be agreed or determined by an industrial tribunal, said by the employee to be £210, should be added to take account of the increased ex gratia payment which he would have received if he had been dismissed in September 1985 instead of July 1984. For simplicity I will assume that £210 is the correct figure.

The effect of the variations (a) to (c) is to increase the industrial tribunal's award by £1,195, making an award of £4,652.

- F The appeal tribunal, however, also held that (d) no credit should have been given to the employers for the £704 "money in lieu" paid in July 1984 and a further £140 should have been added to the award to take account of the increased "money in lieu," which would have been received by the employee if he had been dismissed in September 1985 instead of in July 1984. Another way of putting this might be that whilst credit should be given for the £704 paid in July 1984, the employee was entitled to the whole of the £844 which he would have received as "money in lieu" if he had been dismissed in September 1985. The effect of this further, and disputed, variation was to increase the award to £5,496.
- G

The appeal

- H The employers have appealed and Mr. Pannick, on their behalf, contends that (a) the industrial tribunal was correct in giving credit for the £704 "money in lieu" if, as they did, they calculated the employee's loss from 20 July 1984. Alternatively, they could have treated the £704 as eliminating all loss before 24 August 1984 and begun the calculation from that date. (b) The industrial tribunal was also correct in including £240 in their award in respect of the difference between what the employee in fact earned in the six weeks following 30 September 1985 and what he would have received in respect of that period in the form of

Sir John
Donaldson M.R.

Addison v. Babcock F.A.T.A. Ltd. (C.A.)

[1987]

"money in lieu," if he had been dismissed with the other platers. (c) The appeal tribunal was in error in refusing to give the employers any credit for the £704 "money in lieu" paid to the employee in July 1984 and also awarding a further £140 for the difference between what he in fact received under this head in July 1984 and what he would have received if dismissed in September 1985 thus, in effect, treating the £704 as covering the employee's loss of wages from 20 July until 24 August 1984 and awarding him the whole of the lost September "money in lieu," without giving any credit for the wages which he earned in the six weeks following 30 September 1985.

Mr. Hogarth, for the employee, agrees with Mr. Pannick that the £704 should have been set against the employee's loss of wages between 20 July and 24 August 1984. However, he submits that the award should have included an amount equal to the whole of the "money in lieu" which the employee would have received in September 1985 and that, consistently with the decision in Norton Tool Co. Ltd. v. Tewson [1973] 1 W.L.R. 45, 49, no account should be taken of the employee's earnings during the six weeks covered by that payment. In other words, he rejects the £240 proffered by Mr. Pannick ((b) above), not unnaturally preferring the £844 awarded by the appeal tribunal.

This then is the real, and the sole, issue in the appeal.

This problem arises, and its solution is bedevilled by, the decision of the National Industrial Relations Court in Norton's case, which has been followed in countless decisions including Everwear Candlewick Ltd. v. Isaac [1974] 1 C.R. 525 (Sir John Brightman) and Blackwell v. G.E.C. Elliott Process Automation Ltd. [1976] 1 R.L.R. 144 (Phillips J.) and "explained" in Tradewinds Airways Ltd. v. Fletcher [1981] 1 R.L.R. 272 (Bristow J.) and by conflicting decisions of the Employment Appeal Tribunal in T.B.A. Industrial Products Ltd. v. Locke [1984] 1 C.R. 228 (Browne Wilkinson J.); Clydebank Co-operative Society Ltd. v. Mackie (unreported), 22 August 1983 (Lord McDonald); Finnie v. Top Hat Frozen Foods [1985] 1 C.R. 433 (also Lord McDonald) and the instant case.

Happily none of these authorities is binding on this court. Whilst I confess to an affection for the decision in the Norton case, because in those far off days we fondly hoped and imagined that a few such decisions would finally settle the law and that the National Industrial Relations Court could then retire as an appellate court, I do not regard it as holy writ. This appeal, therefore, gives this court an opportunity of looking at the problem of "money in lieu" in the hope that hereafter decisions of industrial tribunals sitting in England and Scotland will be the same, although there will always be some room for, and risk of, divergence under a quaint system which channels appeals from both countries to a single court, namely the Employment Appeal Tribunal, but then permits a further appeal to different courts, the appeal lying in the case of proceedings of the appeal tribunal in Scotland to the Court of Session and of those in England to the Court of Appeal, only bringing the two appellate routes together again in the House of Lords. This is not, of course, a case of decisions by Scottish judges and lay members being considered by the Court of Session and those of English judges and lay members by this court, because, as was the case with the National Industrial Relations Court, all are members of the Employment Appeal Tribunal and can sit both in Scotland and in England.

3 W.L.R.

Addison v. Babcock F.A.T A. Ltd. (C.A.)

Sir John
Donaldson M.R.

A In the Norton case the claimant was entitled under statute to six weeks' notice, but it would have made no difference if the entitlement had been contractual. Indeed, the wording of the Contracts of Employment Act 1963 was such that, arguably, it varied the contract of employment and it was the contract as so varied which gave rise to the entitlement. For present purposes, the crucial passage in the judgment is the following [1973] 1 W.L.R. 45, 49-50:

B "Good industrial practice requires the employer either to give this notice or pay six weeks' wages in lieu. The employee was given neither. In an action for damages for wrongful, as opposed to unfair, dismissal he could have claimed that six weeks' wages, but would have had to give credit for anything which he earned or could have earned during the notice period. In the event he would

C have had to give credit for what he earned in the last two weeks, thus reducing his claim to about four weeks' wages. But if he had been paid the wages in lieu of notice at the time of his dismissal, he would not have had to make any repayment upon obtaining further employment during the notice period. In the context of compensation for unfair dismissal we think that it is appropriate and in accordance with the intentions of Parliament that we should treat an employee

D as having suffered a loss in so far as he receives less than he would have received in accordance with good industrial practice. Accordingly, no deduction has been made for his earnings during the notice period."

E On the facts of the Norton case, the court was only concerned with loss during the notice period, because it was common ground that thereafter he had found alternative employment at the same wage as before. The argument for the employer was simply that since the common law duty to mitigate damage was incorporated into the statutory code for assessing compensation for unfair dismissal, on these facts the amount recoverable by an employee would be the same whether he claimed for wrongful dismissal or for unfair dismissal.

F If the Norton case was rightly decided, and I think that it was, or, if it was not, it should not be disturbed because it has been so widely accepted as correct for so long, it does indeed lay down a rule of law, but one which is more limited than is sometimes appreciated. That rule is that, in assessing compensation for unfair dismissal, it is just and equitable to regard a claimant as having suffered an additional loss if the

G employer in unfairly dismissing him did not otherwise act in accordance with good industrial practice. That there is nothing inconsistent in expecting an employer who dismisses unfairly so to act is well illustrated by the instant case, where the employer did just that. What the Norton case did not, and could not, decide as a rule of law, was that in all circumstances good industrial practice required that notice of dismissal should be accompanied by the payment of "money in lieu." Good

H industrial relations practice can change and, in any event, what is good industrial practice in relation to a weekly wage earner entitled to notice measured in weeks, may be quite different from that which is appropriate in the case of senior salaried staff entitled to notice measured in months or years.

The appeal tribunal in Clydebank Co-operative Society Ltd. v. Mackie (unreported), 22 August 1983, in Finnie v. Top Hat Frozen Foods [1985] I.C.R. 433 and in this appeal departed from its decision in T.B.A.

Industrial Products Ltd. v. Locke [1984] I.C.R. 228 and took the Norton case a good deal further. In Clydebank Co-operative Society Ltd. v. Mackie Lord McDonald said:

"The lay members of this tribunal are agreed that in good industrial practice the statutory entitlement to wages in lieu of notice is regarded as something to which an employee is automatically entitled, irrespective of any other payments which may be due. Management union negotiations would be prejudiced if this well recognised principle were departed from. Occasionally this may result in inconsistency. Thus an employee dismissed with wages in lieu of notice, if fortunate enough to obtain immediate employment elsewhere, reaps a financial benefit. We do not see why if he had been unfairly dismissed and is not so fortunate he should not be entitled to have his statutory entitlement to wages in lieu of notice regarded as a matter apart and compensation for unfair dismissal calculated irrespective of it."

This was repeated by Lord McDonald in Finnie's case and, with approval, by Popplewell J. and the lay members in the instant case as the rationale for their refusing to give credit for the £704 paid as "money in lieu" or, in other words, holding that it was just and equitable that, because the employee was in fact unable to obtain alternative employment during the notice period, he should receive double pay from his employer. They do not say what would have happened if he had obtained alternative employment, as in the Norton case, for the last two weeks of the notice period, but I assume that, contrary to the position in that case, the employer would have been given credit as otherwise the spiral of compensation would have been endless—someone unfairly dismissed with the employee would have had a claim to further compensation over and above double wages to take account of the fact that he had not been able to obtain alternative employment.

Of course the appeal tribunal would have been right if good industrial practice required that the employer should (a) pay wages in lieu and (b) guarantee to the employee that throughout the notice period he would be employed by some other employer at a wage no lower than that which he was earning at the time of his dismissal. That has never been suggested in this appeal and both parties accept that in this respect the appeal tribunal was in error.

F

This does not, however, dispose of the problem of what should be done about the "money in lieu" received by the other platers in September 1985. The submission for the employee is that he should have credit for this without deduction for his alternative earnings during that notice period, because if he had not been unfairly dismissed in July, this is what he would have been paid and, on the authority of the Norton case and in the light of good industrial practice, he would not have been accountable to his erstwhile employers for anything which he earned in other employment during the notice period.

G

H

This submission has a certain logical simplicity which is most attractive. I fear, however, that it is fallacious for, looking at the matter as at September 1985, which we must for these purposes, it ignores the very real advantage which the employee derived from being dismissed in July 1984 rather than September 1985 and the fact that he was being compensated for all the disadvantages of his situation throughout that

3 W.L.R.

Sir John
Donaldson M.R.

- A period. That advantage is that he was spared the necessity of seeking, and probably not finding, alternative employment. He was already in a job, albeit at a lower wage than he would have earned up to 30 September 1985 and the differential was already being made up by the award. True it is that the receipt of the "money in lieu" was a benefit which he might reasonably have expected to have had but for the unfair dismissal (section 74(2)), but in valuing that benefit account must be
- B taken of the fact that the employee was enabled by that unfair dismissal to be in employment in the six weeks following 30 September 1985. It might well have been different if there had been any evidence that the other platers who were dismissed in September 1985 at once walked into other employment or did so at any time during the six weeks' notice period. The employee could then say that, as compared with him, they
- C were better off. As it is, the value of the benefit which he lost is, in my judgment, to be assessed as the difference between the £844 "money in lieu" and the amount which he in fact earned during that period of six weeks. This amounts to £240.

For these reasons, which are substantially the same as those of Ralph Gibson L.J., I would allow the appeal and concur in the order which he has proposed.

Order accordingly.*

C.B.S. SONGS LTD. AND OTHERS v. AMSTRAD CONSUMER ELECTRONICS PLC. AND ANOTHER

1986 Oct. 15, 16, 17;

Tort—Cause of action—Whether arising from breach of statutory prohibition—Offer for sale of recording machines for copying pre-recorded tapes—Representative action for incitement of breach of copyright—Whether cause of action against sellers—Whether representative action properly brought—Copyright Act 1956 (4 & 5 Eliz. 2 c. 74), s. 21(3)

C

The plaintiffs, suing on behalf of themselves and other copyright owners in the music trade, alleged that the defendants, by offering for sale tape-to-tape recording machines, each of which had two cassette decks for reproducing recordings from one tape directly on to another, had incited and authorised the public to infringe the copyrights, were liable for the infringement and in breach of a common law as well as an equitable duty of care owed to copyright owners. Granting the plaintiffs' application for an amendment to the claim to allege that the defendants had unlawfully incited the public to commit an offence under section 21(3) of the Copyright Act 1956,¹ the judge held that the plaintiffs had an arguable case for injunctive relief and damages for the incitement, struck out the original allegations in the statement of claim and refused the defendants' applications to strike out the action or bar the plaintiffs from acting in a representative capacity.

On appeals by the defendants and cross-appeal by the plaintiffs:—

Held, allowing the appeals and dismissing the cross-appeal (Sir Denys Buckley dissenting), (1) that, apart from express statutory provision, a person, other than the Attorney-General acting ex officio or ex relatione, had no standing to seek to enforce the observance of the criminal law as such through the civil court rather than by a private prosecution; that a plaintiff had standing to enlist the civil court's aid in preventing infringement of a property right by criminal activity, but that in assisting him the court was not compelling the observance of the criminal law as such but giving effect to a cause of action possessed at law or in equity by the plaintiff as owner of the property right; that activity which was damaging to the property of the plaintiff but would not afford him a cause of action did not become remediable in a civil suit at the instigation of the plaintiff by reason only that the activity was criminal; and that, accordingly, the offence of inciting others to commit an offence under section 21(3) of the Copyright Act 1956 did not confer on copyright owners a right to sue in equity for an injunction and damages in lieu thereof or in addition thereto and, therefore, the judge's order giving leave to amend would be discharged (post, pp. 156F–H, 157A–B, D, 158B–C, 166c).

(2) That the question whether the plaintiffs had a good cause of action against the defendants otherwise than by reference to section 21(3) was not argued and, since there remained no live issues in the proceedings, the writ and statement of claim would be struck out (post, pp. 158c–d, 166c).

B Per curiam. If substantial manufacturers and distributors are inciting others, on a large scale, to infringe copyright in circumstances where the copyright owners have no practical remedy against the actual infringers, and there is nothing the copyright owners can do through the courts to stop them, then the present state of the law is gravely defective (post, p. 158d–e, F–G).

C Per Sir Denys Buckley. The claims of the plaintiffs and those whom they purport to represent have a common basis and the major relief claimed is common to the plaintiffs and those whom they purport to represent and, therefore, the action has been properly framed as a representative action (post, pp. 165h, 166a).

INTERLOCUTORY APPEALS from Whitford J.

By a writ dated 16 November 1984 and a statement of claim, as amended, the plaintiffs, C.B.S. Songs Ltd., E.M.I. Records Ltd. and Chrysalis Records Ltd., claimed, inter alia, an injunction restraining the first defendant, Amstrad Consumer Electronics Plc., and the second defendant, Dixons Ltd., from parting with cassette reproducing machines without taking such precautions as were necessary reasonably to ensure that copyrights in sound recordings or musical works owned by or exclusively licensed to the plaintiffs or a member of the British Phonographic Industry Ltd. or the Mechanical Rights Society Ltd. were not infringed by the use of the machines. The judge, sitting in chambers, struck out parts of the statement of claim but, also, granted leave to amend it, and refused the defendants' applications to strike out the action or make an order preventing the plaintiffs from acting in a representative capacity. C D

The defendants by two notices of appeal appealed on the grounds, inter alia, that the judge's decision to allow the amendment of the statement of claim was wrong and further or, alternatively, the judge's decision to allow the persons named as plaintiffs in the action to proceed in a representative capacity was wrong. E

The plaintiffs cross-appealed on the ground, inter alia, that the judge was wrong in law in holding that the words struck out from the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action. F

The facts are stated in the judgment of Nicholls L.J.

Geoffrey Hobbs for the first defendant.

Michael Fysh for the second defendant.

James Munby for the plaintiffs. G

Cur. adv. vult.

25 February. The following judgments were handed down.

NICHOLLS L.J. The Copyright Act 1956 creates rights of property and for their protection confers civil remedies and imposes criminal liabilities. The question arising on this appeal is whether copyright owners who, in respect of the acts complained of, cannot bring themselves within the scope of any of the civil remedies expressly conferred by the statute, nonetheless have a cause of action in equity for the grant of an injunction to restrain defendants from carrying out acts which constitute criminal offences and which damage their copyrights, this equitable jurisdiction being supplemented by the jurisdiction under H

C.B.S. Ltd. v. Amstrad Plc. (C.A.)

Nicholls L.J.

A the Chancery Amendment Act 1858 (Lord Cairns's Act) (21 & 22 Vict. c.27) to award damages in addition to or in lieu of an injunction.

Before the court are two appeals and a cross-appeal from an order of Whitford J. of 8 May 1986. They represent the latest stage in what the judge aptly described as the battle between Amstrad Consumer Electronics Plc., the well known manufacturer of electronics equipment, and those concerned to protect the interests of manufacturers and suppliers of tapes, with Dixons Ltd., the well known retailer of electronics equipment reluctantly tied, as its counsel put it, to Amstrad's coat tails.

B In 1984 Amstrad introduced on to the market three new models of tape-to-tape recording machines, designated T.S. 39, T.S. 87 and S.M. 104. A feature of these models is that they have two cassette decks from which it is possible to reproduce from one tape directly on to another, at twice the normal play-back speed. The machines, and this facility, were advertised on television and in the press in terms likely to encourage home copying of favourite tapes. Amstrad sells only to the trade, but in the advertisements Dixons was named as one of the well known retailers from whom the Amstrad tape decks could be purchased.

C British Phonographic Industry Ltd. ("B.P.I.") is a trade association, whose members comprise record companies making most of the lawful records sold in this country. B.P.I. wrote to Amstrad, and also to its principal trade outlets, asserting that by its advertisements Amstrad was encouraging the public to break the law, by inviting them to acquire machines with the double-headed facility for the purpose of copying from tapes containing copyright works.

E The upshot was two actions, in the course of which considerable procedural complications, not to say convolutions, have come about. Shorn of all matters not essential to the present appeals, the history is this. The first action Amstrad Consumer Electronics Plc. v. British Phonographic Industry Ltd. [1986] F.S.R. 159 ("the declaratory action") was brought by Amstrad against B.P.I. The writ was issued on 30 October 1984. The only substantive relief claimed was a declaration to the effect that by advertising and offering for sale, and selling six specified models of audio systems, including the three I have mentioned, Amstrad had not acted unlawfully "as alleged in [a letter from B.P.I.'s solicitors] dated 26 October 1984 or at all." On 16 November 1984 the writ in the present action ("the second action") was issued by C.B.S. Songs Ltd., E.M.I. Records Ltd. and Chrysalis Records Ltd. The first plaintiff was expressed to be suing on behalf of itself and of the other members of the Mechanical Rights Society Ltd. ("M.R.S."), and the second and third plaintiffs were expressed to be suing on their behalf and on behalf of all the other members of B.P.I. Amstrad is the first defendant and Dixons the second defendant.

H In the statement of claim in the second action, it is alleged that nearly all sound recordings available in this country are copyright and that nearly all the copyrights, or the exclusive licences under such copyrights, to reproduce sound recordings are owned by members of B.P.I.; also, that nearly all the mechanical rights in musical works in this country are owned by or exclusively licensed to the members of the M.R.S., who comprise nearly all the publishers of music in this country. Having referred to the three new Amstrad models and their introduction on to the market, the statement of claim continues with an allegation that the primary purpose for which that equipment was designed was that the public would buy and use it to make copies of commercially available pre-recorded tapes and gramophone discs. It is also alleged that machines purchased will be so used, in infringement of the copyrights in the tapes and recordings, and to the damage of the plaintiffs and those whom they represent, and that in practice, for reasons which are self-evident, the plaintiffs and those whom they represent are unable to stop such use or obtain legal redress for such infringements by individual members of the public.

The various alleged causes of action put forward are that Amstrad and Dixons have incited others to infringe copyright; that they have authorised others to infringe copyright; that they are liable, as accessories before the event or as joint tortfeasors, for the infringement of the plaintiffs' copyright; and that the equipment is being supplied in breach of a common law duty of care owed to copyright owners, and also in breach of an equitable duty of care not to allow goods likely to be used for infringement to pass out of Amstrad's and Dixons' hands. The principal relief claimed is an injunction restraining the defendants from parting with possession of the three models complained of:

"without taking such precautions as are necessary reasonably to ensure that copyrights in sound recordings or musical works owned or exclusively licensed to the plaintiffs or a member of [B.P.I.] or [M.R.S.] are not infringed by the use of such machines."

The plaintiffs also claim an inquiry as to damages and an account of profits.

In a schedule to the defence served by B.P.I. in the declaratory action, the statement of claim in the second action was set out in extenso, and in its defence B.P.I. placed reliance on the matters set out in that statement of claim as justification for the accusations made by B.P.I. in the letters to Amstrad and the trade to the effect that Amstrad was acting wrongfully in its advertising and sale of the new equipment. In this way the causes of action set up in the second action became issues also in the declaratory action.

The declaratory action came to trial comparatively speedily. In March 1985, shortly before the trial of the declaratory action was due to take place, proceedings in the second action were stayed until further order. In consequence, summonses which by then had been issued by Amstrad and Dixons for the striking out of the second action or, alternatively, to prevent the plaintiffs from suing in a representative capacity, stood adjourned.

The trial of the declaratory action took place in June 1985. Whitford J. found in favour of B.P.I. and dismissed the action. On 29 October 1985 an appeal by Amstrad to this court was dismissed: [1986] F.S.R. 159. All three members of the Court of Appeal decided that none of the issues raised in the statement of claim in the second action and relied on by B.P.I. in its defence in the declaratory action gave rise to any civil liability on the part of Amstrad. However, during the hearing a further point had been raised, namely, that the putting out by Amstrad of the advertising material complained of might be capable of amounting to an incitement to commit the crime created by section 21(3) of the Copyright Act 1956. Section 21(3) provides:

"Any person who, at a time when copyright subsists in a work, makes or has in his possession a plate, knowing that it is to be used

A for making infringing copies of the work, shall be guilty of an offence under this subsection.”

B The suggestion was that a tape recording is capable of being a “plate” within the definition in section 18(3) and that once a person who is in possession of a tape recording consciously forms the intent to use it for the purpose of making an infringing copy, he is guilty of an offence under section 21(3). The court decided that it was neither necessary nor proper to adjudge whether Amstrad had committed the offence of inciting persons to commit the section 21(3) offence, but in its discretion refused to make the declaration sought by Amstrad.

C This outcome placed B.P.I. in the unsatisfactory position that, having obtained from the court the order it sought, viz. the dismissal of the appeal, it was unable to seek to take the matter further to the House of Lords, even though on all the substantive issues canvassed and decided in the action B.P.I. had failed. B.P.I. was left to derive such consolation as it could from the views expressed by the court that there was a possibility that Amstrad might have committed the criminal offence of inciting the offence prescribed by section 21(3).

D After the trial of the declaratory action, the stay of the second action was lifted. On 4 March 1986 the plaintiffs in the second action issued a summons for leave to amend the statement of claim in that action. On 8 May 1986 Whitford J. had before him that summons and also the two striking out summonses issued earlier by Amstrad and Dixons and which had meanwhile remained adjourned. The gist of the amendments which the plaintiffs wished to make to the statement of claim was to spell out and allege against Amstrad and Dixons the ingredients of the incitement offence.

E In short, at this hearing before the judge, Amstrad and Dixons asked that the second action should be struck out on the ground that all the issues raised therein had already been decided adversely to B.P.I. by the Court of Appeal in the declaratory action, and those issues would be bound to be decided in the same way at the trial of the second action. F They resisted the proposed amendments raising the incitement issue on the ground that they disclosed no cause of action. Whitford J. decided that on the incitement issue the plaintiffs had an arguable case for injunctive relief and for at least nominal damages in respect of Amstrad's and Dixons' alleged incitement. Accordingly he permitted the amendments to be made. Having considered the authorities, he expressed his conclusion:

G “Although Mr. Hobbs repeatedly suggested that what the plaintiffs are seeking in the [second] action is damages for infringement of copyright by a route not open to them, in truth it seems to me that basically what they are trying to do by their amended statement of claim is to stop damage occurring, which, if they are right, is only likely to occur as a result of this allegedly criminal offence and H which further is damage which they are unlikely ever to be able to prove and so recover. If incited so to do by the Amstrad advertisements purchasers of these equipments start recording from pre-recorded cassettes in which some one or more of the plaintiffs hold a copyright interest, how in any given particular case is any particular person whose interests may have been affected ever going to discover or prove that any infringement has taken place? Over the years in many fields there has been an increasing tendency, particularly in the light of the total failure of penal proceedings to achieve any effective result, to accept that there are circumstances in which relief by way of injunction should be granted in civil proceedings. I am not persuaded that the [second] action, based on the statement of claim as amended, must necessarily fail; and, not being so persuaded, the amendments ought to be allowed to proceed.”

The judge also rejected the objection taken by Amstrad and Dixons that this was not a case for a representative action. He struck out those parts of the statement of claim which related only to the issues which this court had decided adversely to B.P.I. in the declaratory action. He gave leave to appeal on all points. Pursuant to that leave there are now before the court appeals by all parties against the judge's decision.

I should say at once that Mr. Munby accepted that, by reason of the decision of this court in the declaratory action, the appeal by the plaintiffs, in respect of the striking out of parts of the statement of claim, cannot succeed in this court. What he seeks is to use this appeal as the means for bringing before the House of Lords the issues decided adversely to B.P.I. by this court in the declaratory action, having been deprived of the opportunity to pursue those issues further in that action by the procedural quirk I have mentioned.

I turn to consider whether the plaintiffs should have been granted leave to amend. In summary form the material amendments sought to be made are these. A new paragraph, paragraph 6A, is sought to be added, alleging that all or nearly all the persons who use the equipment to make copies of commercially available pre-recorded cassette tapes or gramophone discs will thereby be guilty of an offence under section 21(3), and some particulars are given in that regard. Paragraph 7, as it stands at present, reads:

“The said equipment has been advertised by the first defendant and sold by the defendants in such a way as to incite members of the public to use it to make cassette recordings from pre-recorded tapes, gramophone discs and broadcast material, with a reckless disregard for the rights of the owners of the copyrights in the sound recordings and musical works contained therein.”

It is proposed to add these words to the end of that paragraph:

“and in circumstances where (by virtue of the facts and matters referred to in paragraphs 2 and 6A) all or nearly all of the persons making such cassette recordings will be guilty of an offence under the said subsection. The plaintiffs will say that the defendants have thereby unlawfully incited members of the public who buy the said equipment to commit offences under the said subsection.”

The relief sought is unchanged, save that the injunction would now inhibit Amstrad and Dixons from advertising and selling the machines in such a way as to incite members of the public to commit offences under section 21(3).

Before turning to the law, I mention one procedural matter. Whether leave to amend should be granted or refused turns, in this case, on whether the statement of claim as sought to be amended will disclose a reasonable cause of action. In the course of his submissions, however, Mr. Munby indicated that on this he was content that this court should

Nicholls L.J.

A follow the same approach as in R.C.A. Corporation v. Pollard [1983] Ch. 135. There, with some encouragement from counsel, this court decided a difficult and important issue of law on an appeal from the judge's refusal to strike out a statement of claim. Likewise, here, Mr. Munby accepted that if, having heard the arguments, this court was satisfied that the plaintiffs' pleaded case as amended could not succeed as a matter of law, the court should so hold and not leave the question of law to be decided at a later stage in the course of what no doubt would be a protracted and expensive trial. In the event we had the benefit of full argument on the incitement point.

B Mr. Munby's case was that there are circumstances in which a private individual can properly sue for an injunction to restrain breaches of the criminal law. He submitted that the law today is that whether or not a potential plaintiff can sue in respect of a breach of a statutory prohibition depends upon the scope and language of the statute, and that in this regard there is a distinction between two different rights or remedies which statute may confer upon persons for whose protection or benefit a statutory obligation or prohibition, backed by an express criminal law sanction, has been passed: (1) as a matter of construction a statute may give rise to a duty owed not merely to the world at large but also to a class of "protected persons," the breach of which gives a member of the protected class a cause of action in tort for damages; and (2) a statute passed for the benefit of protected persons which does not create any duty, and thus cannot give rise to a claim in tort for damages, may nonetheless entitle a member of the class of protected persons to apply for an injunction: in such a case the plaintiff's claim is a claim in equity to enforce the observance of the criminal law. Mr. Munby accepted that the present case does not fall within his category (1), but he submitted that it falls within his category (2). In my view, there is no such category as that formulated by Mr. Munby as his category (2).

E I consider first, in chronological order, the authorities relied on by Mr. Munby. He relied on three 19th century cases, Emperor of Austria v. Day and Kossuth (1861) 3 De G.F. & J. 217; Springhead Spinning Co. v. Riley (1868) L.R. 6 Eq. 551 and Dixon v. Holden (1869) L.R. 7 Eq. 488, and on the recent decisions of the House of Lords in Gouriet v. Union of Post Office Workers [1978] A.C. 435 and of the Court of Appeal in R.C.A. Corporation v. Pollard [1983] Ch. 135.

F In my view Mr. Munby is not assisted by the much discussed Emperor of Austria's case. There the defendants appealed unsuccessfully from an order of Stuart V.-C. restraining them from making spurious Hungarian banknotes in this country and ordering the delivery up of notes already made. The three members of the court expressed their reasons in differing terms, but none of the reasoning supports the existence of Mr. Munby's category (2). Indeed, the case was not one where the acts complained of were criminal. The basis of Lord Campbell L.C.'s judgment, at p. 240, was that the court had jurisdiction to protect property from an act threatened which, if completed, would give a right of action. That by "right of action" he meant cause of action at law is apparent from his next words:

H "I by no means say that in every such case an injunction may be demanded as of right, but if the party applying is free from blame and promptly applies for relief, and shows that by the threatened wrong his property would be so injured that an action for damages would be no adequate redress, the injunction will be granted.”

A

The reasoning of Knight Bruce L.J. was to the same effect. He said, at p. 247, that whether the acts complained of were criminal was not material; the preparation of the notes with the intention of issuing them in Hungary was by the law of England

“‘civilly unlawful,’ as regards rights of property, that is to say, the public revenues, the fiscal resources, the pecuniary means of the realm of Hungary, which rights the plaintiff is entitled to represent here.”

B

The plaintiff was entitled therefore to the protection of the court, “according to its ordinary course in analogous cases, from the infliction of such a wrong:” p. 248. Before us counsel had some difficulty in identifying with any confidence the cause of action at law possessed in that case by the plaintiff. Passing off and injurious falsehood were suggested. But I do not think that it is material for me to pursue this. Turner L.J. expressed himself in wider terms. He considered, at p. 253, that the introduction of the spurious notes constituted an injury to the private rights of the plaintiff’s subjects. He also said:

“I agree that the jurisdiction of this court in a case of this nature rests upon injury to property actual or prospective, and that this court has no jurisdiction to prevent the commission of acts which are merely criminal or merely illegal, and do not affect any rights of property, but I think there are here rights of property quite sufficient to found jurisdiction in this court. I do not agree to the proposition, that there is no remedy in this court if there be no remedy at law, and still less do I agree to the proposition that this court is bound to send a matter of this description to be tried at law.”

Later he said, at p. 254:

“If the property of an individual is affected by an undue and unauthorised use of his name, the law would no doubt give a remedy. I am not satisfied that the law would not give the same remedy in the case of the undue and unauthorised use of the name of a nation or state; but whether it would do so or not . . . I think . . . that the case falls within the jurisdiction of this court.”

F

Thus Turner L.J. expressly did not base his decision on the existence of a cause of action at law.

G

If one stopped there, one might perhaps be forgiven for thinking that, on the basis of this reasoning, an argument could be mounted in the present case along the lines that, even though the incitement alleged did not found an action at law against Amstrad or Dixons for infringement of copyright, because the incitement constituted criminal acts which affected the plaintiffs’ copyrights, a court of equity would restrain those acts at the suit of the copyright owners. However, and this is an important feature of this case, Mr. Munby accepted that it was now established that to enable a plaintiff to sue for an injunction to restrain a criminal act it is not enough for him to show that the criminal act interferes with some property interest of his. Having regard to the decision in Lonrho Ltd. v. Shell Petroleum Co. Ltd. (No. 2) [1982] A.C. 173, as interpreted by this court in R.C.A. Corporation v. Pollard [1983]

C.B.S. Ltd. v. Amstrad Plc. (C.A.)

Nicholls L.J.

A Ch. 135 and in Rickless v. United Artists Corporation [1987] 2 W.L.R. 945, that concession seems to me to have been inevitable. This being so, I am unable to see how the views expressed in the Emperor of Austria case assist the plaintiffs in the present case. I can find in that case no other proposition which might assist them.

B I am able to deal with the next two cases more shortly. Springhead Spinning Co. v. Riley, L.R. 6 Eq. 551 was a demurrer to a bill alleging that the printing and publishing of advertisements by the defendants for the purpose of intimidating workmen from entering the employment of the plaintiffs were unlawful acts, punishable by statute and as a common law crime. The relief sought was an injunction and damages. Malins V.-C. overruled the demurrer, relying mainly on the passage, set out above, in the judgment of Turner L.J. in the Emperor of Austria case, 3 De G.F. & J. 217, 253. Malins V.-C. said, at p. 558:

C "The jurisdiction of this court is to protect property, and it will interfere by injunction to stay any proceedings, whether connected with crime or not, which go to the immediate, or tend to the ultimate, destruction of property, or make it less valuable or comfortable for use or occupation."

D Dixon v. Holden, L.R. 7 Eq. 488 was another decision of Malins V.-C. In that case he applied the same principle when restraining the publication of a libel. Here again, it seems to me that the concession rightly made by Mr. Munby destroys any value that these cases might, at first sight, seem to have for him. Given the concession, I cannot see what is left in these decisions which advances the present plaintiffs' case.

E So I come to the recent authorities. In Gouriet's case [1978] A.C. 435, as is well known, Mr. Gouriet sought an injunction restraining the defendant union from endeavouring to procure any person to delay post in the course of transmission between this country and South Africa, contrary to statute. Mr. Gouriet did not claim that he had any special interest in the transmission of such post, or that he would suffer any special damage from non-transmission. The House of Lords struck out the proceedings on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to grant Mr. Gouriet the relief sought by him. Viscount Dilhorne, at p. 492, made passing reference, without disapproval, to Springhead Spinning Co. v. Riley, L.R. 6 Eq. 551, but this was in the context of distinguishing from the instant case, where the plaintiff had not suffered any loss or damage, the "long line of cases dealing with the rights of individuals to secure injunctions and declarations when their private rights are threatened . . ." Lord Edmund-Davies made a statement, at p. 506, to the same effect. I do not think those passages assist the plaintiffs. Apart from anything else, even if, read out of their context, these passages might, at first sight, be thought to countenance a proposition that a plaintiff can sue for an injunction to restrain a criminal act which interferes with some property right of his, this would afford no support

H for the proposition embraced by Mr. Munby's category (2). The two propositions are quite distinct.

Before coming to the last authority on which Mr. Munby relied, R.C.A. Corporation v. Pollard [1983] Ch. 135, I must refer to Lonrho Ltd. v. Shell Petroleum Co. Ltd. (No. 2) [1982] A.C. 173, which was the subject of consideration in the R.C.A. Corporation case. It will be recalled that one of the questions before their Lordships in the Lonrho case was whether, although no breach of contract was involved, delivery to Southern Rhodesia by Shell and B.P. of petroleum products, contrary to the sanctions order, gave Lonrho a cause of action for damages, assuming Lonrho suffered loss in consequence of the activities of B.P. and Shell. In answering that question in the negative, in a speech concurred in by Lord Edmund-Davies, Lord Keith of Kinkel, Lord Scarman and Lord Bridge of Harwich, Lord Diplock referred to the principle that the question whether legislation, which makes the doing or omitting to do a particular act a criminal offence, renders the person guilty of such offence liable also in a civil action for damages at the suit of any person who thereby suffers loss or damage, is a question of construction of the legislation. Having set out the terms of the sanctions order, he pointed out that the order created a statutory prohibition upon the doing of certain classes of acts and provided the means of enforcement by prosecution for a criminal offence which was subject to heavy penalties. Lord Diplock continued, at p. 185:

"So one starts with the presumption laid down originally by Lord Tenterden C.J. in Doe d. Murray v. Bridges (1831) 1 B. & Ad. 847, 859, where he spoke of the 'general rule' that 'where an Act creates an obligation, and enforces the performance in a specified manner . . . that performance cannot be enforced in any other manner'—a statement that has frequently been cited with approval ever since, including on several occasions in speeches in this House. Where the only manner of enforcing performance for which the Act provides is prosecution for the criminal offence of failure to perform the statutory obligation or for contravening the statutory prohibition which the Act creates, there are two classes of exception to this general rule."

The first of the two exceptions stated by Lord Diplock was:

"where upon the true construction of the Act it is apparent that the obligation or prohibition was imposed for the benefit or protection of a particular class of individuals, as in the case of the Factories Acts and similar legislation."

In that type of case those intended to be benefited who were injured by contravention of the statute had a right at common law against the person who contravened the statute. I pause to observe that this is Mr. Munby's category (1), which, it is admitted, does not assist the plaintiffs in the present case.

The second exception stated by Lord Diplock was:

"where the statute creates a public right (i.e. a right to be enjoyed by all those of Her Majesty's subjects who wish to avail themselves of it) and a particular member of the public suffers what Brett J. in Benjamin v. Storr (1874) L.R. 9 C.P. 400, 407 described as 'particular, direct and substantial' damage 'other and different from that which was common to all the rest of the public.'"

He referred to Boyce v. Paddington Borough Council [1903] 1 Ch. 109 as a case of a public right conferred by statute, and said:

"It is in relation to that class of statute only that Buckley J.'s oft-cited statement at p. 114 as to the two cases in which a plaintiff, without joining the Attorney-General, could himself sue in private law for interference with that public right, must be understood. The two cases he said were: 'first, where the interference with the public

A right is such as that some private right of his is at the same time interfered with . . . and, secondly where no private right is interfered with, but the plaintiff, in respect of his public right, suffers special damage peculiar to himself from the interference with the public right.' The first case would not appear to depend upon the existence of a public right in addition to the private one; while to come within the second case at all it has first to be shown that the statute, having regard to its scope and language, does fall within that class of statutes which creates a legal right to be enjoyed by all of Her Majesty's subjects who wish to avail themselves of it. A mere prohibition upon members of the public generally from doing what it would otherwise be lawful for them to do, is not enough."

C I pause again to observe that the present case does not fall within this second exception.

Having concluded that the case before the House of Lords fell within neither of the exceptions, Lord Diplock then considered, at pp. 186–187 the decision in ex Parte Island Records Ltd. [1978] Ch. 122, this having been relied on as showing:

D "that some broader principle has of recent years replaced those long-established principles that I have just stated for determining whether a contravention of a particular statutory prohibition by one private individual makes him liable in tort to another private individual who can prove that he has suffered damage as a result of the contravention."

E Suffice it to say, Lord Diplock rejected the existence of any wider general rule.

I make one observation on this case before turning to R.C.A. Corporation v. Pollard [1983] Ch. 135. Although the question before the House of Lords concerned the existence of a cause of action for damages, I read the passages cited above from the speech of Lord Diplock as intended to be a comprehensive statement of the circumstances in which, in general, some manner of enforcing performance of a statutory obligation or prohibition, other than prosecution for the criminal offence prescribed by the statute, is permissible. Their Lordships had before them, in the judgments in the Island Records case, references to the principle in equity said to be derived from cases such as Springhead Spinning Co. v. Riley, L.R. 6 Eq. 551, but Lord Diplock's speech contains no suggestion that, founded on these cases or otherwise, there might be a third exception to Lord Tenterden C.J.'s "general rule," whereby a court of equity would grant an injunction and damages to an individual plaintiff in a case not within either of the other two exceptions.

H I come at last to R.C.A. Corporation v. Pollard. The question in that case was the one left open by Lord Diplock in the Lonrho case [1982] A.C. 173, 187: whether recording companies have a cause of action against those making or distributing "bootlegged" records in contravention of the Dramatic and Musical Performers' Protection Act 1958. This court held that they do not. Thus the actual decision is not in point in the present case, but Mr. Munby relied strongly on one passage in the judgment of Oliver L.J. Oliver L.J. set out, at p. 150, three ways in which, until recently, a claim by the recording company to have a right to restrain the sale of bootlegged recordings and for damages could have been framed. He later stated the second of these as:

“where there is a breach of a statutory provision for the protection of a class of whom the plaintiff is one and he can show that he is specially damaged by the breach, he may bring proceedings to enforce, not his own civil right of action, but the public duty which has been interfered with or not observed.”

Mr. Munby submitted that that is this case.

I do not think that this passage in Oliver L.J.’s judgment can sustain the burden which Mr. Munby requires it to bear. As I read Oliver L.J.’s judgment, the three ways set out by him are his paraphrase of (1) Lord Diplock’s first exception, (2) Lord Diplock’s second exception and (3) the wider principle of equity upheld by the majority of the Court of Appeal in the Island Records case [1978] Ch. 122 but rejected by the House of Lords in the Lonrho case [1982] A.C. 173. These were the three principles which had so recently been the subject of exegesis by the House of Lords. I do not think that in his summary Oliver L.J. could have been intending to depart from those principles, and to do so without any explicit indication that he was so doing and without stating his reasons for so doing.

In my view, therefore, the authorities relied on by Mr. Munby do not establish his proposition. Furthermore, the proposition is contrary to established principle. In considering whether a plaintiff has a right to obtain an injunction in this area of the law, it is necessary to identify what is the legal or equitable right of the plaintiff whose violation the plaintiff is seeking to prevent: Bremer Vulkan Schiffbau und Maschinenfabrik v. South India Shipping Corporation Ltd. [1981] A.C. 909, 979, 980 and British Airways Board v. Laker Airways Ltd. [1985] A.C. 58, 81. The proposition under consideration identifies that right as a claim in equity to enforce the observance of the criminal law. The proposition is framed in this way, as I understand it, to avoid the argument that the plaintiffs are seeking to set up and enforce a private right in respect of infringement of copyright which is not provided for in the Copyright Act 1956. But, apart from express statutory provision, persons other than the Attorney-General (acting either ex officio or ex relatione) have no standing to seek to enforce, through a civil court, the observance of the criminal law as such: their remedy is to bring a private prosecution: see Gouriet’s case [1978] A.C. 435, per Lord Wilberforce at p. 477. As Lord Eldon L.C. pointed out in Maucaulay v. Shackell (1827) 1 Bli. N.S. 96, 127, a court of equity has no criminal jurisdiction.

Of course, if the criminal activity will infringe a property right of the plaintiff, the plaintiff has standing to enlist the civil court’s aid in preventing that infringement. But in assisting such a plaintiff the court is not compelling the observance of the criminal law as such: it is giving effect to a cause of action, at law or in equity, possessed by the plaintiff as owner of the property right. If a person threatens to steal another’s car, the court would have jurisdiction to grant the owner of the car an injunction restraining that person from taking the car. But that injunction would not have the observance of the criminal law as its justification or purpose. The justification and purpose of such an injunction would be the restraint of the would-be thief from committing against the car owner the tort or torts which the theft of the car would involve. That

A the tort or torts would also give rise to criminal liability would be, essentially, irrelevant to the cause of action.

B Furthermore, as appears from the rejection in the Lonrho case [1982] A.C. 173, 187 of the views espoused by Lord Denning M.R. and Waller L.J. in the Island Records case [1978] Ch. 122, activity which is damaging to property of the plaintiff but which, if the activity were not
C become remediable in a civil suit at the instigation of the plaintiff by reason only that the activity is criminal. That the activity attracts criminal liability cannot by itself, in this field, convert into a cause of action acts which would otherwise not be sufficient for that purpose. (I confine my comments to the field of damaging a plaintiff's private rights of property, because different considerations apply elsewhere, for instance, where a party is seeking to enforce a contract, the making or performance of which is rendered illegal by statute.)

D Whether the plaintiffs have any cause of action in respect of Amstrad's and Dixons' alleged incitement of others to infringe the plaintiffs' copyrights was not a matter argued before us. That was one of the questions decided by this court, in favour of Amstrad, in the declaratory action. The only question argued before us on the incitement issue was the narrow one of whether the alleged incitement of others to commit the section 21(3) offence gave rise to claims in equity as set out above. For the reasons I have stated, in my view it does not.

E Mr. Munby sought to make his submission more attractive by confining the cases in which an individual has standing to obtain an injunction compelling the observance of the criminal law, where the activity complained of would damage a property right, to cases of a statutory prohibition enacted for the benefit or protection of a class of persons of whom the plaintiff is one. In my view, far from helping, this suggested limitation gives rise to further difficulties. In the first place, this limitation involves drawing a distinction between statutory crimes and common law crimes for which I can see no sound justification (and, in passing, I note that the crime alleged against Amstrad and Dixons is not a statutory one, but is the common law crime of incitement of others F to commit an offence which is statutory in source).

G Secondly, this limitation involves construing a statute, but leads to a result which attributes to Parliament a very odd legislative intention. The exercise required by Mr. Munby's category (1) is the familiar, if sometimes difficult, one of construing a statute to see whether a breach of the statutory prohibition or obligation makes the person committing the breach liable in damages at the suit of a person damaged thereby. Mr. Munby's category (2) envisages that the court has undertaken that exercise and concluded (a) that the statutory prohibition or obligation was imposed for the protection or benefit of a particular class of persons but (b) that the contravention of the prohibition or obligation gave rise to no right for a member of that class to sue for damages at law, yet (c)
H the contravention did give rise to a right for a member of the class to sue in equity for an injunction, with (because this also is claimed by Mr. Munby) a claim for damages added, by a side wind, by Lord Cairns's Act.

I do not find this at all persuasive. I am unable to see what are the circumstances in which, or the purpose for which, Parliament would be concerned to draw the distinction between a claim for damages at law on the one hand, and a claim in equity for an injunction with damages in addition to or in lieu of an injunction on the other hand, and then enact a prohibition having the effect of conferring on members of the "protected" class a right extending to the latter claim but not the former. Mr. Munby conceded, in my view rightly, that section 21(3) does not itself confer on copyright owners a right to sue at law for damages for breach of a statutory duty. I can see no basis for construing the subsection in such a way that, nonetheless, committing the offence of inciting others to commit the section 21(3) offence has the effect of conferring on copyright owners a right to sue in equity for an injunction and damages in lieu of or in addition thereto. A B

In the end, therefore, for the reasons I have sought to state, in my judgment the plaintiffs' incitement claim formulated in the amendment is not legally sustainable. Accordingly, I would allow the appeals by Amstrad and Dixons, and discharge the judge's order giving leave to amend. C

For the further reason I have already stated, the question whether the plaintiffs have a good cause of action against Amstrad or Dixons otherwise than by reference to section 21(3) has not been argued before us, Mr. Munby accepting that on this he is bound to fail in this court. Accordingly, I would dismiss the plaintiffs' appeal and, since this would leave no live issue in the proceedings, strike out the writ and statement of claim. I would do so, I must confess, with a feeling of profound dissatisfaction. The narrow issue argued before us was the criminal incitement point, which is, in my view, misconceived. But the overall result of these appeals is that if the facts alleged against Amstrad and Dixons are correct, substantial manufacturers and distributors are, on a large scale, inciting others to infringe copyright in circumstances where the copyright owners have no practical remedy against the actual infringers, and there is nothing the copyright owners can do through the courts to stop them. If, indeed, that is so, the present state of the law is, in my view, gravely defective. D E

SIR DENYS BUCKLEY. The facts of this case, and what I may perhaps call the strategic positions of the parties, have been set out in the judgment of Nicholls L.J. I will not recapitulate them. I remark, however, that the underlying cause of this action is the present apparent inefficacy of the law to protect those proprietary rights which statutes have conferred upon owners of copyrights against widespread infringement of their copyrights by the use of modern electronic copying devices. Either the means and methods of detection and control require improvement, or the very nature of copyright in works exposed to these risks of infringement calls for reconsideration. I understand that legislation in this field is already being considered. F G

The appeals presently before us are interlocutory appeals. The defendants, Amstrad and Dixons, both seek to have the action stayed in limine. The plaintiffs seek to restore to their statement of claim certain passages struck out by Whitford J. on 8 March 1986, on the ground that they no longer supported sustainable causes of action, having regard to the judgment given in this court on 29 October 1985 in the declaratory action, in which substantially the same issues were raised as in the present action. H

Mr. Munby, appearing for the plaintiffs, concedes that he cannot dispute in this court the correctness of the Court of Appeal's decision in the declaratory action, but he would seek to do so in any appeal to the

3 W.L.R.

C.B.S. Ltd. v. Amstrad Plc. (C.A.)

Sir Denys Buckley

A House of Lords. He has not contended that in the event the reasons given by this court which would have resulted in their making the declaration asked for, but for the circumstance which I shall next mention, were obiter dicta. He does, however, seek to support before us the view that the plaintiffs have a cause of action against the defendants which was not originally pleaded in the statement of claim in this action, but has been introduced by amendments permitted by Whitford J. on 8

B March 1986. This suggested cause of action was first propounded by counsel for the defendants in the Court of Appeal upon Amstrad's appeal in the declaratory action. It was on this account that the Court of Appeal, in the exercise of their discretion, refused Amstrad a declaration to the effect that they had acted lawfully in respect of the matters in issue in that action.

C In this state of affairs, the only live issue before us is whether (1) the plaintiffs have a reasonable chance of success upon what I may call the new cause of action or (2) the plaintiffs, having no reasonable chance of success in that respect and, being unable to contend in this court that they have any reasonable chance of succeeding on any other pleaded cause of action, the action should be stayed in limine. Whitford J. was not satisfied that the plaintiffs must necessarily fail on the new cause of

D action, and accordingly he allowed the amendments necessary to introduce it to the pleading and refused a stay. It will be convenient first to deal with the matter as between the plaintiffs and Amstrad.

The proposed new cause of action does not arise under the Copyright Act 1956, section 21(3), but is a consequence of the provisions of that subsection:

E "Any person who, at any time when copyright subsists in a work, makes or has in his possession a plate, knowing that it is to be used for making infringing copies of the work, shall be guilty of an offence under this subsection."

It is to be observed that the offence so created does not consist of infringing the copyright; it consists of making or possessing a plate, knowing that it "is to be used" for making infringing copies.

F Paragraph 6A of the amended statement of claim reads:

G "All or nearly all of the persons who use the said equipment to make copies of commercially available pre-recorded cassette tapes or gramophone discs will thereby be guilty of an offence under section 21(3) of the said Act. The plaintiffs will say that: (a) any person who uses the said equipment to make such copies will necessarily at the time of such copying have in his possession (within the meaning of the said subsection) the tape or disc being copied; (b) the tape or disc being copied as aforesaid will necessarily be a plate within the meaning of the said subsection; (c) by virtue of the facts and matters referred to in paragraph 2, copyrights will

H subsist in all or nearly all of such tapes or discs being copied as aforesaid; and (d) by virtue of the facts and matters referred to in paragraph 2, all or nearly all of the person making such copies will know the same to be infringing copies within the meaning of the said subsection."

The facts and matters referred to in paragraph 2 are:

"All or nearly all of the pre-recorded cassette tapes and gramophone discs (being tapes or discs in respect of which copyrights subsist) commercially available in this country carry a warning notice to the effect that the unauthorised copying of the tape or disc is prohibited.”

Paragraph 7 of the amended statement of claim reads:

The allegation is that the defendants have unlawfully incited members of the public who buy “the said equipment,” i.e. Amstrad’s high-speed copying double cassette units, S.M. 104, T.S. 87 and T.S. 39, to commit offences under section 21(3).

D

Paragraph 7 proceeds to set out in seven sub-paragraphs some material in the nature of particulars. I will not set these out in extenso. The sub-paragraphs are introduced by the words, “Pending discovery the plaintiffs point to the following facts and matters.” These “particulars” do not, in my view, have the effect of confining the plaintiffs to the matters so set out. Sub-paragraphs (a) to (c) refer to three published leaflets disseminated by Amstrad promoting the three equipments, drawing attention to the high-speed copying facilities, and saying, amongst other things, “you can even make a copy of your favourite cassette.” Sub-paragraphs (d) and (e) relate to a newspaper advertisement and a television commercial broadcast put out by Amstrad to much the same effect as the leaflets. Sub-paragraphs (f) and (g) relate to two occasions on which retail customers inquired about or bought Amstrad equipments of the relevant types from Dixons.

Mr. Hobbs, in his clearly presented argument in this court as in the court below, contended that by this plea the plaintiffs are seeking to obtain a remedy for infringement which is nowhere provided in the Copyright Act 1956, and is consequently not available to them. In my view, this argument is founded on a misconception. I can see no ground upon which it could be suggested that by selling its audio equipment, Amstrad has infringed any copyright in any work, a recording of which might thereafter be copied by the use of such an equipment. See, in this connection, that section of Lawton L.J.’s judgment in the declaratory action [1986] F.S.R. 159, 205, which is headed “Knowledge and intent.” Nor, for the purposes at any rate of the cause of action with which I am concerned, does the amended statement of claim contain any such allegation. The allegation is that, by selling its audio equipment and thus providing members of the public with the means to copy pre-recorded tapes, in the very great majority of which copyright will subsist, and by seeking to promote the sale of that equipment by such advertisements as it used, Amstrad has unlawfully incited members of the public to commit offences under section 23(1). It is not, I think, contended that Amstrad

H

3 W.L.R.

C.B.S. Ltd. v. Amstrad Plc. (C.A.)

Sir Denys Buckley

A has itself committed that offence; nor do I think that that could be suggested. The audio machines cannot come within the meaning of the word "plate," which is defined in section 18(3) of the Act as including "any stereotype, stone, block, mould, matrix, transfer, negative, or other appliance." Those last three words must, in my judgment, be construed ejusdem generis with the preceding words. An electronic copying machine of the kind with which we are concerned is not, in my judgment, of that genus, and does not fall within any natural meaning of the word "plate."

B So the question for us, in my view, is whether, if Amstrad is found in fact to have incited members of the public to commit offences under section 21(3), that conduct by Amstrad entitles the plaintiffs, or any of them, or any of the persons on whose behalf the plaintiffs respectively purport to sue, to a remedy in a civil court. If it is reasonably arguable that some civil remedy would or might be available, the defendants cannot be entitled to have the action dismissed or struck out, or stayed, at the present stage. For the purpose of considering the question, it should be assumed that Amstrad is guilty of incitement. Only if, on that assumption, the plaintiffs would nevertheless be bound to fail in securing any civil relief of a kind claimed can the defendants succeed. Mr. Munby is content that we should entertain and decide this question of law.

C Mr. Hobbs's sheet anchor on this part of the case is the House of Lords decision in Lonrho Ltd. v. Shell Petroleum Co. Ltd. (No. 2) [1982] A.C. 173. In that case the defendant company, Shell, was alleged to have breached an order having statutory force, which prohibited the supply of oil to Southern Rhodesia. The plaintiff company, Lonrho, asserted that this damaged a business of delivering oil by a certain pipeline which it carried on in Southern Rhodesia. Shell was held to have been guilty of no breach of contract with Lonrho. The question thereupon arose whether Shell was liable in tort.

E The only reasoned speech delivered in that case was Lord Diplock's, with which the other members of the House of Lords who participated in the decision all agreed. In the forefront of his reasons, Lord Diplock said that it was well settled that the question whether legislation which makes the doing or omitting to do a particular act a criminal offence renders a person guilty of such offence liable also in a civil action for damages at the suit of any person who thereby suffers loss or damage was a question of construction of the legislation. He pointed out that the statutory order in question in that case created a statutory prohibition upon the doing of certain classes of acts, and provided the means of enforcing the prohibition by prosecution for a criminal offence. He said, at p. 185:

F "So one starts with the presumption laid down originally by Lord Tenterden C.J. in Doe d. Murray v. Bridges (1831) 1 B. & Ad. 847, 859, where he spoke of the 'general rule' that 'where an act creates an obligation, and enforces the performance in a specified manner . . . that performance cannot be enforced in any other manner.'

H Lord Diplock then goes on to discuss two classes of exception to that general rule, all in the context of a statutory obligation or prohibition. The Lonrho case teaches this and, in my opinion, only this: where a statute, or a regulation having statutory force, creates a new statutory offence by imposing a new duty or a new prohibition on the public, or some section of the public, specifying a particular method of enforcing compliance, a court of construction will, in the absence of special considerations, such as give rise to Lord Diplock's two exceptions, impute to the legislature an intention that an offender shall not be liable in any other way than that specified sanction or penalty, thus precluding the possibility of a claim in damages.

It will be observed that Lord Diplock, when he criticised, at p. 187D, what Lord Denning M.R. had said in Ex parte Island Records Ltd. [1978] Ch. 122, formulated the proposition of law from which he, Lord Diplock, was dissenting thus:

"whenever a lawful business carried on by one individual in fact suffers damage as the consequence of a contravention by another individual of any statutory prohibition the former has a civil right of action against the latter for such damage. . . ."

making clear that he was concerned with circumstances arising under a statute. That part of Lord Diplock's speech indicates what is, I think, an important distinction between the facts in the Lonrho case and those in the instant case.

There is no allegation in the present case that Amstrad has been guilty of any breach of a statutory prohibition, or of a failure to observe any statutory obligation, as there was in the Lonrho case and also R.C.A. Corporation v. Pollard [1983] Ch. 135. There is, in the present case, no legislative provision which falls to be construed in order to identify the remedies available for any breach of it. What is asserted by paragraph 7 of the amended statement of claim is that Amstrad has unlawfully incited members of the public to commit offences under section 21(3), that is to say, that Amstrad has been guilty of the common law criminal offence of inciting others to commit criminal acts, as to which, see Halsbury's Laws of England, 4th ed., vol. 11 (1976), p. 41, para. 53. Can that give rise to a liability in tort on the part of the inciter in favour of anyone injured by a criminal act incited by him? We have been shown no authority to the contrary.

If A, without justification, induces B to commit a breach of a contract existing between B and C, whereby C is damaged, A may be liable to a claim in damages for tort at the suit of C. It seems to me at least arguable by analogy that, if A unlawfully incites B to commit an offence under section 21(3) which will, or may, damage C, the owner of a copyright which is liable to be infringed as a consequence of that offence, A may be held to be actually or potentially liable for damages in tort at the suit of C, at any rate if that damage is a foreseeable consequence of the unlawful incitement, and a fortiori, if the consequence was intended or contemplated by A. If that is so, it cannot, in my judgment, be asserted that the amended statement of claim does not show a reasonable cause of action, that is, a cause of action which is not bound to fail in any event.

It is true, however, that in this court Mr. Munby has disclaimed any intention to rely on a common law liability in tort, and has contented himself with asserting an equitable right to injunctive relief with, as I understand, a claim for damages under Lord Cairns's Act appended to it, so I will not rest my decision of this appeal on the ground of tort. Mr. Munby's argument in support of that equitable claim has been founded on Emperor of Austria v. Day and Kossuth, 3 De G. F. & J. 217; Springhead Spinning Co. v. Riley, L.R. 6 Eq. 551, and Dixon v.

C.B.S. Ltd. v. Amstrad Plc. (C.A.)

Sir Denys Buckley

A Holden, L.R. 7 Eq. 488. The first of these was a decision of the Court of Appeal; the other two were decisions of Malins V.-C., in which he sought to apply the principles enunciated in the Emperor of Austria case. It is true that Malins V.-C.'s two decisions have been the subject of criticism in later cases: see Prudential Assurance Co. v. Knott (1875) L.R. 10 Ch.App. 142 and Temperton v. Russell [1893] 1 Q.B. 435, 438. But the Emperor of Austria case has never, so far as I am aware, been disapproved. It appears to be binding upon us.

B Turner L.J. there, in a passage, at p. 253, already cited by Nicholls L.J., regarded the importation of spurious Hungarian bank notes to Hungary as an injury to unidentified individuals in Hungary on whose behalf the plaintiff Emperor could sue. The act complained of was not a criminal act by English law, but it was regarded by the court as an unjustified invasion of private property rights. Neither Lord C Campbell L.C. nor Knight Bruce L.J. seem to have considered that the absence of identification of the parties injured was a bar to relief. All three members of the court regarded themselves as exercising an equitable jurisdiction based upon a risk of injury to property. That decision appears to me to afford at least an arguable basis of support for D Mr. Munby's claim to injunctive relief in the present case, irrespective of whether the plaintiffs have a good common law cause of action for damages. I do not think that that decision is in any way affected by the Lonrho decision, or by anything said in R.C.A. Corporation v. Pollard [1983] Ch. 135 or in Rickless v. United Artists Corporation [1987] 2 W.L.R. 945 — both cases concerned with statutory prohibitions. I do not think the claim to damages under Lord Cairns's Act presents any E difficulty. The award of such damages would be discretionary. If no damages could be recovered at common law, a court of equity might well regard this as a proper circumstance to take into account in the exercise of its discretion.

I am not entirely clear what stage discovery has reached in the action. It is not, I believe, complete. It is not, I think, impossible that F the plaintiffs may want to make further amendments in their statement of claim as discovery proceeds.

G Taking all these considerations into account, this case is not one in which I, for my part, would feel disposed to assume the task of determining on these interlocutory appeals the point of law which I referred to earlier. It seems at least possible, and indeed probable, that any decision upon the trial of the action will be appealed as far as the House of Lords. I think that it is most desirable that, if and when that occurs, the relevant facts should all have been investigated and determined so that the House of Lords may be fully and precisely informed of the facts so as perhaps to be able to illuminate this area of the law.

H I now turn to Dixons' appeal. Whereas Amstrad does not sell its audio equipments direct to retail customers, Dixons does so. Amstrad has advertised its equipment in print and by television; there is no assertion in the amended statement of claim that Dixons has done so. Dixons clearly has greater opportunities to make oral representations to retail customers than has Amstrad. Amstrad very possibly has the greater incentive to build up a market for the equipment. The facts of the two cases are different, and the findings whether either of the defendants has been guilty of any such incitement as is alleged may well be different. But the nature of the problems which arise in each case are very similar.

The allegation against Dixons in paragraph 7 of the amended statement of claim is that Dixons has sold the equipment in such a way as unlawfully to incite members of the public to commit offences under section 21(3). Whether such has been the case must be a question of fact, or of mixed fact and law. It is not a pure question of law, the determination of which adversely to the plaintiffs might justify striking out in limine against Dixons.

Mr. Fysh, appearing for Dixons, has submitted that the only specific events referred to in the amended statement of claim relating to alleged incitement by Dixons are the events mentioned in sub-paragraphs (f) and (g) of the so-called particulars, set out in paragraph 7. These two sub-paragraphs may be thought to afford slender material for concluding that Dixons has incited members of the public to commit offences under section 21(3), but, as I have already observed, I do not think that, as the pleadings stand, the plaintiffs are confined to that material in this respect.

In these circumstances, and for the reasons which I have discussed, I for my part would not stay or strike out this action against either defendant.

There remains the question whether the action can properly proceed as a representative action. The question can, I think, for present purposes, be formulated in this way. If a large number of potential plaintiffs all have distinct but similar causes of action against a potential defendant arising out of a particular act or course of conduct on the part of that defendant, which are alleged to give rise to relief of the same kind, though not necessarily of the same measure in the case of each potential plaintiff, can one, or a number of those potential plaintiffs sue as representing themselves and all or a number of the rest of the potential plaintiffs?

A leading authority in this field is Duke of Bedford v. Ellis [1901] A.C. 1, which related to Covent Garden Market. Six plaintiffs, who were growers of fruit, flowers, vegetables, roots and herbs, sued on behalf of themselves and all other such growers. They alleged that the defendant, the Duke of Bedford, who owned and managed the market, had contravened the Covent Garden Market Act 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. cxiii), which governed the management of the market. The Act established preferential rights to use certain pitches at the market in favour of growers of the products in question at rates of rent and toll more favourable to growers than those prescribed for middlemen traders. The plaintiffs claimed a declaration as to the construction of the Act, injunctive relief restraining breaches of the Act, and an account of the amounts by which growers were alleged to have been severally overcharged. The defendant applied interlocutorily claiming that the action could not be pursued as a representative action. That interlocutory application was carried to the House of Lords, where it was held that the action was properly brought as a representative action. The leading speech was delivered by Lord Macnaghten, who said, at p. 8:

“Given a common interest and a common grievance, a representative suit was in order if the relief sought was in its nature beneficial to all whom the plaintiff proposed to represent.”

3 W.L.R.

C.B.S. Ltd. v. Amstrad Plc. (C.A.)

Sir Denys Buckley

A He drew attention to the fact that all the growers had the same rights for which they all relied on one and the same Act of Parliament.

B Similarly, in the instant case the plaintiffs, and all the persons whom they purport to represent, have statutory rights of the same character under the Copyright Act 1956, which the action is designed to protect from infringement resulting from the conduct of the defendants which is complained of. They share, in my judgment, a common interest and a common grievance, such as Lord Macnaghten had in mind. The relief which is primarily claimed is injunctive in a form which would benefit the plaintiffs and all whom they purport to represent in the same way, that is to say, by protecting them from the risk of infringements incited by the defendants.

C As Whitford J. has pointed out, there would be likely to be formidable difficulties in the way of discovering the precise measure of any damage already suffered by any individual copyright owner. It seems improbable that any claim to damages will be pursued, but it seems to me that the possibility of such a claim is no greater bar to a representative action than was the claim to an account in Duke of Bedford v. Ellis. See also E.M.I. Records Ltd. v. Riley [1981] 1 W.L.R. 923 where, in an infringement action, representative plaintiffs claimed an inquiry as to damages as well as an injunction.

D It has been argued that a representative action is not permissible where there is a claim to damages, because each claimant would have to establish his individual damage. We were referred to Markt & Co. Ltd. v. Knight Steamship Co. Ltd. [1910] 2 K.B. 1021, where a claim in damages was brought against the owners of a ship lost at sea by plaintiffs suing on behalf of themselves and other owners of cargo on board the ship, which was also lost. The Court of Appeal held that the plaintiffs could not sue in a representative capacity. Vaughan Williams L.J. said, at p. 1029:

F “in the present case there is no common origin of the claims of those who shipped goods on board the Knight Commander—the contracts were constituted by the bills of lading, which manifestly might differ much in their form, and as to the exceptions, and probably would vary somewhat according to the nature of the goods shipped.”

G Fletcher Moulton L.J. said, at p. 1035: “where the claim of the plaintiff is for damages the machinery of a representative suit is absolutely inapplicable” but he subsequently made clear, at p. 1040, that what he had in mind was a case in which damages was the sole relief sought. Buckley L.J., who dissented on the ground that any difficulty about the action continuing as a representative action could be cured by an amendment of the pleadings, said, at p. 1045:

H “It may be, and I think it is the case, that in a representative action the plaintiff must be in a position to claim some relief which is common to all, but it is no objection that he claims also relief personal to himself.”

In the instant action, the claims of the plaintiffs and those of the persons whom they purport to represent, all have a common basis: damages are not the sole relief claimed and can, in my opinion, be regarded as a quite subsidiary form of relief, capable of being pursued by any individual claimant taking out a summons under any order for an inquiry that the court might make to have his individual claim in damages assessed; and the major relief claimed is common to all the plaintiffs and those whom they purport to represent. In my judgment, this action has been properly framed as a representative action.

For these reasons I, for my part, would dismiss the defendants' two appeals in their entirety. In consequence of the decision of this court in the declaratory action, I would also dismiss the plaintiffs' appeal. If this interlocutory appeal is taken to the House of Lords, it will be open to the plaintiffs to seek to have those words which have been deleted from the statement of claim restored. If after trial any party wishes to appeal, it might be thought that the case would be a suitable one for the leap-frog procedure. This, to some extent, would mitigate the expense of these unfortunately duplicative proceedings.

Fox L.J. I have had the advantage of reading in draft the judgment of Nicholls L.J. I agree with it, and do not wish to add to it.

GULF OIL (GREAT BRITAIN) LTD. v. PAGE AND OTHERS

[1987 G. No. 1649]

1987 March 19;
April 2

Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V.-C.,
Parker and Ralph Gibson L.JJ.

Injunction—Interlocutory—Jurisdiction to grant—Conspiracy to injure—Defendants publishing allegation that plaintiff had acted in breach of contract—Accuracy of statement not in issue—Whether jurisdiction to grant interlocutory injunction restraining publication

The plaintiff, an oil company, entered into an exclusive supply agreement with the defendants who owned and operated several petrol filling stations. On 3 April 1985, following a dispute over outstanding amounts due from the defendants, the plaintiff refused to make any further deliveries to the defendants save on c.o.d. direct debit terms. The defendants obtained supplies from another source and failed to make any of the payments due to the plaintiff. On 15 April the plaintiff gave notice terminating the agreement. In July 1985 the defendants commenced an action against the plaintiff, claiming that the agreement was still in force and seeking damages for breach of contract. In December 1986 Scott J. held that between 3 and 15 April 1985 the plaintiff had been in breach of the agreement and that the defendants were entitled to damages for failure to make deliveries during that period. The defendants appealed and the plaintiff cross-appealed. While the appeals were pending the defendants circulated leaflets to several of the plaintiff's customers, giving an account of the litigation and judgment. In March 1987 the plaintiff was entertaining customers at a hospitality tent at the Cheltenham Gold Cup race meeting when the defendants flew a light aircraft over the racecourse, displaying a banner with the words "Gulf exposed in fundamental breach." The plaintiff sought an injunction restraining the defendants from displaying the airborne sign and subsequently issued a writ against the defendants seeking damages for conspiracy to injure. Warner J. refused to grant the injunction on the ground that the truth of the words was not in issue.

On the plaintiff's appeal:—

Held, allowing the appeal, that the general principle in defamation cases that there was no wrong done if the words published were true, did not apply if they were published pursuant to a combination, the sole or dominant purpose of which was to injure; that since the plaintiff did not assert any cause of action in libel and relied only on conspiracy to injure, the court needed only to be satisfied that there was a serious question on combination and intention to injure to be tried; that there was clear evidence of a combination between the defendants to display the airborne sign in circumstances where it would be seen by the maximum number of people in order to inflict the maximum possible damage to the plaintiff's business by way of revenge; and that, accordingly, there was a strong prima facie case of conspiracy to injure and the plaintiff was entitled to the injunction sought (post, pp. 171D–E, 172B–C, E–F, G–H, 173A–C).

Bonnard v. Perryman [1891] 2 Ch. 269, C.A. distinguished.

Per curiam. A plaintiff in an action for libel against the author and publisher of a newspaper article might well establish a combination, but it would only be in the rarest case that sufficient evidence of a dominant purpose to injure could be made out to warrant the grant of interlocutory relief. The court would scrutinise with the greatest care any case where a cause of action in conspiracy was joined to a cause of action in defamation and would require to be satisfied that such joinder was not merely an attempt to circumvent the rule in defamation (post, p. 172D–E).

APPEAL from Warner J.

By notice of motion the plaintiff, Gulf Oil (Great Britain) Ltd., sought an interlocutory injunction against the defendants, Alfred William

James Page, Stephen Martin Page and Segap Garages Ltd., that each of them, in the case of the third defendant by its directors or officers and in the case of all defendants by themselves, their servants or agents or otherwise howsoever, be restrained from exhibiting or publishing on any airborne sign the legend "Gulf exposed in fundamental breach" or any words to the like or similar effect.

On 19 March 1987 Warner J. dismissed the plaintiff's motion. The plaintiff appealed and the appeal was heard later the same day. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal and granted the injunction sought but reserved reasons for their decision.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Parker L.J.

John Cherryman Q.C. and Edward Davidson for the plaintiffs.
Leolin Price Q.C. and Hubert Picarda for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

2 April. The following judgments were handed down.

PARKER L.J. The brothers Alfred and Stephen Page own, control and are directors of a company, Segap Garages Ltd. That company owns and operates a number of petrol filling stations. By an exclusive supply agreement dated 5 May 1982 Segap agreed to buy and Gulf Oil (Great Britain) Ltd. agreed to sell all the fuel required for certain of Segap's filling stations. The term of the agreement was five years from 13 April 1982.

At the beginning of 1985 Gulf were supplying the fuel to four filling stations. All were being supplied on credit terms. By 3 April 1985 Segap's product debt amounted to some £400,000, of which about £6,800 was due for payment on 10 April, about £7,000 on 11 April and the remainder on 20 April. Segap had also by that date placed orders for deliveries on 4, 6 and 9 April.

In this situation, Gulf, by telex dated 3 April, refused to make any further deliveries save on c.o.d. direct debit terms. Segap refused to accept deliveries on such terms and Gulf maintained its refusal to supply on existing credit terms. As a result Gulf did not make the deliveries due on 4, 6 and 9 April. On 10 April Segap obtained supplies from an alternative source but made it clear that it was holding Gulf to the agreement. It did not, however, make the payments due on 10 and 11 April.

On 15 April Gulf gave notice terminating the agreement, claiming to be entitled so to do pursuant to a clause in the agreement which gave it a right to terminate in the event of breach of the agreement by Segap. The breaches relied on by Gulf were the obtaining of supplies from another source and the failure to make the payments due on 10 and 11 April.

Gulf did not therefore make any further deliveries and Segap did not make the payment due on 20 April or any further payment, albeit that it continued to assert that Gulf remained bound by the supply agreement.

In July 1985 Gulf issued a writ against Segap and the two Pages claiming, inter alia, the outstanding money due under the agreement for which it was alleged the two Pages as well as Gulf were liable. Judgment in this action was given in favour of Gulf by Knox J. on 9 June 1986.

3 W.L.R.

Gulf Oil Ltd. v. Page (C.A.)

Parker L.J.

A Also in July 1985 Segap issued proceedings against Gulf claiming damages for Gulf's failure to supply from 3 April onwards. In this action Segap continued to claim that the agreement was still in full force and effect. Judgment in those proceedings was given by Scott J. on 19 December 1986. By that time the defendants had paid £550,000 on account of the amount awarded by Knox J. plus interest and costs. Scott J. held that Gulf was in breach of the supply agreement in refusing peremptorily to supply save on c.o.d. direct debit terms but that it was entitled on 15 April to terminate the agreement for non-payment of the amounts due on 10 and 11 April. Accordingly, the agreement was terminated by the telex of 15 April and Segap were entitled to damages, but only in respect of the failure to fulfil the orders for deliveries on 4, 6 and 9 April. An inquiry as to the quantum of such damages was ordered. It is not disputed that such damages will probably be in the order of £1,500. Segap have appealed and Gulf have cross-appealed against the judgment of Scott J. and the appeal and cross-appeal are pending.

D After the judgment of Scott J. a document giving an account of the litigation and judgment was circulated to a number of Gulf customers, and on 18 March, during the Cheltenham race meeting, a light aircraft flew over Cheltenham where it could be seen both from Gulf's head offices and from the racecourse where Gulf was entertaining a number of customers. The aircraft was displaying a clearly visible legend "Gulf exposed in fundamental breach."

Thereupon Gulf's solicitors sent two telexes to the solicitors acting for Segap and the two Pages. The first telex was in the following terms:

E "Our client; Gulf Oil (Great Britain) Ltd.

"Your clients: Messrs. A. W. J. & S. M. Page and Segap Garages Ltd.

F "Our client has been aware for some time of a campaign, which is believed to be orchestrated by your clients and which has been conducted by circulating leaflets to our client's retail outlets about the recent litigation between our respective clients.

"Today an aeroplane flew over the Cheltenham area (where it is well known our client's head office is situated and large crowds were attending the races) towing a sign bearing the words 'Gulf Oil exposed in fundamental breach.' Our client has reason to believe that this too was arranged by your clients.

G "Our client takes a very serious view of this flagrantly offensive conduct, for which there can be no conceivable explanation but an intention to damage our client in a blaze of publicity, the potential damage of which is incalculable.

"Please note that application will be made on behalf of our client ex parte tomorrow morning in the Chancery Division for an immediate injunction to restrain any repetition of today's activity.

H "Please inform us immediately of the name and address of the operator of the aircraft concerned. We believe the operator to be Airspace Outdoor Advertising Ltd. of PO Box 2, Bishops Waltham, Hampshire.

"Our client will hold your clients liable for all damages suffered as a result of your clients' conduct."

The second telex stated:

"Your clients: Messrs. A. W. J. Page and S. M. Page and Segap Garages Ltd. A

"Our client: Gulf Oil (Great Britain) Ltd.

"One point further to our telex timed at 17:32 today arises: Please let us know if you have instructions to accept service of the writ we propose issuing tomorrow. This request goes to the writ only: If an order is made tomorrow, it will have to be served personally." B

The following morning Gulf's solicitors received the following reply:

"Your client: Gulf Oil (Great Britain) Ltd.

"Our client: A. W. J. Page and S. M. Page and Segap Garages Ltd.

"1. I thank you for your telexes of yesterday evening on which we have taken instructions. 2. Our clients arranged the aeroplane towing the sign. 3. You have correctly identified the operator of the aeroplane. 4. You have not identified any cause of action which your client says it has against ours. How does your client put its case? Is there in existence a draft statement of claim or draft evidence which we could see? If so, please fax together with draft minutes of order. 5. We are instructed to appear by counsel (Mr. Price Q.C.) on your client's ex parte application and if injunctive relief is obtained to your client to apply immediately inter partes for the discharge of such relief. Will your application be before the motions judge or have any other arrangements been made? Please let us know. 6. We have instructions to accept service of the writ. 7. Finally, we assume but please confirm that the truth of the words on the sign is not at issue? Regards." C D E

On receipt of this telex Gulf immediately applied in the Chancery Division for an interim injunction in these terms:

"that until trial or further order in the meantime the defendants and each of them, in the case of the third defendant by its directors and officers and in the case of all defendants by themselves their servants or agents or otherwise howsoever be restrained from exhibiting or publishing on any airborne sign or otherwise howsoever the legend 'Gulf exposed in fundamental breach' or any words to the like or similar effect." F

The application was heard by Warner J. It was opposed by counsel on behalf of Segap and the two Pages. It was refused by Warner J. At that time no writ had been issued but the writ which Gulf proposed to issue was intended to be, and subsequently was, endorsed with a claim for damages for conspiracy. The matter was of great urgency because the Cheltenham Gold Cup was due to be run at 3 p.m. the same day and this is an event which attracts particularly large numbers of race-goers. Gulf accordingly appealed forthwith to this court against the refusal to grant interim relief and the appeal was heard at 2 p.m. Interim relief was, after brief argument on both sides and for reasons to be given later, granted in the terms sought, save that the injunction was limited to exhibition by airborne sign and to the duration of the current Cheltenham race meeting. G H

Relief was refused by Warner J. on the simple ground that the truth of the words was not in issue and that, in a libel action, if a defendant

A intends to justify, interim relief is, as a matter of principle, never granted. Mr. Cherryman for Gulf did not seek to challenge the principle, but contended that where there was clear evidence of a conspiracy to injure the principle had no application. Mr. Price for the defendants advanced the contrary contention, asserting that if interim relief could be granted in such a case as this it would, in effect, reverse the long-standing principle because it would often be open to a plaintiff in a libel action to claim also in conspiracy against the reporter, editor, printers and publishers of the libel.

B The point is an important one and it is unfortunate that time considerations did not allow counsel on either side to prepare or develop full argument. This being so, and the matter being in any event interlocutory only, it is, in my view, undesirable that this court should make any further pronouncement on the law than is absolutely necessary for the purpose of disposing of the appeal.

C There was in the exchange of telexes clear evidence of a combination between the two Pages and Segap to display the airborne sign over the Cheltenham racecourse where it could be seen, and in order that it should be seen, by the maximum number of people, the vast majority of whom would have no interest whatever in the supply of fuel to retail filling stations. This was done, moreover, at a time when appeal and cross-appeal from the judgment of Scott J. was pending and when, according to his judgment, the supply agreement had been terminated. The defendants had therefore, at the time, no immediate interest of their own to protect against Gulf and no interest of their own to further as against Gulf. In these circumstances there is, in my view, a strong inference that the purpose of the display was simply to inflict upon Gulf the maximum possible damage in its business by way of revenge. There is thus not merely a serious question to be tried, but a strong prima facie case in conspiracy to injure. It may be that that case will not in the event succeed, but, unless the libel principle is a complete answer to the claim for interlocutory relief, this is a plain case for the grant of such relief on the principles enunciated in American Cyanamid Co. v. Ethicon Ltd. [1975] A.C. 396. Indeed, this was not seriously disputed.

E In my view, the principle mentioned is not a bar. It was established in this court in Bonnard v. Perryman [1891] 2 Ch. 269 in which case the court expressly approved the statement of the law by Lord Esher M.R. in Coulson v. Coulson (1887) 3 T.L.R. 846. It has been applied consistently ever since: see, for example, Fraser v. Evans [1969] 1 Q.B. 349; Harakas v. Baltic Mercantile and Shipping Exchange Ltd. [1982] 1 W.L.R. 958 and Schering Chemicals Ltd. v. Falkman Ltd. [1982] Q.B. 1. It is, in my view, unaffected by the general principles laid down in American Cyanamid Co. v. Ethicon Ltd. [1975] A.C. 396.

G However, in Fraser v. Evans [1969] 1 Q.B. 349 Lord Denning M.R., explaining the reason for the rule, said, at pp. 360-361:

H "The court will not restrain the publication of an article, even though it is defamatory, when the defendant says he intends to justify it or to make fair comment on a matter of public interest. That has been established for many years ever since Bonnard v. Perryman [1891] 2 Ch. 269. The reason sometimes given is that the defences of justification and fair comment are for the jury, which is the constitutional tribunal, and not for a judge. But a better reason is the importance in the public interest that the truth should out. As the court said in that case at p. 284: 'The right of free speech is one which it is for the public interest that individuals should possess, and, indeed, that they should exercise without impediment, so long as no wrongful act is done.' There is no wrong done if it is true, or if it is fair comment on a matter of public interest. The court will not prejudice the issue by granting an injunction in advance of publication."

It is true that there is no wrong done if what is published is true provided that it is not published in pursuance of a combination and, even if it is, there is still no wrong unless the sole or dominant purpose of the combination and publication is to injure the plaintiff. If, however, there is both combination and purpose or dominant purpose to injure there is a wrong done. When a plaintiff sues in conspiracy there is, therefore, a potential wrong even if it is admitted, as it is in the present case, that the publication is true and thus that there is no question of a cause of action in defamation. In such a case the court can, and in my view should, proceed on the same principles as it would in the case of any other tort.

The prospect that this would open the floodgates and reverse the principle applicable in libel actions is, in my view, unreal. A plaintiff in an action against the author and publisher of a newspaper article, for example, might well establish a combination, but it appears to me that it would only be in the rarest case that sufficient evidence of a dominant purpose to injure could be made out to warrant the grant of interlocutory relief, and I have no doubt that the court would scrutinise with the greatest care any case where a cause of action in conspiracy was joined to a cause of action in defamation and would require to be satisfied that such joinder was not merely an attempt to circumvent the rule in defamation.

Where, however, it is not asserted that there is any cause of action in libel and the plaintiff relies on conspiracy only, then the court needs only to be satisfied that there is a serious question on combination and intention to injure to be tried. Very often there may not be, but in the present circumstances, in my view, there clearly was. The occasion, scale and manner of publication of the true statement was such that a strong prima facie case of dominant purpose to injure was made out.

I find it unnecessary to consider the question of the apparent anomaly that an act done by one which is not actionable can become actionable if done in combination and with the sole or dominant intent to injure, for it is well established that this is so.

I also find it unnecessary to consider Mr. Price's submission that the alleged conspiracy was between two directors of a company and the company itself, for it is admitted in the telexes that the arrangements for the aerial display were made by all three defendants.

For the above reasons the plaintiffs were, in my view, entitled to the limited injunction granted.

RALPH GIBSON L.J. I agree that the judge was not right to refuse relief on the ground that, in this case, the principle established in Bonnard v. Perryman [1891] 2 Ch. 269 constituted a bar. Although that principle, which is applied in defamation cases, is not directly applicable in its terms to a case where the basis of claim is conspiracy to inflict deliberate damage without any just cause, nevertheless it seems to me

3 W.L.R.

Gulf Oil Ltd. v. Page (C.A.)

Ralph Gibson L.J.

A that that principle, namely the individual and the public interest in the right of free speech, is a matter of great importance in the consideration of the question whether in the exercise of the court's discretion an interlocutory injunction should be made and, if yes, what should be the extent of any restriction upon publication of any statement pending trial. The plaintiffs made out, as I think, an arguable case that the aerial display was carried out by the defendants as part of a concerted plan to inflict deliberate damage upon the plaintiffs thereby without any just cause. Due regard being given to the principle of free speech, the plaintiffs were, in my judgment, entitled to the limited injunction granted by this court.

Rating—Unoccupied hereditament—Completion notice—Substantial completion of office block—Time required for customary works necessary to complete building—Whether preparation period prior to starting customary works included—Date at which customary works deemed to start—General Rate Act 1967 (c. 9), s. 17, Sch. 1, paras. 8(1)(b), 9

For the purposes of determining the date that a building under construction shall be rated as an unoccupied hereditament, paragraph 8(1) of Schedule 1 to the General Rate Act 1967 provides:

“Where a rating authority are of opinion—(a) that the erection of a building within their area has been completed; or (b) that the work remaining to be done on a building within their area is such that the erection of the building can reasonably be expected to be completed within three months . . . the authority may serve on the owner of the building . . . a ‘completion notice’ . . . stating that the erection of the building is to be treated for the purposes of this Schedule as completed on the date of service of the notice or on such later date as may be specified by the notice.”

Paragraph 9 provides:

“In a case of a building to which work remains to be done of a kind which is customarily done to a building of the type in question after the erection of the building has been substantially completed, it shall be assumed for the purposes of paragraph 8 of this Schedule that the erection of the building has been or can reasonably be expected to be completed at the expiration of such period beginning with the date of its completion apart from the work as is reasonably required for carrying out the work.”

The owners of a site in Islington decided to develop it by building a large block for the purpose of providing office space for letting. On 1 March an official of the rating authority visited the site and considered that the building had been substantially completed and on 1 June 1983, the rating authority served a notice under paragraph 8(1)(b) of Schedule 1 to the General Rate Act 1967, specifying 1 September 1983 as the date when the erection of the hereditament could reasonably be expected to be completed but the architect did not issue his certificate of practical completion of the building, apart from the fitting out work, until 31 August 1983. The owners appealed, pursuant to paragraph 8(4), against the rating authority's notice to the county court on the ground that the hereditament could not reasonably be expected to be completed by the date specified. The judge dismissed the appeal, holding that by the beginning of March 1983 the building was substantially completed, that the defects in the main structure of the building could be remedied during the period that would be necessary to carry out the works customarily done after substantial completion and those customary works could reasonably be carried out within a period of six months. On the owners' appeal to the Court of Appeal the judge's findings of law were affirmed but the appeal was allowed on the ground that upon the evidence before him the judge could not properly have come to the conclusion he did on the time reasonably required for fitting out, and the matter was remitted for the judge to consider anew the appropriate completion date.

On the owners' appeal on the construction placed on paragraph 9 in the courts below:—

Held, allowing the appeal in part, (1) that for the purposes of paragraph 9 the question to be asked was when the building was complete apart from the customary work; that it was plain that the present building was not complete apart from the customary work of fitting out until 31 August 1983, and it was from that date that the period reasonably required for carrying out the fitting out work must be assumed to run to arrive at the appropriate completion date (post, pp. 180F–G, H, 181D, 187E–F, 188E–F).

But (2) that in calculating under paragraph 9 the period required for carrying out the work customarily done after substantial completion no account was to be taken of the time required for planning, tendering and designing the work (post, pp. 181D–E, 182A–C, 183A–B, C–D, 187E–F, 188E–F).

(3) That the matter would be remitted to the county court to determine in the light of the determination of the appeal and of any further evidence led by the parties what period was reasonably required after 31 August 1983 for carrying out the work remaining to be done to the building and, accordingly, on what date it was to be treated as completed for the purposes of Schedule 1 to the General Rate Act 1967 (post, pp. 187B–C, E–F, 188E–F).

3 W.L.R.

London Merchant Plc. v. Islington L.B.C. (H.L.(E.))

Per Lord Bridge of Harwich, Lord Brandon of Oakbrook, Lord Ackner and Lord Goff of Chieveley. In a case where the fitting out work has already begun when the notice under paragraph 8(1)(b) is served and there is no need to resort to paragraph 9 the building owner will be entitled to rely on the plans, specifications, contract or other evidence showing what work is intended to be carried out in order to prove the extent of the work remaining to be done and the court will base its estimate of the time reasonably required on that evidence. If this is the correct approach under paragraph 8(1)(b) to "the work remaining to be done," a similar approach under paragraph 9 to the question what work "remains to be done" must, as far as practicable, also be adopted. The adverb "customarily" in paragraph 9 serves only to distinguish between work of a kind done after substantial completion and that done before; it has nothing to do with the extent of the work (post, pp. 183D-E, 185G—186E, 187E, 188E-F).

APPEAL from the Court of Appeal.

This was an appeal by leave of the House of Lords (Lord Bridge of Harwich, Lord Brightman and Lord Mackay of Clashfern) dated 11 June 1986 by the appellants, London Merchant Securities Plc. and Trendworthy Two Ltd., the owners of a large office development known as the Angel Centre, Pentonville Road, Islington, from the judgment dated 24 March 1986 of the Court of Appeal (Dillon L.J. and Booth J.) allowing in part only an appeal by the appellants from the judgment dated 21 December 1984 of Judge Marder Q.C., sitting at Clerkenwell County Court, who had dismissed their appeal brought pursuant to paragraph 8(4) of Schedule 1 to the General Rate Act 1967, in respect of a completion notice dated 1 June 1983 served by the respondents, the London Borough of Islington, as the rating authority, on the appellants in respect of the Angel Centre.

The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Bridge of Harwich.

William Glover Q.C. and Guy Roots for the appellants.

Matthew Horton and Nicholas Burton for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

20 May. LORD BRIDGE OF HARWICH. My Lords, the Angel Centre is a large, modern office development in Islington. It comprises two buildings. The net office floor space in one building is 162,000 sq. ft., in the other 12,000 sq. ft. The appellants are the owners. They carried out the development for the purpose of providing office space to be let. In this sense the development may be described as speculative. The word is not used in any pejorative sense, but merely to distinguish such a development from one which is carried out by or to the order of the intending occupier. The distinction is of importance for this reason. In the case of an occupier's development, as I will call it, the building can be planned and executed as a single operation because the detailed requirements of the occupier as to how the building shall be fitted out are known in advance. In the case of a speculative development, however, of shops, offices and perhaps some other categories of building, the building operation will commonly be carried out in two phases. The developer will provide the main structure of the building complete with necessary services in the first phase. But the addition of many features which, when they are provided, will certainly form part of the building, as distinct from mere furnishings, will be postponed to a second phase in order that they may be designed to meet the requirements of the eventual occupier or occupiers. The most obvious example of this two phase process is a speculative development which comprises at ground floor level a row of small shops. On completion of the first phase these will be empty shells with boarded fronts. All the shop fronts and fittings will be provided in the second phase to suit the various requirements of the individual shopkeeper tenants. The same two phase process appears now to be commonly adopted in the speculative development of modern office buildings.

E

Parliament, by the Local Government Act 1966, gave power to rating authorities to adopt a code which enabled them for the first time to levy rates on unoccupied hereditaments. The power to adopt the code is now found in section 17 of the General Rate Act 1967 ("the Act") and the code in Schedule 1 to the Act. Some amendments to Schedule 1 made by the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 can, for present purposes, be ignored as having no relevance to any point raised in this appeal. In a rating area where Schedule 1 applies, as it does in Islington, the owner of a "relevant hereditament" becomes liable to pay rates if the hereditament remains unoccupied for a continuous period exceeding three months. "Relevant hereditament" is defined by paragraph 15 as meaning:

G

"any hereditament consisting of, or of part of, a house, shop, office, factory, mill or other building whatsoever, together with any garden, yard, court or other land ordinarily used or intended for use for the purposes of the building or part; . . ."

H

In enacting the code, the legislature foresaw the necessity in the case of a newly erected building standing empty to determine with precision a date which should be taken as the commencement of the initial period of three months which must elapse before any liability to pay rates can attach. It will be convenient to refer to this as "the completion date."

3 W.L.R.

London Merchant Plc. v. Islington L.B.C. (H.L.(E.))

Lord Bridge
of Harwich

A They clearly had in contemplation the two phase process in certain forms of speculative development which I have described and the relevant provisions, as we shall see, are designed to ensure in relation to buildings erected in the course of such development that buildings in which the first phase of development has been completed may in due course attract liability to rates as unoccupied hereditaments notwithstanding that the second phase may be postponed.

B The first step necessary to determine the completion date for a new building is the service of a completion notice by the rating authority under paragraph 8(1) of Schedule 1 which provides:

C “Where a rating authority are of opinion—(a) that the erection of a building within their area has been completed; or (b) that the work remaining to be done on a building within their area is such that the erection of the building can reasonably be expected to be completed within three months, and that the building is, or when completed will be, comprised in a relevant hereditament, the authority may serve on the owner of the building a notice (hereafter in this paragraph referred to as ‘a completion notice’) stating that the erection of the building is to be treated for the purposes of this Schedule as completed on the date of service of the notice or on such later date as may be specified by the notice.”

D The effect of paragraph 8(2) to (5) may be summarised as follows. If the completion notice is not varied by agreement, withdrawn or successfully appealed against, the date specified in the notice as the date of actual or anticipated completion becomes the completion date. But the owner has a right of appeal to the county court under paragraph 8(4) on the ground:

E “that the erection of the building to which the notice relates has not been or, as the case may be, cannot reasonably be expected to be completed by the date specified by the notice.”

F If the appeal is successful, the completion date will be “such date as the court shall determine” for the purposes of Schedule 1: see paragraph 5.

G If the legislation stopped at that point the rating authority might never be able to serve an effective completion notice on the owner of a building erected in the course of speculative development and standing empty on completion of the first phase but in which the second phase had not yet been commenced. In the case of, say, a small shop where it would be apparent that the work of installing the shop front and fittings could be comfortably completed within three months, a notice served under paragraph 8(1)(b) specifying a date three months after service as the anticipated completion date could be appealed against on the ground that the work of installing the shop front and shop fittings necessary to complete the shop as a “completed building comprised in a relevant hereditament” could not reasonably be expected to be carried out until the shop was let and the requirements of the tenant shopkeeper were known. But to meet this situation paragraph 9 of Schedule 1 provides:

H “In the case of a building to which work remains to be done of a kind which is customarily done to a building of the type in question after the erection of the building has been substantially completed, it shall be assumed for the purposes of paragraph 8 of this Schedule that the erection of the building has been or can reasonably be expected to be completed at the expiration of such period beginning with the date of its completion apart from the work as is reasonably required for carrying out the work."

The development of the Angel Centre began in 1980. The first phase of the development was finished in 1983. This phase of the development was carried out under a single contract at a cost in excess of £16 million. The architect issued his certificate of practical completion on 31 August 1983. On 1 June 1983 the respondent council as the rating authority served on the appellants under paragraph 8(1)(b) of Schedule 1 to the Act a notice specifying 1 September 1983 as the date when the erection of the building could reasonably be expected to be completed. The appellants appealed to the county court. After a hearing extending over 11 days between 5 and 26 November 1984, Judge Mander O.C., sitting in the Clerkenwell County Court, delivered judgment dismissing the appeal on 21 December 1984. The appellants appealed to the Court of Appeal on three grounds. The appeal failed on two grounds, but succeeded on the third to the extent that the Court of Appeal (Dillon L.J. and Booth J.) remitted the matter to the judge to consider afresh, in the light of their judgments, the appropriate completion date. The appellants now appeal by leave of your Lordships' House on the two grounds on which they failed in the Court of Appeal, which raise points of pure construction of paragraph 9 of Schedule 1 to the Act. Although there is no cross appeal, the issue on which the Court of Appeal determined that the matter called for remission has also been extensively canvassed in argument, primarily at the instance of counsel for the rating authority, and, since the case, if not resolved by agreement, will now have to go back to the county court in any event, it seems to me inevitable that your Lordships should also examine and give whatever guidance may be appropriate in relation to that issue.

The case for the rating authority in the county court was that an inspection of the Angel Centre buildings in March 1983 by council officials had shown that they must have been substantially completed by the beginning of that month and that the time reasonably required for carrying out the work which remained to be done of a kind customarily done to office buildings after substantial completion, which has throughout been compendiously and appropriately described as "fitting out work," was not more than six months. It was on this basis that they claimed to justify 1 September 1983 as the completion date. The appellants proved, and the judge accepted, that, inter alia, two items affecting the main building had caused the architect to delay issuing his certificate of practical completion until 31 August 1983. The building was equipped with a full air conditioning plant. This had been condemned by the respondent council, wearing a different hat than as rating authority, as being excessively noisy. This defect had not been remedied until July 1983. Moreover, because the building was air conditioned, it was essential that window frames and seals be correctly fitted. Many of these had been condemned by the architect when first fitted and the work had to be done again. This work was not complete before the end of August 1983.

Against this background of undisputed fact the judge had to decide on the true construction of paragraph 9, from what starting date the time reasonably required for the fitting out work began to run in order to arrive at the appropriate completion date, 1 March 1983 as the rating

Lord Bridge
of Harwich

A authority contended or 31 August 1983 as the appellants contended and still contend.

The judge quoted the senior council official who made the March inspection, a Mr. Edwards, as saying:

B "My concept of 'substantial completion' is that you have to have walls, floors, ceilings, windows, a water supply, electricity supply and lighting, lifts, toilets, plastered walls and so on. All are required for substantial completion in a building of this size and they were there in that building."

When the judge addressed the issue of the construction of paragraph 9 he said:

C "Substantial completion, in my view, is a matter of objective fact, and the test adopted by Mr. Edwards is perhaps as near as one can get to a satisfactory definition. I accept that much work still remained to be done before the erection of the Angel Centre could be said to be complete, but that was almost entirely work of fitting out or adaptation of the kind which it is agreed is customarily done after substantial completion. Such other relatively minor work as did not meet that description—for example adjusting the window seals, or fitting a replacement air conditioning unit—that work could readily be accommodated (the word 'subsumed' was fashionable in the course of the hearing)—could readily be subsumed in the fitting out period . . ."

The added emphasis in this passage is mine and the reason for adding it will shortly become apparent.

E In the Court of Appeal [1986] R.A. 81 the judge's approach to this issue was approved. Dillon L.J. said, at p. 89:

F "On what I regard as the sensible construction of paragraph 9, the question whether a building has been substantially completed is a broad question of fact; I would reject the narrower construction that under paragraph 9 there is only substantial completion when there is nothing whatsoever but the fitting out work to be done."

Booth J., having recited the appellants' submission, continued, at p. 96:

G "I am unable to accept that submission. It amounts in effect to saying that the time reasonably required for the fitting out work shall not be deemed to run until the erection of the building is completed save and except for that work. Had Parliament intended paragraph 9 to have that meaning then the words used by the draftsman would have made it clear. In my judgment the words 'substantially completed' mean no more than that the building has reached the stage in its construction when it would be practical for the fitting out work to commence."

H My Lords, I have to say, with all respect to the judges in both courts below, that they failed to analyse sufficiently closely the language of paragraph 9. Had they done so, they would have discovered that it bears the precise meaning for which the appellants have throughout contended and indeed it seems to me to be capable of no other meaning.

In order to analyse paragraph 9 it will be helpful to set it out in numbered clauses and for clarity to vary the order in which these clauses appear, which may be done without altering the sense of the paragraph. It will then read as follows:

“In the case of a building—(1) to which work remains to be done of a kind which is customarily done to a building of the type in question after the erection of the building has been substantially completed, (2) it shall be assumed for the purposes of paragraph 8 of this Schedule that the building has been or can reasonably be expected to be completed at the expiration of such period . . . as is reasonably required for carrying out the work (3) beginning with the date of its completion apart from the work.”

The words “substantially completed” appear in clause (1) only and the concept of substantial completion is relevant solely for the purpose of identifying a certain kind of work which, in this analysis, I shall designate as “the customary work.” The first question which a judge who has to apply this paragraph must ask himself is: “What kind of work is customarily done to a building of the type with which I am concerned after substantial completion?” Given the common practice of speculative development in two phases of shop and office buildings which I have earlier described, I apprehend that the answer to this question will not normally be in dispute, or, if in dispute, difficult to determine. In the case of a shop, the customary work will be the installation of the shop front and shop fittings. In the case of this office building there seems to have been no dispute that the customary work embraced no more and no less than what was described as the fitting out work. Proceeding to clauses (2) and (3), it is obvious that “the work” referred to in each clause means the customary work. The second question, therefore, which the judge must ask is: “What period is reasonably required for carrying out the customary work which remains to be done to the subject building?” I will call that “the customary work period.” To arrive at the date to be assumed as the completion date for the purposes of paragraph 8, clause (3) then poses the simple question: “When will the customary work period expire if it is assumed to begin on the date of completion of the subject building apart from the customary work?”

This analysis demonstrates that it never becomes necessary to ask under paragraph 9 the question when the subject building was substantially completed; the question to be asked about the subject building is when it was complete apart from the customary work. These two questions will produce different answers if the words “substantially completed” mean, as Booth J. put it, “no more than that the building has reached the stage in its construction when it would be practical for the fitting out work to commence.” But the language of clause (3), in choosing as the date when the period reasonably required for the customary work is assumed to begin the date of the completion of the building apart from that work, leaves no room for the assumption, on which all three judgments in the courts below are based, that ordinary work to complete the building (non-customary work) and fitting out work (customary work) may be carried out concurrently. It is clear that the Angel Centre was not complete apart from the customary work of fitting out until 31 August 1983 and it is from that date, not 1 March, that the period reasonably required for carrying out the fitting out work must be assumed to run to arrive at the appropriate completion date.

A Counsel for the rating authority was, I think, inclined to agree that this construction of paragraph 9 accords with the ordinary grammatical meaning of the language used. But he submitted that the construction adopted by the courts below should nevertheless be preferred in order to stem the tide of abuse which he suggested would follow if speculative B developers could leave buildings at a stage just short of completion apart from the customary work, in which state they could stand empty indefinitely without attracting the unoccupied rate. My Lords, I would suppose that most speculative developers of shop and office properties are primarily interested in carrying out their development as economically, swiftly and efficiently as possible and in letting the property to secure an early return on their investment. I doubt if they will devote much of their ingenuity or energy to devising schemes to ensure that, if they C cannot let the property, they will escape liability for the unoccupied rate. There was certainly not the slightest suggestion of any such artificial device being involved in the instant case. But if my view of the ways of property developers is unduly naive and the threat materialises of widespread avoidance of the unoccupied rate on the lines adumbrated by counsel for the rating authority, it can only be countered by amending legislation. The language of the statute as it stands is clear and D unambiguous and leaves no room for a construction designed to counter rate avoidance in anticipation.

It follows that, in my opinion, the appellants are entitled to succeed on the first issue raised in the appeal.

E The second question directly raised in the appeal is whether, in calculating the period reasonably required for carrying out the customary work which remains to be done to the building the period required for certain preparatory operations should or should not be included in the calculation. The nature of the preparatory operations in question is sufficiently indicated in the following summary of the evidence of the appellants' principal witness on the subject, which I take from the judgment of Dillon L.J. [1986] R.A. 81, 90:

F "Mr. Henderson, who was called by the appellants as an expert on fitting out of office buildings, gave in a written report a short summary of the works which would be involved which he costed at approximately £3m. He then said that, even without any survey period to ascertain occupier's requirements, the time taken to complete the outline design schemes for a building of the size of the G Angel Centre incorporating the facilities he had described would be at least eight weeks. He said that after the outline design schemes had been accepted by the client bills of quantities and contract documentation would be prepared and competitive tenders would be sought; and the time required, including time for receiving and analysing the tenders and appointing a contractor, would be about two months. He produced a bar chart which showed a period of four months, before the contractor went on site, for outline design, H detailed design, local authority approvals and (spanned by the foregoing) preparation of contract documentation and tender period."

The factual accuracy of Mr. Henderson's estimate of four months for this preparatory work is accepted by the rating authority, but they submit that, on the true construction of paragraph 9, these necessary preparations to enable the work to be carried out are distinct from carrying out the work itself and accordingly that no time is to be allowed on this account in calculating the period reasonably required for carrying out the work. This submission was upheld by the judge and the Court of Appeal. It is submitted for the appellants that the preparatory work is incidental to the carrying out of the work. Counsel emphasises that paragraph 9 is a deeming provision and submits that, as against the ratepayer, it should not be construed so as to require any greater assumption contrary to the actual facts of the case than its language necessarily requires. In the case of the Angel Centre the actual fact was that on completion of the building apart from the fitting out work, no preparatory work of the kind described by Mr. Henderson had yet been undertaken. It follows, so it was submitted, that the period of four months necessary for preparation must elapse before the fitting out work could be undertaken and therefore must be included in the overall period reasonably required for carrying out that work.

It is to be observed that Mr. Henderson's estimate excludes "any survey period to ascertain the occupier's requirements." This exclusion was no doubt deliberately made in the light of the decision of the Court of Appeal in J.L.G. Investments Ltd. v. Sandwell District Council (1977) 20 R.R.C. 61. It was there held under paragraph 9 that the court could not take into account in calculating the period reasonably required for carrying out the work the time taken in finding a tenant. Delivering the leading judgment, Cairns L.J. said, at pp. 65-66:

"Counsel for the ratepayer contends that paragraph 9 is directed only to excluding unreasonable delay, and that there has been no unreasonable delay in any respect on the part of his clients here. He asks us to say that the words 'required for carrying out the work' are not the same as 'required in carrying out the work,' and points to matters incidental to the carrying out of the work in addition to the physical activities of performing it. He says that some incidental matters must surely be taken into account, such as, for instance, the time taken for the delivery of goods, and perhaps time taken for the preparing of plans for the work and time taken in obtaining consent under building regulations for it. I express no opinion upon any matters of that kind. They might be regarded as something which was indeed incidental to the carrying out of the work, in the sense that they were an essential part in addition to the actual job of the workmen in putting in partitions and that sort of thing. But it seems to me that it is a very different matter to say that time required for carrying out the work can include also the finding of a tenant, however convenient it may be to do so, before the work is started."

The ratepayer accordingly failed and the correctness of that decision is beyond dispute. But here Mr. Henderson's estimate of the time required for preparatory work assumes that at the moment when the Angel Centre was completed apart from fitting out work, the intending occupier had been identified and his requirements ascertained in general terms. On this assumption what remained to be done comprised the several steps described by Mr. Henderson as necessary to translate those general requirements into detailed plans, specifications and a concluded contract enabling the contractor to go upon the site armed with all the necessary statutory and byelaw permissions ready to commence the fitting out work.

London Merchant Plc. v. Islington L.B.C. (H.L.(E.))

Lord Bridge
of Harwich

A Your Lordships must now decide the point left open by Cairns L.J. Like the Court of Appeal I do not find it easy. There is much force in the submission made for the appellants. I do not doubt that the phrase "carrying out the work" is wide enough to include some incidental operations going beyond the physical activities of craftsmen and labourers employed to work on the building of which account must be taken in estimating the period required for carrying out the work. But it seems to me that a distinction must be drawn between what is truly incidental and may prolong the period required once the work has been commenced and what is merely preparatory and necessary to be undertaken before the work can be commenced at all. We are here only concerned with activities in the latter category. Nothing turns on the use of the preposition "for" instead of "in." It is dictated by the preceding verb "required." It would be quite ungrammatical to speak of the period required "in" carrying out the work. If one asked after the event what period was actually occupied in carrying out the work, the answer would surely be arrived at by measuring the period between the contractor's starting and finishing dates. I can find no sufficient reason to apply a different test when required by the statute to ask before the event what period is reasonably required for carrying out the work. Accordingly, I conclude that the appellants must fail on this second issue.

D

E The remaining issue calling for examination is that which prompted the Court of Appeal to remit the case to the judge for reconsideration. Before he could assess what period was reasonably required for carrying out the fitting out work which remained to be done to the Angel Centre on the date of its completion apart from that work, the judge had to decide the nature and scope of the work on which to base his assessment. The appellants' witnesses based their estimates of the time required on a schedule of work which included the provision of such facilities as kitchens, restaurants, dining rooms, an executive suite, a computer suite and conference rooms, as well as office areas. A submission was made by counsel for the rating authority that most, if not all, this work should be disregarded. He based this submission on some observations of my own in a case decided at first instance, Watford Borough Council v. Parcourt Property Investment Co. Ltd. (1971) 17 R.R.C. 19. The judge accepted this submission as the following paragraph from his judgment indicates:

F

G "In my view if the statutory formula is to be satisfied a distinction must be drawn between on the one hand work required to complete the erection of the building, that is to say to render it capable of or available for occupation as an office building; and on the other hand work required by the proposed occupier, to make his occupation more convenient or more comfortable. The test, derived in particular from the case of Watford Borough Council v. Parcourt Property Investment Co. Ltd. was correctly stated by Mr. Horton in the course of his submissions. It is not what an actual tenant may reasonably require but what further work is essential for the purpose of occupation of that building qua office building, and account is to be taken of that work, only in so far as it is, or would be, part of the resulting hereditament. I do not think that (perhaps subtle) distinction was always apparent in the evidence of Mr. Nash or Mr. Henderson and some of the work they postulated seemed to me to involve overlapping or confusion of the two categories. That may be hard to avoid and even harder to quantify, but I do seek to discount that overlapping effect in considering the period of time reasonably required for carrying out the work.”

The Watford case was one in which the rating authority claimed rates on a newly erected and unoccupied building in respect of a period before any completion notice had been served. The first point for my decision was whether it was “a completed building comprised in a relevant hereditament” on a date when, to use for convenience the terminology I have adopted in this opinion, the first phase of development by the speculative developer was complete but none of the fitting out work had been done. It was accepted as common ground that the test to be applied was whether the building was ready for occupation for office purposes. I held that it was not on the ground that, at least, the large open floor areas would require to be divided before it was capable of being occupied as offices and the partitioning could only be provided so as to form part of the rateable hereditament. The later decision of the Court of Appeal in Ravenseft Properties Ltd. v. Newham London Borough Council [1976] Q.B. 464, to which I was also a party, affirmed the test of readiness for occupation as the appropriate test of completion in relation to a building which was the subject of a completion notice served under paragraph 8(1)(a) of Schedule 1 to the Act.

In the Watford case, 17 R.R.C. 19, by the time the case came on for trial the building was occupied and the fitting out work required by and provided for the occupier included a goods lift, a special air conditioning plant for a computer, a kitchen and a canteen. I said in my judgment, at p. 27:

“It was argued by counsel, on behalf of the defendant company albeit with no great enthusiasm, that the absence of the facilities subsequently provided by Heinz in the shape of air-conditioning for the computer, a goods lift and a kitchen and canteen, facilities which undoubtedly could only be provided in a form which would become part of the hereditament, were themselves facilities necessary to the occupation of the building. I am unable to take that view. It may be very usual in these days for the occupier of an office building of this calibre to provide a kitchen and canteen on the premises for his staff, but it is impossible to say that it is essential and a fortiori it is impossible to say that it is an essential feature of any office building to render it ready for occupation that it should be furnished with a goods lift or with an air-conditioning plant appropriate to the needs of a computer.”

In the instant case Dillon L.J. [1986] R.A. 81, 94–95 after citing the above passage from my judgment in the Watford, case said:

“I cannot think that Bridge J., in thus dealing in 1971 with what was essentially a question of fact in relation to a building which had been substantially completed in 1967, was intending to lay down rules of law for all time. . . . The Angel Centre contains over twice as much office space as the 1967 building with which Bridge J. was concerned. The main building in the Angel Centre would, on the evidence, have from 1,500 to 2,000 people working in it after it was occupied. In my judgment it is customary for the fitting out works for such a building to include the provision of restaurant and canteen facilities and a directors’ suite as proposed by Mr.

3 W.L.R.

London Merchant Plc. v. Islington L.B.C. (H.L.(E.))

Lord Bridge
of Harwich

A Henderson. The judgment of Bridge J. did not constrain the judge to hold otherwise. Again computers are found so indispensable in business nowadays that any new office development like the Angel Centre will be fitted out with a computer room. If therefore the allowance for overlapping which the judge made was made comprehensively, without regard to minor details, to exclude the B kitchen facilities, restaurants and dining rooms and the directors' suite and the expenditure in respect of the computer suite, the judge, in my judgment, misdirected himself. In this court we do not know how far the judge, in deciding that the period for carrying out the fitting work should be six months rather than the 12 months proposed by the appellants, discounted for the fact that the work specified by Mr. Henderson could reasonably be done in several C months less than 12 months, and how far he discounted for supposed overlapping."

Before your Lordships counsel for the rating authority, whilst accepting that the remission to the judge could not be challenged, in that the judge had failed to specify the items included in the appellants' schedule of fitting out work which he discounted for what Dillon L.J.
D described as "supposed overlapping," still strenuously contended that on reconsidering the matter the judge would be entitled to make a discount in calculating the period reasonably required for carrying out the fitting out work in respect of any facilities which were not proved to be indispensable in an office building such as the Angel Centre.

My Lords, Dillon L.J. was, if I may respectfully say so, entirely E right, in the passage quoted, to point out that my decision in the Watford case, 17 R.R.C. 19, was a decision on the facts then before me and to draw attention to the factual differences between that case and the instant case derived both from the difference in scale of the two office buildings in question and from advances in office technology. But there is a more fundamental reason why what I said in the Watford case, F correctly understood, is quite irrelevant to the question which the judge here had to decide. The issue in the Watford case, as in the Ravenscroft case [1976] Q.B. 464, was whether the building in question was, in the condition as it stood when it fell to be considered, a "completed building G comprised in a relevant hereditament." Applying the test of readiness for occupation for office purposes the court in both cases answered that question negatively. All I was saying in the paragraph quoted from the Watford case referring to the facilities later provided for an occupier (air conditioning for the computer, goods lift, kitchen and canteen) was that their absence at the material time did not, per se, necessarily lead to the conclusion that the building was not ready for occupation at that time.

Whenever a notice is served under paragraph 8(1)(a) of Schedule 1 to the Act specifying a date when the rating authority assert that a building has been completed and is comprised in a relevant hereditament, H the court must determine whether the building is ready for occupation on that date. But when a notice is served under paragraph 8(1)(b) specifying a future date as that on which the building can reasonably be expected to be completed, the court's approach must necessarily be different. Under paragraph 8(1)(b) the court must first determine the nature and extent of "the work remaining to be done on the building" in order to assess the time when that work can reasonably be expected to be completed. In construing this phrase I can see nothing in the context.

still less in anything I said in the Watford case, 17 R.R.C. 19, directed to a different issue, which would justify the court in disregarding any of the work which was in fact intended to be done in the completion of a building which on completion would be comprised in a relevant hereditament on the ground that the facilities proposed to be provided in the fitting out work were more elaborate, lavish or extensive than was strictly necessary to make the building fit for occupation. Thus in a case where the fitting out work has already begun when the notice is served and there is no need to resort to paragraph 9 the building owner will be entitled to rely on the plans, specifications, contract or other evidence showing what work is intended to be carried out in order to prove the extent of the work remaining to be done and the court will base its estimate of the time reasonably required for completion on that evidence.

If this is the correct approach under paragraph 8(1)(b) to "the work remaining to be done," a similar approach under paragraph 9 to the question what work "remains to be done" must, so far as practicable, also be adopted. I would emphasise that the adverb "customarily" in this paragraph serves only to distinguish between work of a kind done after substantial completion and that done before: it has nothing to do with the extent of the work. If it is not known at the date of the hearing of an appeal against a completion notice what fitting out work is intended, as was the case here before the judge, the proper test must, I think, be to ask simply what work will probably be carried out. There is no warrant under either paragraph 8(1)(b) or paragraph 9 for drawing a distinction such as the judge drew between essential and inessential work. It goes without saying, of course, that a distinction is to be drawn, on the ordinary principles of rating law, between work which will enhance the value of the hereditament on which its eventual assessment in the valuation list will be based and mere furnishings which will not affect that assessment.

This brings me to consideration of the proper disposal of these proceedings if the parties cannot reach agreement. We have been told that the Angel Centre is now completed and fully occupied. It seems to me that it would be quite unreasonable now to remit the matter to Judge Marder on the basis that he should apply the principles I have endeavoured to expound to the necessarily speculative evidence he heard in November 1984 as to what the fitting out work was expected to involve. It is a principle of perfectly general application that the court should not speculate when it knows. The court will now be in a position to know what fitting out work was done to complete the Angel Centre before its occupation. If the work was done under a single contract in a continuous operation, evidence of what that work comprised will, it seems to me, be the best, if not conclusive, evidence of the extent of the work "remaining to be done" on 31 August 1983 and the time actually taken in carrying out the work will be cogent, though not, of course, conclusive, evidence as to the period reasonably required for carrying it out. If the work was done under a number of different contracts, different considerations may apply, but the evidence of what was done in fact will still be very relevant to the determination of the outstanding issue. If justice is to be done between the parties and if either party wishes to rely on evidence of the kind to which I have referred, I do not see how they can properly be denied that opportunity, even though this would effectively mean a retrial of the issue.

E

F

H

A I should add that in all the circumstances it seems to me that a specific remission to Judge Marder may no longer be necessary. In saying that I imply no personal criticism of Judge Marder whatsoever. I have no doubt he is fully competent to retry the case. But if there has to be a retrial a simple remission to the Clerkenwell County Court may be more convenient to all concerned. It will, of course, be open to the parties to apply to the court to have the matter assigned for rehearing to Judge Marder, if they think that to be the most convenient course.

B Accordingly I would allow the appeal to the extent that I would substitute for paragraph 2 of the order of the Court of Appeal an order in the following terms:

C “that this matter be remitted to the Clerkenwell County Court to determine in the light of the speeches delivered in the House of Lords and in the light of any further evidence led by the parties what period was reasonably required after 31 August 1983 for carrying out the work then remaining to be done to the Angel Centre and accordingly on what date the Angel Centre was to be treated as completed for the purposes of Schedule 1 to the General Rate Act 1967.”

D Paragraphs (3) and (4) of the order of the Court of Appeal relate to costs and I apprehend your Lordships would wish to hear counsel's submissions in the light of the speeches delivered before reaching any decision as to that part of the order or as to the costs of the appeal to this House.

E LORD BRANDON OF OAKBROOK. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend, Lord Bridge of Harwich. I agree with it, and for the reasons which he gives I would allow the appeal to the extent proposed by him.

F LORD MACKAY OF CLASHFERN. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech delivered by my noble and learned friend Lord Bridge of Harwich. I agree with the conclusion that he has reached and with the reasons that he has given for it, subject to a minor reservation.

G My noble and learned friend has stated that there is a fundamental reason why what he said in Watford Borough Council v. Parcourt Property Investment Co. Ltd., 17 R.R.C. 19, correctly understood, is quite irrelevant to the question which the judge here had to decide. That fundamental reason was that the issue in the Watford case, as in Ravenseft Properties Ltd. v. Newham London Borough Council [1976] Q.B. 464, was whether the building in question was, in the condition as it stood when it fell to be considered, a completed building comprised in a relevant hereditament. It seems to me that considerations which point to whether or not a building has been completed on a particular date in the past may also be relevant to considering whether a building can reasonably be expected to be completed at a particular date in the future. One must look forward to what one can reasonably expect to be the state of the building at the future date which is in question and to ask oneself then whether or not, at that date in the light of the reasonable expectations which are entertained, the building will, at that date, be completed. Supposing one were looking at the building considered in the Watford case before the partitioning was put in place and it was known that the partitioning would be completed within a month, the argument could still have been advanced that since at the end of the month it would have no goods lift or air conditioning plant appropriate to the needs of a computer it could not be said to be completed at the end of the month. It respectfully appears to me that this consideration would be as aptly disposed of by the remarks my noble and learned friend made in the Watford case as was the argument that the building had not been completed on the date in the past that was being considered by reason of the absence of the goods lift and the air conditioning plant on that past date. The mere fact that the date of completion being considered is in the future rather than in the past does not appear to me to alter the meaning of completion nor the circumstances that would qualify the building to be considered as completed. Although I do not agree that there is such a fundamental difference between the test to be applied in respect of past completion under paragraph 8(1)(a) and future completion under paragraph 8(1)(b) and paragraph 9, I entirely agree that it is not correct to seek to distinguish between work required to complete the erection of the building and work required to make the occupation more convenient or more comfortable since work may fall into both categories. In my opinion, what one has to do is to look, in the case of a building to be completed, at the work that is likely to be done to reach that completion to the standard that is likely to be attained. If the accommodation to be provided is of a higher standard than normal this may well require the finishing work to take longer than it would if a lesser standard of accommodation were being aimed at.

LORD ACKNER. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend, Lord Bridge of Harwich. I agree with it, and for the reasons which he gives I would allow the appeal to the extent proposed by him.

LORD GOFF OF CHIEVELLY. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend Lord Bridge of Harwich. I agree with it and I too would allow the appeal for the reasons which he has given.

Appeal allowed.

Licensing—Sex establishment—Objections—Licences for sex shops refused after objections made during and after 28-day period—Prosecutions for using premises as sex shops without licences—Whether justices and Crown Court having jurisdiction to consider validity of licensing authority's decision—Whether licensing authority entitled to hear objections after 28-day period—Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1982 (c. 30), s. 2, Sch. 3, para. 10(15)(19)

D

Three local authorities determined that sex establishments should be licensed and they passed the necessary resolution that Schedule 3 to the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1982 should apply in their area. The company, which had a number of sex shops, made applications to those local authorities for licences for its shops in their areas. The local authorities heard the applications and in accordance with paragraph 10(15) and (19) of Schedule 3¹ considered objections made within 28 days of the company's application. They also considered objections made after the 28-day period and one local authority permitted a councillor, who was not a member of the authority's licensing panel, to address the panel on reasons for refusing a licence. All three local authorities refused to grant licences to the company but the company continued to trade from its shops. On each local authority laying informations against the company, the justices convicted the company of using premises as a sex establishment contrary to paragraph 20(1) of Schedule 3 to the Act of 1982. The company appealed against each conviction to the Crown Court. In two cases, the Crown Court allowed the appeal on the ground that the refusal of the licence by the relevant local authority was invalid as the authority had failed to comply with the procedural requirements of paragraph 10(15) and (19) of Schedule 3 and the rules of natural justice by considering objections to the grant of the licence made more than 28 days after the company's applications. In the third case, the Crown Court dismissed the company's appeal.

F

G

On appeal by two local authorities and by the company:—

H

Held, allowing the local authorities' appeals and dismissing the company's appeal, that under the statutory code for licensing sex establishments, it was for the local authority to determine whether to grant a licence and any question of the validity of the local authority's decision was to be determined by the High Court in proceedings for judicial review; that until such proceedings the local authority's decision was to be presumed to be validly made (unless it was invalid on its face) and that, accordingly, on a prosecution for an offence under section 2 of, and Schedule 3 to, the Act of 1982, neither the justices nor the Crown Court had jurisdiction to consider the validity of the refusal of a licence and therefore, the two decisions of the Crown Court that the refusal of licences were invalid had been made without jurisdiction (post, pp. 201H—202B).

Held, further, that under paragraph 10(15) of Schedule 3 a licensing authority was under a duty to consider objections made not later than 28 days after the date of the application for a licence but it also had a discretion to hear objections made after the period; that provided the authority gave the applicant an opportunity to be heard and deal with all objections, whether made during or after the 28 day period, the provisions of paragraph 10(19) of Schedule 3 had been complied with and there had been no breach of natural justice; and that, in the circumstances, the local authorities had given the company a sufficient opportunity to deal with all objections and, therefore, the Crown Court had wrongly held that two authorities' decisions to refuse a licence were invalid (post p. 203E–G).

QUIETLYNN LTD V. PLYMOUTH CITY COUNCIL

CASE STATED by the Crown Court at Plymouth.

D

On 2 November 1984 an information was preferred by the Plymouth City Council against the appellant, Quietlynn Ltd., that the company on 2 August 1984, at premises known as the Private Shop, 23, Market Avenue, Plymouth, which was situated in an area in which Schedule 3 to the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1982 was in force, used the premises as a sex establishment without a licence granted under Schedule 3, contrary to paragraph 20 of Schedule 3 thereto and section 2 of the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1982.

E

On 11 January 1985 the Devonshire justices sitting at Plymouth heard the information and convicted the company, imposing a fine of £1,000 and ordering the company to pay £440 costs. An appeal against the decision of the justices was made by the company to the Crown Court at Plymouth, which appeal was heard on 3 June 1985.

F

The Crown Court found that the premises were trading as a sex establishment as defined in the Act. No licence had been granted to the company and Schedule 3 was in force within the district where the premises were situated. The Plymouth City Council held a public hearing on 21 June 1984 to consider the application by the company for a licence. At the hearing the council considered a number of objections which had been received outside the 28-day period permitted by the Schedule. Some as recently received as the morning of the hearing and some sent to individual councillors. The council at the hearing considered representations by the chief officer of police. The company was not given a copy of the representations before the hearing. The company's representative Mr. Sullivan was cross-examined about those representations. The council refused to grant a licence.

G

H

The company contended that the purported hearing and determination of its application was invalid because the council considered objections which had been lodged outside the permitted 28-day period. The company had not been advised in advance as to the representations by the chief officer of police. The council contended that the procedural irregularities were not fatal to the application.

The Crown Court was of the opinion that the decision in Wandsworth London Borough Council v. Winder [1985] A.C. 461 permitted the company to challenge the validity of the hearing and its refusal to grant a licence as its defence before the Crown Court. Following the decision of Forbes J. in Reg. v. Birmingham City Council, Ex parte Quietlynn Ltd. (1985) 83 L.G.R. 461 the irregularities were fatal to the determination of the council and their refusal to grant a licence was invalid, and therefore the company's application for a licence remained to be heard. The court therefore allowed the appeal and quashed the conviction with costs to the company of the hearing and of the court below.

The council appealed.

The questions for the opinion of the High Court were whether it was within the power of the Crown Court to declare that the decision of the council to refuse to grant a licence was invalid in so far as the challenge to the decision was raised as a defence to a prosecution under paragraphs 6 and 20 of Schedule 3 and whether it was within the power of the Crown Court to assert that the company's application for a licence had still to be determined.

PORTSMOUTH CITY COUNCIL V. QUIETLYNN LTD.

CASE STATED by the Crown Court at Portsmouth.

On 15 May 1985 the Portsmouth justices convicted Quietlynn Ltd. and Brian James Richards, of the following offences (i) that the company on 28 July 1983 did knowingly use the premises known as The Private Shop, 62, Castle Road, Southsea, as a sex establishment without there being in existence a licence granted by the Portsmouth City Council permitting such use, contrary to paragraph 20(1)(a) of Schedule 3 to the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1982; (ii) that offence (i) was attributable to neglect on the part of Mr. Richards and he was thereby guilty of that offence by virtue of paragraph 26(1) of Schedule 3 to the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1982; (iii) that the company on 28 July 1983 did knowingly use the premises known as Sven Books, 60, Kingston Road, Portsmouth, as a sex establishment without there being in existence a licence granted by the Portsmouth City Council permitting such use contrary to paragraph 20(1)(a) of Schedule 3 to the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1982; (iv) that offence (iii) was attributable to neglect on the part of Mr. Richards and he was thereby guilty of that offence by virtue of paragraph 26(1) of Schedule 3 to the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1982.

Appeals against the convictions were made by the company and Mr. Richards to the Crown Court at Portsmouth, which appeals the Crown Court heard together on 7 and 8 August 1985. They made the following admissions of fact in respect of each of the four offences. The licensing panel for the City of Portsmouth met on 11 July 1983, to consider an application by the company for sex establishment licences, in respect of premises at 60, Kingston Road, Portsmouth, and 62, Castle Road, Portsmouth. The panel, having heard all the evidence and considered the applications, decided to refuse both applications, in respect of both premises. Those premises were used on 28 July 1983 as sex establishments within the meaning of Schedule 3 to the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1982. No licence had been granted by the Portsmouth City Council. The company had knowledge that the aforesaid premises were used as sex establishments on 28 July 1983 without a licence. The acts and omission of the company in using the aforesaid premises on 28 July 1983 as sex establishments, without a licence, were due to neglect on the part of Brian James Richards. The company applied for judicial review on 31 August 1983 and its application for leave was heard on 12

Quietlynn Ltd. v. Plymouth Council (D.C.)

A April 1984. The company and the Portsmouth City Council were represented by counsel at the hearing of the application for leave. There were five grounds relied upon in the application for judicial review including a complaint as to the reception by the licensing panel of certain oral representations made by a Councillor Hancock. Leave was refused on that ground but granted on one other ground. The order of the court granting leave was made on the following terms:

B “After the respondent’s (Portsmouth City Council) evidence had been filed, the applicant’s (Quietlynn Ltd.) legal adviser should consider that evidence and, having taken advice of counsel, should decide whether it was appropriate to proceed with the application.”

C On 16 May 1984 the council filed their evidence and on 24 July 1984 the solicitors for the company informed the council that they had been advised by counsel that the matter should proceed. The application for judicial review was brought to trial on 23 January 1985 and the company withdrew its application. The company and Mr. Richards received a copy of a letter from the council dated 14 July 1983 setting out the grounds for the refusal of the licence.

D In addition to the above agreed facts the Crown Court heard evidence from Colin Sullivan on behalf of the company and Mr. Richards as set out in the following statement. Mr. Sullivan, a management consultant, represented the company at its application for a sex establishment licence, on 11 July 1983. That was the second or third such application that he had made on behalf of the company. At the meeting Mr. Sullivan addressed the committee, then council officers spoke and then a Councillor Hancock, who was not a member of the committee, addressed the committee. That was after Mr. Sullivan had made his address and in spite of his objections. Mr. Sullivan had been told informally before the hearing that Councillor Hancock proposed to make his observations and he had objected to that. Councillor Hancock was told by the chairman of the committee to limit his remarks to the sex shop that was within his ward, namely, the shop in Fratton. The councilor spoke generally about churches, schools, the Portsmouth rapist who had sex books in his possession when arrested and other criminals. The councilor had also disputed certain statistics which Mr. Sullivan had put forward to the committee. Councillor Hancock had not presented any written evidence to the committee but objected to the shop on the basis of the views of the local people to whom he had spoken. The observations by Councillor Hancock were one of the grounds of the application for judicial review but leave was refused in respect of that ground. Mr. Sullivan agreed, under cross-examination, that Councillor Hancock had said that he would limit his remarks to the particular shop in his ward. He also agreed that he could have asked but did not ask for a few minutes with the councilor to discuss the latter’s observations. Mr. Sullivan agreed that the proceedings appeared to be in accordance with the council’s standing orders and that he had also spoken about religious bodies, schoolchildren and crime, but unlike the councilor, he had not referred to specific crimes. Mr. Sullivan was recalled and confirmed that he had in fact addressed the committee after the councilor’s remarks. In addition there had been a delay between the councilor speaking and Mr. Sullivan’s summing up. A site visit had taken place and other business had been attended to. Mr. Sullivan had not asked for an adjournment as he had made similar applications before and each time he had been refused. He had not wanted to antagonise the committee.

It was contended by the company and Mr. Richards that the situation was analogous to that which obtained in Wandsworth London Borough Council v. Winder [1985] A.C. 461, in that they had the right to set up as a defence to proceedings brought against them, the allegation that the decision of the licensing panel was ultra vires and void, and that they were not obliged to proceed under R.S.C., Ord. 53. Reference was made to London & Clydeside Estates Ltd. v. Aberdeen District Council [1980] 1 W.L.R. 182. Whether the decision of the licensing panel was void ab initio or voidable was irrelevant: see the judgment of Forbes J. in Reg. v. Sefton Metropolitan Borough Council, Ex parte Quietlynn Ltd. (unreported), 22 February 1985. Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] A.C. 286 had to be distinguished from Wandsworth London Borough Council v. Winder [1985] A.C. 461 because in the present matter the company and Mr. Richards were seeking to defend themselves rather than seeking a declaration; and were seeking to retain pre-existing private law rights rather than establish new private law rights. The provision of Schedule 3 to the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1982 and especially paragraph 28 demonstrated that the right to trade as a sex shop was an existing private law right. The licence was refused on the locality grounds as prescribed by paragraph 12 of Schedule 3 to the Act and Councillor Hancock had addressed the licensing panel on matters that were not relevant to this ground. Although it was conceded that the standing orders of the council allowed Councillor Hancock to address the licensing panel, as he was seeking to speak as an objector then he had to comply with paragraph 10 of Schedule 3 to the Act and give the appropriate notice within 28 days of the company's applications. The standing orders could not override the legislation. Councillor Hancock's address to the licensing panel was wide ranging, starting with churches and schools and then moving to matters of morality, referring to local crime statistics and cases including the Portsmouth rapist. His remarks were not restricted to his own ward which included the shop at Kingston Road. Res judicata or estoppel by issue could not apply to a criminal case: see Archbold Criminal Pleading Evidence & Practice, 42nd ed. (1985). Although the case had been before a court of competent jurisdiction that was not a bar to it being raised again in a criminal case. That situation was clearly envisaged in Wandsworth London Borough Council v. Winder. Further the law relating to paragraph 10 of Schedule 3 and the rights of objectors had been clearly defined in Reg. v. Sefton Metropolitan Borough Council, Ex parte Quietlynn Ltd. (unreported), 22 February 1985 after the alleged res judicata. The question for the Crown Court to determine on a balance of probabilities was whether the licensing panel had afforded the company a fair hearing and/or had conducted themselves according to Schedule 3 and to law.

It was contended by the council that it was for the company and Mr. Richards to prove on a balance of probabilities that the decision of the licensing panel was void: Reg. v. Edwards [1975] Q.B. 27. As the subject matter of the present complaint had been put before a single judge of the Divisional Court, with evidence by affidavit and with both parties represented and thereafter the complaint had been dismissed on its merits, the matter was res judicata; alternatively estoppel by record applied. Illustrative cases were McIlkenny v. Chief Constable of the West

3 W.L.R.

Quietlynn Ltd. v. Plymouth Council (D.C.)

- A Midlands [1980] Q.B. 283 where the ruling after a trial within a trial in criminal proceedings acted as a bar to a subsequent civil action, and Green v. Hampshire County Council [1979] I.C.R. 861 where the adjudication of an industrial tribunal acted as a bar to a subsequent civil action. As Councillor Hancock was told to limit his remarks to the shop in his ward, namely, 60, Kingston Road, and there being no evidence
- B that the licensing panel considered his remarks in a wider context the respondents' present complaints were limited to the two charges relating to the premises at 60, Kingston Road. The question resulting from Wandsworth London Borough Council v. Winder [1985] A.C. 461 was whether or not the instant matter was a further exception to the general rule as set out in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237 to the effect that the proper procedure for challenging the decision of a public
- C authority was by way of judicial review under R.S.C., Ord. 53. The question could only be determined by analysing the interplay of public law rights, which were open to challenge under R.S.C., Ord. 53 and pre-existing private law rights, which might be raised as a defence in enforcement proceedings. When the council decided to pass a resolution bringing Schedule 3 to the Act into effect for its area, it was exercising a
- D public law function. Upon the requisite notice being published no premises in the area could be used as a sex shop. Any pre-existing private law right to trade as a sex shop had been removed by Act of Parliament and a public law function of the council. Pending the hearing of an application for a licence the company and Mr. Richards were protected from prosecution by paragraph 28 of Schedule 3 to the Act, but it was for them to establish a new, private law right, namely the
- E right to trade as a licensed sex shop. It follows that the principle in Wandsworth London Borough Council v. Winder did not apply to the instant matter, which was similar to the situation in Cocks v. Thanet District Council [1983] 2 A.C. 286 where the plaintiff was prevented from establishing his new private law right to permanent accommodation by way of proceedings for a declaration and injunction. There was no
- F breach of paragraph 10 of Schedule 3 to the Act. Councillor Hancock was not a "person objecting" within the meaning of paragraph 10(15) as that paragraph concerned notice to and objections from the public and not a member of the "appropriate authority" as defined by Schedule 3. In accordance with the judgment of Forbes J. in Reg. v. Sefton Metropolitan Borough Council, Ex parte Quietlynn Ltd. (unreported) it
- G was necessary to examine the circumstances of the present complaint in order to see if the rights of the respondents had been "seriously affected or eroded" by any non-compliance with paragraph 10 of Schedule 3 to the Act. There was no such effect on or erosion of their rights because they were represented at the application by Mr. Sullivan who was informed before the hearing of the intention of Councillor Hancock to
- H speak. Although Mr. Sullivan knew that he had the right to apply for an adjournment on this ground he did not do so, although he did apply for an adjournment on other grounds. In addition, Mr. Sullivan was given the opportunity to sum up to the licensing panel after Councillor Hancock had spoken. The reasons for refusal of a licence made available to the respondents were all permitted by Schedule 3 to the Act and did not disclose that the licensing panel had considered any improper matters. The presumption of validity must therefore apply.

The Crown Court was of the opinion that on the basis of the judgment of Forbes J. in Reg. v. Sefton Metropolitan Borough Council, Ex parte Quietlynn Ltd. the company and Mr. Richards were entitled to raise their complaint as a defence. They were not debarred by res judicata. Councillor Hancock should have been treated as an ordinary objector and the objection notified within 28 days. Although Councillor Hancock said that he was limiting his remarks to the Kingston Road shop, he went beyond that and there was no evidence that the licensing panel ignored them. The appeals were accordingly allowed with costs to be taxed if not agreed.

The council appealed. The question for the opinion of the High Court was whether on the evidence put before the Crown Court and having regard to the cases cited, the Crown Court was wrong in law in allowing the appeals of the company and Mr. Richards.

QUIETLYNN LTD. v. OLDHAM BOROUGH COUNCIL

CASE STATED by the Crown Court at Manchester.

On 15 April 1985 an information was preferred by the Oldham Borough Council against the company, Quietlynn Ltd., that it on 14 February 1985 at premises known as 95, Huddersfield Road, Oldham, which was situated in an area in which Schedule 3 to the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1982 was in force, did use the premises knowingly as a sex establishment without a licence granted under Schedule 3 contrary to paragraph 20 (i)(a) thereto.

On 28 May 1985 justices sitting at Oldham Magistrates' Court heard the information and convicted the company. The Crown Court heard the appeal against the justices' decision on 9, 10 and 13 January 1986 giving judgment on 6 February 1986.

It was admitted by the company that Schedule 3 was in force within the area; that no licence had been granted to the company; that the premises were a sex establishment as defined in the Act and that they operated the premises on 14 February 1985.

The company sought by way of defence to challenge the validity of the council's decision to refuse them a licence on 9 February 1984. It sought to argue that the decision was wrong in law and/or that the council did not afford the company a fair hearing under paragraph 10(19) of Schedule 3 and/or that the council acted in breach of natural justice if the court were to find that the council's decision was invalid then the company could rely upon paragraph 28 (1) of Schedule 3 and the prosecution would be unlawful. The council argued that such a defence could not in law be raised and therefore the Crown Court considered the matter as a preliminary point.

It was submitted by the company that it was entitled in law to defend a prosecution brought against it where a condition precedent for the proceedings was the council's decision to refuse the company a licence. The matter was similar to the situation in Wandsworth London Borough Council v. Winder [1985] A.C. 461, where the validity of a decision of a local authority was challenged by way of defence. The company was not precluded by the fact that it could have challenged the validity of the council's decision by judicial review. It was seeking to retain or protect pre-existing private law rights rather than establish new public law rights. The provisions of Schedule 3, in particular paragraph 28(1)

3 W.L.R.

Quietlynn Ltd. v. Plymouth Council (D.C.)

A demonstrated that the right to trade as a sex shop was an existing private law right.

B It was contended by the council that judicial review was the appropriate remedy available and open to the company to challenge the validity of the refusal to grant a licence. Wandsworth London Borough Council v. Winder was authority for the proposition that in proceedings, other than by way of judicial review, a person might challenge the decision of a local authority in public law if he did so by way of a defence seeking to protect or retain a pre-existing private law right. The decision was not authority for any wider right for the company to challenge the validity of the council's decision by way of a defence simpliciter. The company had no pre-existing private law right. It had only a public law right to a fair hearing before the licensing committee and an immunity from prosecution in the interim, pursuant to paragraph C 28(1) of Schedule 3. If the court allowed the company to argue its defence and it was successful, the council would be in an impossible position with regard to their public law decision to refuse the company a licence on 9 February 1984, for though it was and remained a valid decision in public law it would not be in the criminal courts so far as enforcing Schedule 3 against the company.

D The Crown Court was of the opinion that the company did not have an existing private law right which would bring them within the framework of Wandsworth London Borough Council v. Winder. Further, the court did not find that the company had any wider right to challenge by way of a defence to the prosecution, the validity of the council's public law decision. The company having called no evidence upon their appeal and making the aforesaid admissions, the court, accordingly, E dismissed the appeal.

The company appealed. The question for the opinion of the High Court was whether the court was right in refusing to allow the company to challenge the validity of the council's refusal to grant it a licence, by way of a defence to a prosecution where the council sought to rely upon their decision to refuse the company a licence as a condition precedent F to their said prosecution.

Cur. adv. vult.

5 March 1987. WEBSTER J. read the following judgment of the court. Section 2 and Schedule 3 to the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1982 constitute a statutory code to make provision for the control of sex establishments by means of a system of licensing. The licensing authority is the local authority as defined in section 2(5); and section 2(1) empowers a local authority to resolve that Schedule 3 to the Act shall apply to its area. Paragraph 6 of the Schedule prohibits the use of premises as a sex establishment in any area in which the Schedule is in force, subject to the provisions of the Schedule, except under a licence; and paragraphs 20 to 22 contain penal provisions to enforce the prohibition contained in paragraph 6. Paragraphs 8 to 10 contain detailed provisions for the grant, renewal and transfer of licences; paragraph 12 contains mandatory and discretionary grounds of refusal of licences and paragraphs 17 and 18 provide for the revocation and variation of licences. Paragraph 27 provides a right of appeal to the magistrates' court against, inter alia, a refusal of a grant of a licence on certain grounds and, where there is a right of appeal to the magistrates' court, there is a further right of appeal from their decision to the Crown Court.

Paragraph 28(1) provides that it shall be lawful for any person who was using premises as a sex establishment before the Schedule came into effect in the relevant area and who had applied for a licence before the appointed day "to continue to use the premises . . . as a sex establishment until the determination of his application."

The Plymouth City Council, the Portsmouth City Council and the Oldham Borough Council each resolved that the Schedule should apply to their area. In each area Quietlynn Ltd. had been using premises as sex establishments before the Schedule came into effect for the relevant area and it had applied for licences for those establishments before the appointed day. The local authority in each case refused every one of the company's applications; but the company continued, after those refusals, to use the premises as sex establishments. Each of the local authorities, therefore, took proceedings against the company alleging use of the premises as a sex establishment without a licence contrary to paragraph 20(1) of the Schedule. The Plymouth justices convicted the company who appealed against conviction to the Crown Court at Plymouth which allowed its appeal. The Portsmouth justices also convicted the company, and the Crown Court at Portsmouth also allowed the company's appeal. The Oldham justices also convicted the company; but the company's appeal against that conviction was dismissed by the Crown Court at Manchester.

In all of those proceedings the company had relied, as a matter of defence, upon the contention that each refusal by the relevant local authority of a licence had been ultra vires or invalid either because there had been an alleged failure to comply with one or more of the provisions of paragraph 10 of the Schedule which contains certain provisions applicable to applications for the grant of licences, or because the refusal was invalidated by an alleged breach of the rules of natural justice.

Each of the three Crown Courts has stated a case for the opinion of this court and there is one question common to all three cases which, in substance, is whether, on a prosecution alleging use of premises as a sex establishment without a licence contrary to paragraph 20(1), the court may investigate and determine the validity of the licensing authority's decision, namely, in each of these cases the decision to refuse to grant a licence, which was a necessary ingredient of the alleged offence.

Mr. Collins, appearing on behalf of the company, accepts that there is no decision directly in point; but he submits that the principle to be derived from the authorities on which he relies, to some of which we shall refer later in this judgment, support the contention that it is open to a defendant to challenge, and to the court before whom he is prosecuted to consider, the validity of the local authority's relevant decision. But unless constrained by authority, or by a principle unequivocally established by the cases, we reject that contention for two reasons.

3 W.L.R.

Quietlynn Ltd. v. Plymouth Council (D.C.)

A In the first place, some of the results which the code achieves, with clarity and certainty, would be frustrated if that contention were correct. Any power of the justices to consider and decide upon the validity of a decision could not, obviously, oust the jurisdiction of the High Court, on judicial review, to consider the matter. But, if Mr. Collins's contention is correct, the court of trial could decide that a decision was invalid notwithstanding that the High Court, on judicial review, had upheld its validity. Once justices, or a Crown Court, had acquitted a defendant of an offence under paragraph 20(1), when the only defence was that the relevant decision was invalid, no further proceedings could be taken against the defendant, even though the High Court had determined that the decision was valid. As a result of the High Court's decision there could be no reconsideration by the local authority of the application for a licence. The provisions of Schedule 3 to the Act of 1982 (paragraph 28(1) referred to above, or paragraph 11(1) which provides that, on an application to renew a licence before its expiry, the licence is deemed to remain in force until the application is determined) would enable the defendant to continue trading without ever having to apply again for the grant or renewal of a licence, as the case may be. Not only would there be the risk of inconsistent decisions on the same point as between a magistrates' court and a Crown Court on the one hand and the High Court on the other, but there would also be a serious risk of inconsistent decisions by different justices or Crown Courts in relation to applications by more than one applicant determined at one hearing by a licensing authority. Of course it would be open to a prosecutor to appeal by case stated, but it would not necessarily follow that the facts found by the justices would be identical or consistent with the evidence before the High Court on an application for judicial review of the licensing authority's decision. Where different magistrates' courts or Crown Courts had adjudicated on the same hearing by a licensing authority there could also be inconsistent decisions of the High Court. In any event one asks the rhetorical question: why should the prosecution be put in the position of having to resolve, or attempt to resolve, the inconsistency?

F Results of this kind would, in our view, frustrate the clear policy of the statutory code. And in our view it is open to us to treat the question before this court as one which can be determined by a proper construction of that code. In Reg. v. Davey [1899] 2 Q.B. 301 the court held that the validity of an order for the removal to a hospital of a person suffering from a dangerous infectious disorder, made ex parte by a single justice under section 124 of the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), could not be inquired into, upon the hearing of a summons under that section before a court of summary jurisdiction for obstructing the execution of the order. Darling J. and Channell J. both reached that conclusion by reference to the object of the legislation in question.

G Our second reason is that the existence of a power in justices or the Crown Court to treat a decision as invalid would only avoid the uncertainties and consequences to which we have already referred if the court which first considered the matter had the power to "strike down" the decision in question. Lord Hailsham of St. Marylebone L.C. in London & Clydeside Estates Ltd. v. Aberdeen District Council [1980] 1 W.L.R. 182, 187 said, of a certificate of alternative development given under section 25 of the Land Compensation (Scotland) Act 1963, that the certificate "was effective until it was struck down by a competent authority . . . ;” and although justices sometimes, for the purpose of the case immediately before them, have to rule upon the validity of a byelaw or the decision of a local authority, that ruling is binding in no other case and it could not be suggested that justices or the Crown Court are a competent authority to strike down any such decision in the sense of declaring it invalid for all purposes.

For these reasons, therefore, we reject Mr. Collins’s contention unless we are constrained by a principle which is clearly to be derived from the authorities upon which he relies, to which we turn beginning with two decisions in the criminal jurisdiction. In Director of Public Prosecutions v. Head [1959] A.C. 83 the defendant was convicted of carnal knowledge of a mental defective contrary to section 56(1)(a) of the Mental Deficiency Act 1913 (3 & 4 Geo. 5, c. 28). At the time of the alleged offence the woman concerned was on licence from an institution for defectives, to which she had been sent pursuant to an order made by the Secretary of State in purported exercise of powers under the Act. The order was produced in evidence by the prosecution, as were two medical certificates which were before the Secretary of State when he made the order and on which he was required to be satisfied that she was a defective. Neither certificate contained any evidence on which it could be said that she was a moral defective within section 1(1)(d) of the Act. The prosecution conceded that the order was invalid and that on an application for a writ of habeas corpus it could be successfully challenged; and the House of Lords dismissed an appeal from the Court of Criminal Appeal which had quashed the conviction. But that decision, in our view, is no authority for the proposition that the justices in that case had power to investigate the making of the order. The crucial fact in that case was that the order was invalid on its face. Lord Tucker said, at p. 103:

“if it is shown and admitted . . . that on the face of the documents produced and received in evidence without objection the detention was illegal, the whole basis of the subsection and the presumption of defectiveness goes and the prosecution must fail.”

Lord Somervell of Harrow said, at p. 104:

“. . . I think the certificates may well be for this purpose part of the order to be looked at in order to see whether it is good on its face. . . . It is conceded that the court had material before it which would have led to the order being quashed on certiorari or other appropriate proceedings. The next question, as it appears to me, can be stated in this way. Is a man to be sent to prison on the basis that an order is a good order when the court knows it would be set aside if proper proceedings were taken? I doubt it.”

In Reg. v. Jenner [1983] 1 W.L.R. 873 the defendant was charged with using land in contravention of a stop notice contrary to section 90(7) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971. He was committed for trial at the Crown Court where counsel on his behalf sought to challenge the validity of the stop notice. The court ruled that he could not do so, since it was not invalid on its face, and the defendant appealed against that ruling. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal; but, as we read the judgment of the court given by Watkins L.J. the

3 W.L.R.

Quietlynn Ltd. v. Plymouth Council (D.C.)

A appeal was allowed not because the court held that that ruling was wrong but because the defendant was not prohibited by the stop notice from carrying on the activities in question. That conclusion is accurately expressed, in our view, in the headnote to the Weekly Law Report; but not in the penultimate sentence of the headnote of the All England Report which should be deleted if the headnote is to summarise the decision correctly.

B In our view, therefore, neither Director of Public Prosecutions v. Head [1959] A.C. 83 nor Reg. v. Jenner [1983] 1 W.L.R. 873 assists Mr. Collins.

C He also, however, relies upon a number of cases in which the courts have held that challenges to the decisions of local authorities, relevant to claims in civil proceedings, were permissible in those proceedings. In addition to London & Clydeside Estates Ltd. v. Aberdeen District Council [1980] 1 W.L.R. 182, Mr. Collins relies upon Wandsworth London Borough Council v. Winder [1985] A.C. 461; Davy v. Spelthorne Borough Council [1984] A.C. 262; Cannock Chase District Council v. Kelly [1978] 1 W.L.R. 1 and Rex v. Judge Pugh, Ex parte Graham [1951] 2 K.B. 623. But we have been referred to no dictum in any of those cases which suggests that challenges to the decisions of local authorities are permissible in criminal proceedings; nor is it possible, in our view, to derive from those decisions a principle that such a challenge is permissible in proceedings of every kind. In a number of those cases material distinctions were drawn, or sought to be drawn, between private and public rights; but for our part we get no assistance in the present case from attempting to draw, or apply, any such distinction, and we note that Lord Wilberforce in Davy v. Spelthorne Borough Council [1984] A.C. 262, 276, said that the expressions "private law" and "public law" must be used in this country with caution since, typically, English law fastens not upon principles but upon remedies. Nor do we gain, for present purposes, any assistance from the distinction between a decision being "void" or "voidable"; as Lord Diplock has said in F. Hoffmann-La Roche & Co. A.G. v. Secretary of State for Trade and Industry [1975] A.C. 295, 366:

G "it leads to confusion to use such terms . . . as descriptive of the legal status of subordinate legislation alleged to be ultra vires for patent or latent defects, before its validity has been pronounced on by a court of competent jurisdiction. These are concepts developed in the private law of contract which are ill-adapted to the field of public law."

H It has, of course, long been the practice for justices to decide for the purposes of a case immediately before them upon the validity of byelaws and, before the Town and Country Planning Act 1971, of enforcement notices. But those practices were established long before applications for judicial review were given statutory recognition in section 31 of the Supreme Court Act 1981. The law relating to judicial review has become increasingly more sophisticated in the past few decades, and in our view justices are not to be expected to have to assume the functions of the Divisional Court and consider the validity of decisions made by a local authority under this Act in the light of what is now a complex body of law. If a bona fide challenge to the validity of the decision in question is raised before them, then the proceedings should be adjourned to enable an application for judicial review to be made and determined. In our view, therefore, except in the case of a decision which is invalid on its face, every decision of the licensing authority under the Act is to be presumed to have been validly made and to continue in force unless and until it has been struck down by the High Court; and neither the justices nor a Crown Court have power to investigate or decide upon its validity. This conclusion constitutes our answer to the question common to these three appeals and is sufficient to determine each of them.

The Crown Courts at Plymouth and Portsmouth, however, embarked upon a consideration of the validity of the refusal by the local authorities of the company's applications for licences and concluded, in each case, that the refusals were invalid. In these circumstances we should add a few words about those conclusions.

Paragraph 10 of the Schedule sets out, in 20 numbered subparagraphs, various things that have to be done in connection with applications for the grant, renewal or transfer of a licence. Sub-paragraphs (15) and (18) provide:

"(15) Any person objecting to an application for the grant, renewal or transfer of a licence under this Schedule shall give notice in writing of his objection to the appropriate authority, stating in general terms the grounds of the objection, not later than 28 days after the date of the application. . . . (18) In considering any application for the grant, renewal or transfer of a licence the appropriate authority shall have regard to any observations submitted to them by the chief officer of police and any objections of which notice has been sent to them under sub-paragraph 15 above."

The Crown Court at Plymouth found that, at the hearing of the company's application for a licence, the local authority had considered a number of objections which had been received outside the 28-day period specified in sub-paragraph (15), some of them having been received as recently as the morning of the hearing and some having been sent to individual councillors. The court also found that the local authority considered at the hearing representations by the chief officer of police but that the company had not been given a copy of those representations before the hearing. The court held that those irregularities were fatal to the determination by the local authority to refuse the company's application, relying upon a decision of Forbes J. in Reg. v. Birmingham City Council (1985) 83 L.G.R. 461. Forbes J. said, at p. 486, that sub-paragraph (15) "does restrict the giving of late notice of objection," words which the Crown Court at Plymouth construed as if they meant that the local authority could not take into account a notice of objection given late. Forbes J. clearly intended those words to be given that meaning because, at p. 487, he said that it seemed to him that Stephen Brown I.J. accepted the view that a local authority should not take into account late objections. The reference to the view of Stephen Brown I.J. was a reference to a sentence of his judgment in Reg. v. Preston Borough Council, Ex parte Queltynn Ltd. (1984) 83 L.G.R. 308, 313, where he said:

3 W.L.R.

Quietlynn Ltd. v. Plymouth Council (D.C.)

A "The position, in my judgment, is as Woolf J. found. Sub-paragraph (15) does not restrict the giving of notice of objection before the application, but it does restrict the giving of late notice of objection." (Our emphasis).

B That dictum arose in this way. In that case at first instance, decided on 14 October 1983 (The Times, 19 October 1983), Woolf J. in his judgment of which the court has a transcript entitled Reg. v. Chester City Council, Ex parte Quietlynn Ltd., said:

C "The provisions of paragraph 10, which deal with objections, are clear. The objection must be in writing, it must set out its general terms and it must be made not later than 28 days after the date of the application. Furthermore, the authority is required to have regard to such objection which can be categorised as a statutory objection, but there is no such obligation in respect of information which does not fall within paragraph 10(15). However, in coming to a determination, the authority must be entitled to take account of information which comes into its possession and which is relevant even though it is not from a statutory objector. It may, for example, be necessary for inquiries to be made of the fire authorities and if an oral objection was made by the fire authorities out of time it could not properly be ignored in reaching a decision. It will be necessary, however, in respect of such non-statutory information to act fairly and, if necessary, give the applicant notice of the material upon which it is proposed to rely."

E We respectfully agree with those observations and would conclude for our part that the essential difference between an objection which complies with paragraph 10(15) and one which does not is that the authority is obliged to consider objections made not later than 28 days, but that it has a discretion whether or not to take into account objections made later. Of course it would follow that if it takes into account later objections, of which notice in writing will not have been given to the applicant pursuant to the requirement of sub-paragraph (16), then such notice has to be given to the applicant as is sufficient to ensure that the hearing of his application is fair. And, as to the fact that the company was not, in this case, given a copy of the representations made by the chief officer of police before the hearing, there seems to us to be no requirement that that should be done, nor anything said by Forbes J. to the effect that it should be done, provided that the applicants are given a fair opportunity to deal with those representations.

G We therefore conclude that the Crown Court was wrong in deciding that the so-called irregularities complained of by the company were fatal to the refusal of its licence; and we do not, with respect, read the sentence from the judgment of Stephen Brown L.J. which we have emphasised as containing anything other than a summary of the judgment of Woolf J. on this point, with which Stephen Brown L.J. appears to have agreed. It seems to us that by the word "restrict" in relation to late notices of objection Stephen Brown L.J. meant only to refer to the fact that an objector who gave late notice had no statutory right to have his objection taken into account; and we respectfully conclude that Forbes J. misinterpreted those words of Stephen Brown L.J., and therefore that the decision of the Crown Court at Plymouth on this issue was wrong.

The facts found by the Crown Court at Portsmouth, relevant to the validity of the licensing authority's decision, was that a councillor, a Mr. Hancock, who was not a member of the licensing committee, addressed the committee largely about the moral implications of granting the licence without having given notice in writing of an objection or having presented any written evidence to the committee.

This case illustrates, from reality, the sort of problems which could be created if the justices were to have power to consider the validity of a licence; because after the informations were laid the company applied for judicial review on a number of grounds including the "Councillor Hancock objection." The criminal proceedings were accordingly adjourned, leave to move for judicial review was given on one ground (not the Councillor Hancock objection) on terms that counsel acting for the company should reconsider the application after receipt of the respondents' evidence and, although we are told that counsel advised that the application should proceed after that evidence was received, it was in fact withdrawn.

Notwithstanding the fact that leave to move for judicial review was not given on the ground of the "Councillor Hancock objection," the Crown Court at Portsmouth was of the opinion that Councillor Hancock should have been treated as an ordinary objector, that his objections should have been notified within 28 days, and that although he had said that he was limiting his remarks to one of the two shops for which the company had been applying for licences, his observations were not so limited and there was no evidence that the licensing panel ignored them; and they accordingly were of the opinion that the refusal of the licences was invalid and allowed the company's appeal. For our part, we cannot see that the local authority did anything wrong at all. They were not obliged to hear Councillor Hancock, but they had a discretion to do so and, in the light of the facts found by the Crown Court, there can be no force in any suggestion that the company had no fair opportunity to respond to his observations. In any event any applicant for a licence of this kind is bound to expect the licensing authority to receive, and perhaps even to entertain themselves, moral objections and to expect to have to respond to such objections when making his application, as, so it appears from the court's findings, the company's representative did at the hearing. In our view, therefore, the court, having wrongly concluded that it had jurisdiction to consider the validity of the refusal of the licences, was also wrong in concluding that that refusal was invalid.

We would, therefore, answer the questions asked of this court as follows. The Crown Court at Plymouth asks:

- "(i) Whether it was within the power of the Crown Court to declare that the decision of the [Plymouth City Council] to refuse to grant a licence was invalid in so far as the challenge to the decision was raised as a defence to a prosecution under paragraphs 6 and 20 of the said Schedule 3. (ii) Whether it was within the power of the Crown Court to assert that the [company's] application for a licence had still to be determined."

The answer is No in each case.

3 W.L.R.

Quietlynn Ltd. v. Plymouth Council (D.C.)

A The Crown Court at Portsmouth asks whether on the evidence put before the Crown Court and having regard to the cases cited the Crown Court was wrong in law in allowing the appeals of the company and Mr. Richards, to which the answer is Yes.

B The Crown Court at Manchester asks whether they were right in refusing to allow the company to challenge the validity of the Oldham Borough Council's refusal to grant it a licence, by way of a defence to a prosecution where the council sought to rely upon their decision to refuse the company a licence as a condition precedent to their said prosecution, to which the answer is also Yes.

H The defendant, who had had some disagreement with his business partner, went to the partner's bungalow one night. After ringing the door bell he fired a rifle at the windows of the bedroom and lounge and at the front door. No injuries were caused to the people who were in the bungalow. The defendant was charged, inter alia, with damaging property with intent, being reckless as to whether the life of another would be thereby endangered, contrary to section 1(2) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971¹. The trial judge rejected a submission of no case to answer in relation to that count, whereupon the defendant changed his plea to guilty. The defendant appealed to the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) which allowed the appeal.

On appeal by the Crown:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that the Act of 1971 being concerned with criminal damage to property, the intention or recklessness envisaged by section 1(2)(b) of the Act of 1971 was directed to the possible dangers to life caused by the destroyed or damaged property and not to the dangers inherent in the method of causing that destruction or damage; that, accordingly, to obtain a conviction under section 1(2)(b) the prosecution were required to prove that the danger to life resulted from the destruction or damage to property; it was not sufficient for the prosecution to prove that the danger to life resulted from the act of the defendant which caused the destruction or damage (post, pp. 208H—209A, 211A—B, C—F).

APPEAL from the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division).

This was an appeal by leave of the House of Lords (Lord Keith of Kinkel, Lord Templeman and Lord Griffiths) [1986] 1 W.L.R. 1380 dated 5 November 1986 by the prosecutor, the Chief Constable of the Humberside Constabulary, from the judgment dated 15 May 1986 of the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) (Neill L.J., Peter Pain and Gatchouse J.J.) [1986] 1 W.L.R. 1286 allowing an appeal by the defendant, Dennis Steer, against his conviction on 18 December 1985 at Lincoln Crown Court, before Judge David Wilcox and a jury, on the second count of an indictment, which count charged him with damaging property with intent, being reckless as to whether the life of another would be thereby endangered contrary to section 1(2)(b) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971. On the judge's ruling as to the true construction of section 1(2)(b) of the Act of 1971 the defendant changed his plea to guilty on the second count and appealed on the ground, inter alia, that it was erroneous in law. The Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) in allowing the appeal, certified that the following point of law was involved in their decision, namely,

"Whether, upon a true construction of section 1(2)(b) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971, the prosecution are required to prove that the danger to life resulted from the destruction of or damage to property, or whether it is sufficient for the prosecution to prove that it resulted from the act of the defendant which caused the destruction or damage."

A Leave to appeal was refused.

The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Bridge of Harwich.

David Farrer Q.C. and Keith Jackson for the Crown.

Martin Bethel Q.C. and Michael Mettyear for the defendant.

B Their Lordships took time for consideration.

2 July. LORD BRIDGE OF HARWICH. My Lords, in the early hours of 8 June 1985 the respondent went to the bungalow of his former business partner, David Gregory, against whom he bore some grudge. He was armed with an automatic .22 rifle. He rang the bell and woke Mr. and Mrs. Gregory, who looked out of their bedroom window. The respondent
 C fired a shot aimed at the bedroom window. He then fired two further shots, one at another window and one at the front door. Fortunately no one was hurt. It was never suggested that the first shot had been aimed at Mr. or Mrs. Gregory.

Arising from this incident the respondent was arraigned on an indictment containing three counts. He pleaded not guilty to possession of a firearm with intent to endanger life, contrary to section 16 of the Firearms Act 1968 (count 1) and to an offence of damaging property with intent, contrary to section 1(2) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971, which was alleged in the particulars as originally framed as having been committed "intending by the said damage to endanger the lives of David Gregory and Tina Gregory or being reckless as to whether the lives of David Gregory and Tina Gregory would be thereby endangered" (count
 D 2). He pleaded guilty to a separate offence of damaging property, contrary to section 1(1) of the Act of 1971 (count 3).

Section 1 of the Act of 1971 provides:

"(1) A person who without lawful excuse destroys or damages any property belonging to another intending to destroy or damage any such property or being reckless as to whether any such property would be destroyed or damaged shall be guilty of an offence. (2) A
 F person who without lawful excuse destroys or damages any property, whether belonging to himself or another—(a) intending to destroy or damage any property or being reckless as to whether any property would be destroyed or damaged; and (b) intending by the destruction or damage to endanger the life of another or being reckless as to whether the life of another would be thereby G endangered; shall be guilty of an offence. (3) An offence committed under this section by destroying or damaging property by fire shall be charged as arson."

It is to be observed that the offence created by subsection (2), save that it may be committed by destroying or damaging one's own property, is simply an aggravated form of the offence created by subsection (1), in which the prosecution must prove, in addition to the ingredients of the offence under subsection (1), the further mental element specified by subsection (2)(b). In this case presumably count 2 was intended to relate to the damage done by the shot fired at the bedroom window and count 3 to the damage done by one or other or both of the other two shots. It is also significant to note the maximum penalties attaching to the three offences charged. For an offence under section 16 of the Act of 1968 it is 14 years' imprisonment, for an offence under section 1(2) of the Act of 1971 life imprisonment, for an offence under section 1(1) of the Act of 1971 10 years' imprisonment.

At some stage in the trial the particulars of count 2 were amended by deleting the words alleging an intent to endanger life and leaving only recklessness in that regard as the mental element relied on to establish the offence under section 1(2). The prosecution, it appears, presented the case on the footing that counts 1 and 2 were alternatives and, if the case had been left to the jury, the judge would presumably have directed them that, if they found that the respondent intended to endanger the lives of Mr. and Mrs. Gregory they should convict on count 1, but if they found that he was merely reckless with regard to such danger, they should acquit on count 1 and convict on count 2.

At the conclusion of the case for the prosecution, however, counsel for the respondent submitted that there was no case to answer on count 2 on the ground that, in so far as the lives of Mr. and Mrs. Gregory had been endangered, the danger had not been caused by the damage done to the bungalow, but by the shot fired from the respondent's rifle. Of course, it is obvious that any danger to life in this case was caused by the shot from the rifle itself, not by any trifling damage done to the bedroom window or to any property in the bedroom. But the judge rejected counsel's submission and accepted the submission made for the Crown that the phrase in section 1(2)(b) of the Act of 1971 "by the destruction or damage" refers on its true construction not only to the destruction or damage to property as the cause of the danger to life on which the mental element in the aggravated offence under the subsection depends, but also to the act of the defendant which causes that destruction or damage. On the basis of the judge's ruling the respondent changed his plea to guilty on count 2. He appealed against conviction on the ground that the judge's ruling was erroneous. The Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) (Neill L.J., Peter Pain and Gatehouse J.J.) allowed the appeal, but certified that their decision involved a question of law of general public importance in the following terms:

"Whether, upon a true construction of section 1(2)(b) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971, the prosecution are required to prove that the danger to life resulted from the destruction of or damage to the property, or whether it is sufficient for the prosecution to prove that it resulted from the act of the defendant which caused the destruction or damage."

The Crown now appeals by leave of your Lordships' House.

We must, of course, approach the matter on the footing, implicit in the outcome of the trial, that the respondent, in firing at the bedroom window, had no intent to endanger life, but accepts that he was reckless as to whether life would be endangered.

Under both limbs of section 1 of the Act of 1971 it is the essence of the offence which the section creates that the defendant has destroyed or damaged property. For the purpose of analysis it may be convenient to omit reference to destruction and to concentrate on the references to damage, which was all that was here involved. To be guilty under subsection (1) the defendant must have intended or been reckless as to the damage to property which he caused. To be guilty under subsection (2) he must additionally have intended to endanger life or been reckless

which he caused. This is the context in which the words must be construed and it seems to me impossible to read the words "by the damage" as meaning "by the damage or by the act which caused the damage." Moreover, if the language of the statute has the meaning for which the Crown contends, the words "by the destruction or damage"
B and "thereby" in subsection (2)(b) are mere surplusage. If the Crown's submission is right, the only additional element necessary to convert a subsection (1) offence into a subsection (2) offence is an intent to endanger life or recklessness as to whether life would be endangered simpliciter.

C It would suffice as a ground for dismissing this appeal if the statute were ambiguous, since any such ambiguity in a criminal statute should be resolved in favour of the defence. But I can find no ambiguity. It seems to me that the meaning for which the respondent contends is the only meaning which the language can bear.

D The contrary construction leads to anomalies which Parliament cannot have intended. If A and B both discharge firearms in a public place, being reckless as to whether life would be endangered, it would be absurd that A, who incidentally causes some trifling damage to property, should be guilty of an offence punishable with life imprisonment, but that B, who causes no damage, should be guilty of no offence. In the same circumstances, if A is merely reckless but B actually intends to endanger life, it is scarcely less absurd that A should be guilty of the graver offence under section 1(2) of the Act of 1971, B of the lesser offence under section 16 of the Firearms Act 1968.

E Counsel for the Crown did not shrink from arguing that section 1(2) of the Act of 1971 had created, in effect, a general offence of endangering life with intent or recklessly, however the danger was caused, but had incidentally included as a necessary, albeit insignificant, ingredient of the offence that some damage to property should also be caused. In certain fields of legislation it is sometimes difficult to appreciate the rationale of particular provisions, but in a criminal statute F it would need the clearest language to persuade me that the legislature had acted so irrationally, indeed perversely, as acceptance of this argument would imply.

G It was further argued that to affirm the construction of section 1(2)(b) adopted by the Court of Appeal would give rise to problems in other cases in which it might be difficult or even impossible to distinguish between the act causing damage to property and the ensuing damage caused as the source of danger to life. In particular it was suggested that in arson cases the jury would have to be directed that they could only convict if the danger to life arose from falling beams or similar damage caused by the fire, not if the danger arose from the heat, flames or smoke generated by the fire itself. Arson is, of course, the prime example of a form of criminal damage to property which, in the case of H an occupied building, necessarily involves serious danger to life and where the gravity of the consequence which may result as well from recklessness as from a specific intent fully justifies the severity of the penalty which the Act of 1971 provides for the offence. But the argument in this case is misconceived. It is not the match and the inflammable materials, the flaming firebrand or any other inflammatory agent which the arsonist uses to start the fire which causes danger to life, it is the ensuing conflagration which occurs as the property which has been set on fire is damaged or destroyed. When the victim in the bedroom is overcome by the smoke or incinerated by the flames as the building burns, it would be absurd to say that this does not result from the damage to the building.

Counsel for the Crown put forward other examples of cases which he suggested ought to be liable to prosecution under section 1(2) of the Act of 1971 including that of the angry mob of striking miners who throw a hail of bricks through the window of the cottage occupied by the working miner and that of people who drop missiles from motorway bridges on passing vehicles. I believe that the criminal law provides adequate sanctions for these cases without the need to resort to section 1(2) of the Act of 1971. But if my belief is mistaken, this would still be no reason to distort the plain meaning of that subsection.

Some reference was also made to damage caused by explosives. This is the subject of specific provision under the Explosive Substances Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 3) as amended. The offence created by section 3(1)(a) of that Act as substituted by section 7(1) of the Criminal Jurisdiction Act 1975, of doing "any act with intent to cause . . . by an explosive substance an explosion of a nature likely to endanger life, or cause serious injury to property" obviates the need to resort to the Act of 1971 when explosives are used.

The trial judge was, it seems, in large part persuaded to rule as he did in reliance on a sentence from the judgment of the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) delivered by Parker L.J. in Reg. v. Hardie [1985] 1 W.L.R. 64, 67, where he said in reference to the state of mind of a defendant who commits the actus reus of an alleged offence under section 1(2) of the Act of 1971:

"If, when doing that act, he creates an obvious risk both that property will be destroyed and that the life of another will be endangered and gives no thought to the possibility of there being either risk, the requirements of the subsection are in our judgment clearly satisfied."

Reg. v. Hardie was concerned solely with the effect of self-administered tranquillising drugs on the state of mind of the defendant. It had nothing whatever to do with the issue of causation arising in the instant case. If I may say so without offence, the judge's error vividly illustrates the danger, which is particularly acute in the field of statutory construction, of reading a judicial dictum entirely out of context and treating the precise words used as relevant to the decision of an issue to which the author of the words had never applied his mind.

I can well understand that the prosecution in this case thought it necessary and appropriate that, even if they could not establish the intent to endanger life necessary to support a conviction under section 16 of the Act of 1968, they should include a count in the indictment to mark in some way the additional gravity of an offence of criminal damage to property in which a firearm is used. But they had no need to resort to section 1(2) of the Act of 1971. A person who, at the time of committing an offence under section 1 of the Act of 1971, has in his possession a firearm commits a distinct offence under section 17(2) of the Act of 1968: see Schedule 1 to the Act of 1968, as amended by section 11(7) of the Act of 1971. If the respondent had been charged with that offence in addition to the offence under section 1(1) of the Act of 1971, he must have pleaded guilty to both and, if the prosecution

Vicarious Liability—Master and servant—Course of employment—Deckhand instructed by employers to work on tug not owned by them—Injury to deckhand—Whether employers vicariously or personally liable for negligence of tugmaster employed by tug's owners

The plaintiff was employed by the defendants as a deckhand. In the course of his employment he worked on board a tug owned by a Dutch company and under the control of a Dutch captain employed by them. The plaintiff's work included untying ropes mooring the tug fore and aft to a dredger. The system used by the captain was that when the plaintiff had untied the ropes and it was safe for the captain to move the tug the plaintiff would give a double knock with his hand on the wheelhouse. At the time in question the plaintiff had untied the aft rope but was still in the course of untying the forward rope when the captain, without waiting for the plaintiff's signal, put the engine of the tug hard astern. As a result, the rope snaked round the plaintiff's leg, causing him serious injury. On his claim against the defendants for damages for, inter alia, negligence, Staughton J. held that his injuries had been caused by the captain's negligence, that the captain was to be deemed to have acted as the defendants' employee and that, therefore, the defendants were vicariously liable for his negligence to the plaintiff. He held, however, that the defendants were entitled to limit their liability by virtue of section 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 as extended by section 3 of the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act 1958¹ on the ground that the captain had been their servant within the meaning of section 3(2)(a) of the Act of 1958. The Court of Appeal dismissed an appeal by the defendants on the question of liability and allowed a cross-appeal by the plaintiff on the limitation point.

On appeal by the defendants:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, (1) that the defendants owed the plaintiff a duty of care to devise a safe system of work for him and to see that that system was operated; that assuming that the captain's system of waiting for a double knock on the wheelhouse before putting the tug in motion could be called a safe system it had not been operated at the time of the plaintiff's accident and the captain's negligence in not operating it had not been casual or collateral but had been central to the operation of the system; that the defendants' duty of care was non-delegable in the sense that they were personally liable for its performance and could not escape their liability if it was delegated and not properly performed; and that, accordingly, although they had delegated the performance of their duty of care to the captain, they could not thereby avoid their own liability to the plaintiff (post, pp. 214A, 215A-D, 216A-D, 222H-223B, D-G, 224C-D).

(2) That under section 3(2)(a) of the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act 1958 the captain had been the servant of the owners of the tug, not of the defendants; that on the true meaning of section 3(1) of the Act of 1958 "any person interested in . . . the ship" meant a person having a legal or equitable interest in the ship and, on the evidence, the whole legal and equitable interest in the tug had been in the owners; and that, accordingly, since the defendants did not fall within any of the other categories of persons in section 3 of the Act of 1958, they were not entitled to limit their liability to the plaintiff (post, pp. 214A, 216E-F, 223H-224B, C-D).

APPEAL from the Court of Appeal.

This was an appeal by the defendants, Nash Dredging & Reclamation Co. Ltd., by leave of the House of Lords from the judgment of the Court of Appeal (Fox, Parker and Neill L.JJ.) [1986] Q.B. 965 given on 16 April 1986 dismissing the defendants' appeal from the judgment of Staughton J. given on 25 July 1984 and allowing a cross-appeal by the plaintiff, Jamie McDermid.

The Court of Appeal refused the defendants leave to appeal, but on 10 July 1986 the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords (Lord Keith of Kinkel, Lord Templeman and Lord Goff of Chieveley) [1986] 1 W.L.R. 978 allowed a petition by them for leave.

The facts are set out in the opinions of Lord Hailsham of St. Marylebone and Lord Brandon of Oakbrook.

Walter Aylen Q.C. and David Melville for the defendants.

Alan Tyrell Q.C. and Roger Shawcross for the plaintiff.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

2 July. LORD BRIDGE OF HARWICH. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speeches of my noble and learned friends Lord Hailsham of St. Marylebone and Lord Brandon of Oakbrook. I agree with them both and for the reasons they give I would dismiss the appeal. A

LORD HAILSHAM OF ST. MARYLEBONE. My Lords, this was an action for damages for personal injuries by the plaintiff (respondent) against his employers, the defendants (appellants), as the result of an accident which took place as long ago as 22 June 1975. B

The fact that on the date of the hearing of this appeal on 5 May 1987 both the question of liability and the quantum of damages were still open after nearly 12 years for discussion does not shed a very favourable light on our system for dealing with litigation of this type. C

The plaintiff was employed as a deckhand by a contract in writing dated 18 June 1975 in connection with dredging work on a fjord at Lulea in Sweden. In the first sentence of this contract it was expressly agreed: "The employee shall safely comply with the lawful directions of the company's representatives. . ." It must be noted that the defendants' employers were a subsidiary (it is believed wholly-owned) of a Dutch company Stevin Baggeren B.V. ("Stevin"). The function of the defendants was to provide and pay the British staff engaged in the operation. D

At the time of the accident, by direction of the defendants, the plaintiff was working on the deck of a tug (the Ina) owned by Stevin and under the command of her Dutch skipper (Captain Sas) who was an employee of Stevin. The tug was in fact operated turn and turn about by Captain Sas and a British skipper (Captain Clifford) who was an employee of the defendants. At all material times, however, and by direction of the defendants under clause 1 of the contract of service, the Ina and the plaintiff were both under the total operational control of Captain Sas and subject to his orders. E

The accident may be very simply described. The plaintiff's duty, so far as material, was to tie and untie the Ina from a dredger to which she was made fast fore and aft by means in each case of a nylon rope attached to a bollard on the dredger by an eye and to the tug by a number of figure-of-eight loops and two half-hitches. At the time of the accident the plaintiff was under orders to untie with a view to the Ina going astern. He safely untied the aft rope and stowed it inboard the Ina. He then went forward to untie the forward rope from the dredger. His correct drill, had he completed it, would have been to slacken the rope on the Ina's starboard bollards in order to reduce the tension, to allow the deckhand on the dredger (whom he could clearly see) to take the eye of the rope off the dredger's port bollard, and then haul the rope in and stow it safely inboard the Ina, proceed to the wheelhouse and give it a double knock with his hand, in order to signal to Captain Sas that it was safe to move. In the event, after he had loosened the forward rope from the Ina's bollard, and before the deckhand on the dredger had had time to remove the eye of the rope from the bollard on the dredger, Captain Sas, who was at the wheel of the Ina, put the engine hard astern. As a result, the rope snaked round the plaintiff's leg, pulled him into the water and caused him injuries which involved the amputation of his leg and damage, recently (28 April 1986) assessed F G H

of St. Marylebone

A at £178,450.05 by Staughton J., to whom the case had been remitted for this purpose by the Court of Appeal.

B The plaintiff's claim in the proceedings was based on the allegation, inter alia, of a "non-delegable" duty resting on his employers to take reasonable care to provide a "safe system of work:" cf. Wilsons & Clyde Coal Co. Ltd v. English [1938] A.C. 57. The defendants did not, and could not, dispute the existence of such a duty of care, nor that it was "non-delegable" in the special sense in which the phrase is used in this connection. This special sense does not involve the proposition that the duty cannot be delegated in the sense that it is incapable of being the subject of delegation, but only that the employer cannot escape liability if the duty has been delegated and then not properly performed. Equally the defendants could not and did not attempt to dispute that it would be a central and crucial feature of any safe system on the instant facts that it would prevent so far as possible the occurrence of such an accident as actually happened, viz. injury to the plaintiff as the result of the use of the Ina's engine so as to move the Ina before both the ropes were clear of the dredger and stowed safely inboard and the plaintiff was in a position of safety.

D Since such a system could easily have been designed and put in operation at the time of the accident in about half-a-dozen different ways, and since it is quite obvious that such a system would have prevented the accident had it been in operation, and since the duty to provide it was "non-delegable" in the sense that the defendants cannot escape liability by claiming to have delegated performance of their duty, it is a little difficult to see what possible defence there could ever have been to these proceedings. There was indeed a preposterous suggestion in the defendants' pleading that the plaintiff had caused or contributed to his own misfortune himself. There was never the smallest evidence of this, and, no doubt prudently, the defendants called no evidence, whether by Captain Sas or anyone else, to substantiate it. This frantic attempt to avoid or reduce liability had already died a natural death before the case left the court of trial.

F Although the duty of providing a safe system of work was "non-delegable" in the special sense I have described, it had in fact been delegated on alternate shifts to Captain Sas and Captain Clifford in the circumstances I have described. In both cases the delegation covered, so far as can be ascertained, the whole operation of the Ina, the orders to the deckhand, the system of work to be followed, and since the skipper was at the wheel, the operation of the engine. Both Captain Sas and G Captain Clifford had designed different systems of work either of which, if followed, would probably have prevented the accident in the instant appeal. The trial judge appeared to think that the system designed by Captain Sas and applicable at the time of the accident to the plaintiff was "not unsafe." But this "system" involved at its crucial stage, i.e. the point of time at which it was necessary to ascertain for certain that both H the ropes were inboard and the deckhand safe, a double knock by the deckhand on the wheelhouse, which could not be delivered unless the deckhand were clear of danger. If the proper sequence was observed this would not happen until after the second rope was stowed inboard. The Court of Appeal doubted whether the "system," if it can be called such, was adequate, and I share this doubt. But it matters not. The accident happened because the Ina went full astern before the forward rope was clear of the dredger and with the plaintiff in a position of acute peril. There was no double knock because Captain Sas did not attempt to operate the correct sequence and did in fact operate the engines with the eye of the rope still on the bollard of the dredger. The "system" was therefore not being operated and was therefore not being "provided" at all. It matters not whether one says that there was no "system" in operation at all, or whether one says that the system provided was unsafe, or whether one says that the system in fact provided was not in use at the crucial stage. In any event the defendants had delegated their duty to the plaintiff to Captain Sas, the duty had not been performed, and the defendants must pay for the breach of their "non-delegable" obligation. A B

Before your Lordships it was strenuously argued that the fact that Captain Sas operated the engine in such dangerous circumstances was the "casual" or "collateral" negligence of an employee of an independent contractor, i.e. Stevin. Since Stevin was itself the holding company of the defendants, the defendants being its wholly-owned subsidiary, I find this morally an unattractive proposition. But the fact was that the defendants had delegated their own "non-delegable" duty to Captain Sas who had charge of the whole operation and his negligence was not "collateral" or "casual" but central to the case and in total disregard of the duty owed to the plaintiff to see that the engine was not put in operation at all until it had been ascertained that it was safe to do so. Whether the system as designed by Captain Sas was adequately safe or not, whether it can truthfully be said that there was in any real sense a system at all, or whether there was a system not unsafe but not being operated, the defendants had delegated their own "non-delegable" duty and it had not been performed. C D E

I do not wish to add anything on the second point in the appeal which related to the attempt to limit the defendants' liability under section 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1984 as amended by section 3 of the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act 1958, except to say that I agree with the judgment of the Court of Appeal [1986] Q.B. 965, 980-982, and that the result is a necessary consequence of the correct analysis of the facts which I have endeavoured to give above. F

In the event this appeal must be dismissed with costs. In my view it is, and always was, unarguable.

LORD BRANDON OF OAKBROOK. My Lords, on 22 June 1975 the plaintiff, then aged 18, suffered a serious accident while working as deckhand on a tug called Ina in a fjord at Lulea in Sweden. In the accident his left leg was so badly injured that it had to be amputated at mid-thigh level, with grievous consequences for the whole of his future life. G

On 30 November 1977 the plaintiff brought an action in the High Court in England against the defendants, by whom he was employed at the time of the accident, claiming damages for the injuries caused to him by it. The action was tried by Staughton J. on 23, 24 and 25 July 1984. He held that the defendants were liable in negligence to the plaintiff but that they were entitled to limit their liability to £43,893 under the provisions relating to limitation of liability contained in the Merchant Shipping Acts 1894 to 1984. In view of his decision that the defendants were entitled to limit their liability to this sum, the judge did not assess the full amount of the damages which the plaintiff would otherwise have H

A He was entitled to recover. He gave judgment for the plaintiff for £59,169.02 inclusive of agreed interest.

B The plaintiff appealed to the Court of Appeal against the judge's decision that the defendants were entitled to limit their liability. The defendants cross-appealed against the judge's decision that they were liable at all. The appeal and cross-appeal were heard by the Court of Appeal (Fox, Parker and Neill L.J.J.) [1986] Q.B. 965 on 14 and 15 January 1986. The reserved judgment of the court prepared by Neill L.J. was handed down on 16 April 1986. In that judgment the court allowed the plaintiff's appeal and dismissed the defendants' cross-appeal. It further remitted the case to the judge for him to assess the full amount of the damages which the plaintiff was entitled to recover. On 28 April 1986 Staughton J. assessed those damages at £178,450.05 inclusive of agreed interest.

C My Lords, the primary facts relevant to this appeal are not in dispute. The appellants are a wholly owned subsidiary of a Dutch dredging company, Stevin Baggèren B.V. In June 1975 the appellants and Stevin were together engaged in dredging operations for the Swedish government in the fjord at Lulea. The dredger was moored off-shore and a tug called Ina, owned by Stevin, was used in the operations. D These continued round the clock so that the complement of the tug worked shifts. There were two masters of the tug, each of whom worked a 12-hour shift. One of these was Captain Clifford, who was employed by the defendants. The other was Captain Sas, who was employed by Stevin.

E The part played by the plaintiff in the operations and the circumstances of his accident are concisely set out in the judgment of Staughton J. (transcript, pp. 35–36):

“The task in hand there was dredging a fjord. At first the plaintiff worked on the dredger for a few days; then he was transferred to being a deckhand on the tug Ina. The complement of the tug was a master, Captain Sas, the plaintiff as deckhand, and a greaser to look after the engines. It was used in the main to push barges from alongside the dredger to a dumping ground, but also to transport those working on the operation from and to the shore at the beginning and end of shifts. The task of the plaintiff as deckhand was to keep the deck clean and tidy, and to see to the tying up and untying of the tug, whether alongside the dredger or elsewhere. F This involved two man-made fibre ropes, each 1½ inches in diameter, with an eye at one end. The eye of one rope would be placed over a bollard on the dredger, and then the rope would be secured to two bollards on the tug by two figure-of-eight turns and two half-hitches. The remainder of the rope would then be coiled on the deck of the tug inboard of the two bollards. The same process would be carried out for each rope, except that one was secured to the for’ard end of the tug and one to the aft end. To untie the ropes the plaintiff would first slacken the aft rope by removing it from the two bollards on the tug, next it would be removed from the bollard on the dredger, and the plaintiff would haul it aboard the tug. He would then do the same with the for’ard rope. Finally, he would give two knocks on the side of the wheelhouse to indicate to Captain Sas that the ropes were both on board. On 22 July 1975, when the plaintiff had been working on the tug for two days, the G H tug was tied up to the dredger, and the time came when she was to leave. Captain Sas, who did not speak much English, signed to the plaintiff to untie the ropes. The plaintiff took the aft rope off first as the tug was leaving with engine astern. He then moved to the for'ard rope and started removing it from the two bollards on board the tug. As he was doing so, Captain Sas put the engine astern prematurely; he started to move the tug away from the dredger. The plaintiff immediately stood back as he thought that the rope might break and injure him, but instead it was pulled through the bollard and he went with it. He has some recollection of the rope being round his left leg and of being pulled through the bollard. After that he was in the water, with his left leg very seriously injured."

The plaintiff sought to establish liability against the defendants on various grounds. Of these it is only necessary to consider two: the first that the accident was caused by the negligence of Captain Sas for which the defendants were vicariously liable; and the second that the accident was caused by the negligence of the defendants in failing to provide a safe system of work for the plaintiff.

With regard to the first ground of liability, the defendants did not admit that the accident had been caused by any negligence of Captain Sas. They further contended that, even if it had been so caused, Captain Sas was the servant of Stevin and not of the defendants, so that the defendants were not vicariously liable for the consequences of his negligence.

The defendants did not call Captain Sas to give evidence. In these circumstances Staughton J. rightly had no hesitation in finding, first, that Captain Sas had been negligent in putting the tug's engines astern prematurely, and, secondly, that the accident had been caused by his negligence in this respect. With regard to that negligence he said (transcript, p. 38):

"That may have taken the form of carelessness in not waiting for the plaintiff's signal before putting the engine astern, or else a deliberate, but dangerous, manoeuvre designed to encourage the plaintiff to perform his tasks more quickly."

On the question of the defendants' vicarious liability for the negligence of Captain Sas Staughton J. said (transcript, pp. 42-43):

"On the evidence, it seems to me that the defendants, through some person at Lulea, in effect instructed the plaintiff to work with and under Captain Sas pursuant to the plaintiff's contract of employment with the defendants. They made Captain Sas the foreman, boss or chargehand through whom their orders would reach the plaintiff, and to whom the plaintiff would render directly the service which he owed to the defendants. As between the plaintiff and the defendants, Captain Sas must be taken to have been the servant of the defendants. If that involves any novel doctrine, so be it. The common law would become obsolete if it did not develop to meet new situations."

With regard to the second ground of liability relied on by the plaintiff, Staughton J. found that the system of work provided for the plaintiff was not unsafe. In this connection he said (transcript, pp. 38-39):

A "The task of the plaintiff was a simple one and well within his capabilities. Given due care and attention on the part of himself and Captain Sas, there was nothing unsafe about it."

B In the result Staughton J. decided that the plaintiff succeeded against the defendants on the first ground of liability referred to above, namely, vicarious liability for the negligence of Captain Sas, but failed on the second ground of liability, namely, failure of the defendants to provide a safe system of work for the plaintiff.

C The defendants contended that, if they were liable to the plaintiff, they were entitled to limit the amount of their liability to £43,893 under the provisions relating to limitation of liability contained in the Merchant Shipping Acts. For the plaintiff it was not disputed that, if the defendants were entitled to limit their liability under these provisions, the amount of their limited liability was £43,893. It was disputed, however, that the defendants were entitled to limit their liability at all.

D The right to limit liability for certain occurrences, including accidents causing personal injury to some person, was given to shipowners only by section 503 (in Part VIII) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. That right was extended to persons other than shipowners by section 3 of the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act 1958 which provides:

E "(1) The persons whose liability in connection with a ship is excluded or limited by Part VIII of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 shall include any charterer and any person interested in or in possession of the ship, and, in particular, any manager or operator of the ship. (2) In relation to a claim arising from the act or omission of any person in his capacity as master or member of the crew or (otherwise than in that capacity) in the course of his employment as a servant of the owners or of any such person as is mentioned in subsection (1) of this section,—(a) the persons whose liability is excluded or limited as aforesaid shall also include the master, member of the crew or servant, and, in a case where the master or member of the crew is the servant of a person whose liability would not be excluded or limited apart from this paragraph, the person whose servant he is; . . ."

F Staughton J., having decided that, as between the plaintiff and the defendants, Captain Sas was to be taken to have been the servant of the defendants, went on to hold that the defendants were entitled to limit their liability, subject to any question of actual fault or privity, under subsection 2(a) above, on the ground that the plaintiff's claim arose from the act or omission of Captain Sas in his capacity as master of the tug Ina and that Captain Sas was at the time of such act or omission the servant of the defendants. Staughton J. went on to find that there had been no actual fault or privity of the defendants (a finding which was affirmed by the Court of Appeal and not challenged in your Lordships' House), and held that the defendants were therefore entitled to limit their liability as contended for by them.

G He concluded, after an examination of all the relevant evidence, that Neill L.J., giving the judgment of the Court of Appeal [1986] Q.B. 965, did not accept the judge's view that the defendants were liable to the plaintiff because Captain Sas was to be taken, as between the plaintiff and the defendants, to have been the servant of the defendants. He concluded, after an examination of all the relevant evidence, that Captain Sas was, and remained at all material times, the servant of Stevin. He went on to say, however, that this circumstance did not conclude the issue of liability in favour of the defendants, because it was also necessary to consider the question whether the defendants were in breach of the personal duty of care owed by them to the plaintiff. In this connection he said, at p. 974:

“In the instant case the relevant facet of the general duty of the defendants to take reasonable care for the safety of the young plaintiff was the obligation to provide and maintain in operation a safe system of work.”

Neill L.J. then examined the evidence relating to the system of work, and in particular that of Captain Clifford, the other tugmaster, who alternated with Captain Sas in the command of the tug. Captain Clifford's evidence was that he did not rely on knocks by his deckhand on the outside of the wheelhouse in order to be assured that the deckhand had completed his work. He relied instead on one of three indications: a shout by the deckhand of “all gone,” a hand signal by the deckhand to that effect, or himself coming out of the wheelhouse and looking at the bollards on the tug. Having examined the evidence Neill L.J. said, at pp. 974-975:

“In these circumstances there was scope for a finding that the system used by Captain Sas was not a safe system, because it relied largely (if not exclusively) on a sound signal of a kind which was not distinctive like the shout ‘all gone,’ and which might be confused with one of the many other noises likely to be heard during dredging operations at sea. But the very experienced judge, who heard the evidence, came to the conclusion that the system of work was not unsafe. Furthermore, the judge concluded that the accident happened, not because of a fault in the system, but because Captain Sas either carelessly did not wait for the signal, or because he deliberately put the tug astern to make the plaintiff move more quickly. We have come to the conclusion, however, that in the circumstances of this case it is unrealistic to attempt to draw a clear dividing line between the system of work which Captain Sas laid down for the plaintiff to follow, and the actual conduct of Captain Sas which caused the accident and the plaintiff's injuries. Captain Sas did not give evidence and the precise sequence of events can only be a matter of conjecture. We consider that it is just as likely that Captain Sas mistook some other sound for a signal from the plaintiff as that he carelessly failed to wait for the plaintiff's signal or that he put the engines astern deliberately in order to make the plaintiff hurry up.”

Neill L.J. then discussed at length the principles of law governing the question of when employers may be held liable for the acts or omissions of a person who is not their servant. In the course of that discussion he referred to and cited from two well known English authorities, Davie v. New Merton Board Mills Ltd. [1959] A.C. 604 and Wingfield v. Ellerman's Wilson Line Ltd. [1960] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 16, and a recent decision of the High Court of Australia, Kondis v. State Transport Authority (1984) 55 A.L.R. 225.

McDermid v. Nash Dredging Ltd. (H.L.(E.))

Lord Brandon

A He expressed his conclusions with regard to the proper principles of law to be applied and the proper approach to be followed, at pp. 979-980:

B “Neither in the cases to which we were referred in the course of the argument, however, nor in the other authorities to which we have had regard in the course of considering this judgment, have we been able to discover any general principle which provides a sure guide to the limits of vicarious liability in tort. It is clear that the legacy of the doctrine of common employment remains, together with the rather uneasy division between cases where an employer may be liable for the negligent performance of his personal duties by a third party and cases where the employer may be liable vicariously for the negligence of an employee or agent. It seems to C this court, therefore, that in a case where a plaintiff is suing in respect of injuries received by him in the course of his employment and while working at a place at which he is required by his employer to work, the only satisfactory approach is to look at all the circumstances in the light of the fact that it is the basic duty of the employer to take reasonable care so to conduct his operations as not to subject those employed by him to unnecessary risk. The relevant circumstances will include: (a) the skill and experience of the injured employee, (b) the nature of the task on which the employee was employed, (c) the place where the injured employee was employed and the degree of control which the employer exercised at that place, (d) the relationship, if any, between the injured employee and the individual tortfeasor, (e) the relationship, if any, between the employer and the individual tortfeasor, (f) the interest, if any, of the employer in the actual task which the individual tortfeasor was performing when the accident occurred.”

Neill L.J. went on to apply this statement of the proper principles of law to be applied and the proper approach to be followed to the facts of the present case, at p. 980:

F “It is true that the tug Ina was owned by Stevin and that Captain Sas was employed by Stevin. But Captain Sas and the plaintiff were working together in a small team of three to perform a contract which, as we understand the matter, the defendants and Stevin were carrying out together. Indeed, as we have already observed, on alternate shifts the captain of the tug was Captain Clifford, an employee of the defendants. The defendants put the plaintiff (who was a young and inexperienced deckhand) under the control and into the care of Captain Sas. He was their agent or delegate to take reasonable care to devise a safe system of work on board the tug. In the circumstances of this case, he was also the agent or delegate to take reasonable care to see that the safe system was carried out. The defendants themselves, of course, were a limited company with headquarters in Guildford. They could only operate through their employees or other agents. It seems to us that on any sensible view of the doctrine of vicarious liability Captain Sas was the agent or delegate of the defendants to perform their duty towards the plaintiff. If there had been clear evidence that Captain Sas had put the tug astern when he knew that the plaintiff had not released the rope, we would have felt great difficulty in regarding the defendants as being vicariously responsible for such an action. The more probable cause of this accident was the absence of a safe system, or a careless disregard by Captain Sas of the risks which his unsafe method of work entailed. With all due respect to the judge, we would decide the issue of liability in favour of the plaintiff, not because we think that Captain Sas 'must be taken to have been the servant of' the defendants, but because he was the person entrusted by the defendants with performing their duty to take reasonable care for the safety of this young man."

Neill L.J. then turned to the issue of limitation of liability. After setting out the relevant parts of section 503 of the Act of 1894 and section 3 of the Act of 1958, he said that the defendants would only be entitled to limit their liability if they could show that they fell into one or more of the following categories: (1) the owners of the tug, (2) the charterers of the tug, (3) a person interested in the tug, (4) a person in possession of the tug, (5) the manager or operator of the tug, (6) the masters of Captain Sas. The judge, he said, had held that the defendants were entitled to limit their liability on the ground that they fell into category (6), namely, masters of Captain Sas. On the Court of Appeal's view of the matter, however, Stevin were the masters of Captain Sas and the defendants were not. The defendants did not fall into any of the other categories either. Accordingly they were not entitled to limit their liability.

My Lords, I consider first the primary issue as to whether the defendants are liable to the plaintiff at all, either on the ground relied on by Staughton J. or on the different ground relied on by the Court of Appeal. In relation to this issue I would make a number of observations. First, there was, in my opinion, no material on which Staughton J. was entitled to find that a possible explanation of the action of Captain Sas in putting the engines astern prematurely was that he did so deliberately in order to encourage the plaintiff to perform his tasks more quickly. There was no evidence that Captain Sas thought that the plaintiff worked too slowly, and, in the absence of such evidence, the suggestion that Captain Sas deliberately put the plaintiff in danger in order to teach him a lesson is not one which ought to be entertained. Secondly, I agree with the Court of Appeal that Captain Sas was, and remained at all material times, the servant of Stevin, and that Staughton J. was wrong in holding that, as between the plaintiff and the defendants, Captain Sas must be taken to have been the servant of the defendants. Thirdly, I agree with the Court of Appeal that the real question in the case is whether the defendants were in breach of the duty of care which they owed to the plaintiff in not devising and operating a safe system of work for him. Fourthly, I agree with the Court of Appeal that there was scope on the evidence for a finding that the system of work devised by Captain Sas, under which the plaintiff was to inform him that he had completed his work of unmooring by knocking on the outside of the wheelhouse was unsafe. However, for reasons which will become apparent, I do not consider that it is necessary to reach a conclusion on that point.

My Lords, the Court of Appeal regarded the case as raising difficult questions of law on which clear authority was not easy to find. With great respect to the elaborate judgment of that court, I think that they have treated the case as more difficult than it really is. A statement of the relevant principle of law can be divided into three parts. First, an

3 W.L.R.

McDermid v. Nash Dredging Ltd. (H.L.(E.))

Lord Brandon

A employer owes to his employee a duty to exercise reasonable care to ensure that the system of work provided for him is a safe one. Secondly, the provision of a safe system of work has two aspects: (a) the devising of such a system and (b) the operation of it. Thirdly, the duty concerned has been described alternatively as either personal or non-delegable. The meaning of these expressions is not self-evident and needs explaining. B The essential characteristic of the duty is that, if it is not performed, it is no defence for the employer to show that he delegated its performance to a person, whether his servant or not his servant, whom he reasonably believed to be competent to perform it. Despite such delegation the employer is liable for the non-performance of the duty.

C In the present case the relevant system of work in relation to the plaintiff was the system for unmooring the tug Ina. In the events which occurred the defendants delegated both the devising and the operating of such system to Captain Sas, who was not their servant. An essential feature of such system, if it was to be a safe one, was that Captain Sas would not work the tug's engines ahead or astern until he knew that the plaintiff had completed his work of unmooring the tug. The system which Captain Sas devised was one under which the plaintiff would let him know that he had completed that work by giving two knocks on the D outside of the wheelhouse. I have already said that I agree with the Court of Appeal that there was scope, on the evidence, for a finding that that system was not a safe one. I shall assume, however, in the absence of any contrary finding by Staughton J., that that system, as devised by Captain Sas, was safe. The crucial point, however, is that, on the occasion of the plaintiff's accident, Captain Sas did not operate that E system. He negligently failed to operate it in that he put the tug's engines astern at a time when the plaintiff had not given, and he, Captain Sas, could not therefore have heard, the prescribed signal of two knocks by the plaintiff on the outside of the wheelhouse. For this failure by Captain Sas to operate the system which he had devised, the defendants, as the plaintiff's employers, are personally, not vicariously, liable to him.

F It was contended for the defendants that the negligence of Captain Sas was not negligence in failing to operate the safe system which he had devised. It was rather casual negligence in the course of operating such system, for which the defendants, since Captain Sas was not their servant, were not liable. I cannot accept that contention. The negligence of Captain Sas was not casual but central. It involved abandoning the G safe system of work which he had devised and operating in its place a manifestly unsafe system. In the result there was a failure by the defendants, not in devising a safe system of work for the plaintiff, but in operating one.

H On these grounds, which while not differing in substance from those relied on by the Court of Appeal are perhaps more simply and directly expressed, I agree with that court that the defendants are liable to the plaintiff.

I turn to the secondary issue of limitation of liability. With regard to this, I agree entirely with the analysis of the relevant statutory provisions made by the Court of Appeal. In order to succeed on limitation, the defendants had to bring themselves within the six categories of persons specified by Neill L.J., to which I referred earlier. On the footing that Captain Sas was not to be taken to have been the defendants' servant, they could not bring themselves within category (6). Nor, in my opinion, specified by Neill L.J., to which I referred earlier. On the footing that Captain Sas was not to be taken to have been the defendants' servant, they could not bring themselves within category (6). Nor, in my opinion, could they bring themselves within any of the other categories, (1) to (5). Before your Lordships counsel for the defendants submitted that they came within category (3) as persons interested in the tug. In my opinion the expression "any person interested in . . . the ship," as used in section 3(1) of the Act of 1958, means a person having a legal or equitable interest in the ship. In the present case the whole legal and equitable interest in the tug Ina was, on the evidence, in Stevin. I do not therefore think that there is any substance in this submission.

My Lords, for the reasons which I have given, I consider that the Court of Appeal decided rightly both the issues which arise on this appeal, and I would accordingly dismiss the appeal with costs.

LORD MACKAY OF CLASHFERN. My Lords, for the reasons given in the speeches of my noble and learned friends Lord Hailsham of St. Marylebone and Lord Brandon of Oakbrook, with which I agree, I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD ACKNER. My Lords, for the reasons given in the speeches of my noble and learned friends Lord Hailsham of St. Marylebone and Lord Brandon of Oakbrook, with which I agree, I would dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

REGINA v. LIVERPOOL JUVENILE COURT, Ex parte R.

1987 March 20;
April 10

Russell L.J. and Otton J.

Justices—Evidence—Admissibility—Confession—Summary proceedings—Defendant representing that confession improperly obtained—Whether justices required to hold trial within a trial—Whether justices required to rule on admissibility before close of prosecution case—Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, s. 76(2)¹

The defendant appeared before the juvenile court for trial on a charge of burglary. At the beginning of the hearing the prosecutor intimated to the justices that he intended to rely on the defendant's confession, which was the only evidence indicating his guilt, and that the defendant intended to challenge

A the admissibility of the confession, and he invited them to determine the question of admissibility as a preliminary issue. The defendant's solicitor supported that invitation and informed the justices that he wished to call the defendant to give evidence on the issue of admissibility alone, which he wished to have resolved before deciding whether to call the defendant in the substantive trial. The justices refused to hold a preliminary inquiry and adjourned the trial to enable the defendant to apply for judicial review of their refusal.

B On the defendant's application for judicial review by way of an order of mandamus requiring the juvenile court to hold an inquiry into the admissibility of the defendant's confession:—

C Held, granting the application, that section 76(2) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 required justices conducting a summary trial to hold a trial within a trial to determine the admissibility of a confession made by the defendant if it was represented to them by the defendant that it was or might have been obtained by oppression or in consequence of anything said or done which was likely to render unreliable any confession which might be made by the defendant in consequence thereof; that the defendant might give evidence on such a trial within a trial confined to the question of admissibility and, if he did, could not at that stage be cross-examined as to the truth or otherwise of the confession; that where such a trial within a trial had been held the defendant was entitled to a ruling on the admissibility of the confession before, or at, the end of the prosecution case; and that, accordingly, the defendant was entitled to the relief sought (post, pp. 228F–G, 230E, F–H).

If no representation is made before the close of the prosecution case that the confession was or may have been obtained by one of the processes set out in section 76(2) of the Act of 1984 it is still open to the defendant to raise admissibility or weight of the confession at any subsequent stage of the trial; it should never be necessary to call the prosecution evidence relating to the obtaining of a confession twice (post, pp. 230H–231B). APPLICATION for judicial review.

On an application for judicial review, made pursuant to leave granted by Taylor J. on 6 April 1987, the defendant, a minor, by his father and next friend, sought an order of mandamus requiring the Liverpool Juvenile Court to hold an inquiry "by way of voire dire" into the admissibility of a confession made by the defendant on 10 October 1986. The grounds of the application were that the justices, in declining to embark on such an inquiry in the course of the defendant's trial on a charge of burglary contrary to section 9(1)(b) of the Theft Act 1968, following submissions by both the prosecutor and the defendant's solicitor that section 76(2) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 obliged them to do so in order to determine whether they should admit in evidence the confession (which was the only evidence against the defendant), had failed to discharge their duty under section 76(2) and had acted in excess of jurisdiction, and that therefore mandamus should issue to compel the justices to embark on the performance of their statutory duty.

10 April. RUSSELL L.J. read the following judgment. This case raises important procedural points concerned with criminal proceedings in the magistrates' court and the impact upon those proceedings of section 76(2) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. It is an application for judicial review, the relief sought being mandamus requiring the Liverpool Juvenile Court "to hold an inquiry by way of voire dire into the admissibility of a confession made by [the defendant] on 10 October 1986." We are told that the issues raised have been the subject of controversy amongst justices and justices' clerks up and down the country.

F

The background can be very shortly stated. The defendant, who makes this application by his father, is 15 years of age. On 3 February 1987 he appeared before the justices, sitting as a juvenile court at Liverpool, charged with the offence of burglary. He denied the charge. The allegation was that on 8 October 1986 he had entered 3, Sheehan Heights, Liverpool 5, as a trespasser and had stolen a pension book and £3 in cash, contrary to section 9(1)(b) of the Theft Act 1968.

G

When the case was called on the solicitor prosecuting intimated to the justices that the prosecution sought to rely upon a confession made by the defendant to two detective police officers who had interviewed him on 10 October 1986. That confession, the solicitor indicated, was the only evidence available to the prosecution demonstrating guilt. The solicitor further indicated to the court that he understood that the admissibility of the confession was to be challenged and he invited the court to determine its admissibility as a preliminary issue. The solicitor drew the attention of the justices to the provisions of section 76(2) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 which reads:

H

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Liverpool Juvenile Ct., Ex p. R. (D.C.)

Russell L.J.

A "If, in any proceedings where the prosecution proposes to give in evidence a confession made by an accused person, it is represented to the court that the confession was or may have been obtained—
(a) by oppression of the person who made it; or (b) in consequence of anything said or done which was likely, in the circumstances existing at the time, to render unreliable any confession which might be made by him in consequence thereof, the court shall not B allow the confession to be given in evidence against him except in so far as the prosecution proves to the court beyond reasonable doubt that the confession (notwithstanding that it may be true) was not obtained as aforesaid."

C The solicitor acting for the defendant supported the prosecution's application and, so we are told by counsel, indicated to the justices that, for the purpose of determining the admissibility of the confession which the defendant alleged had been obtained improperly, he might wish to call the defendant upon the issue of admissibility alone. The justices were informed that in that event, during the preliminary inquiry, no questions could properly be put to the defendant outside the scope of the inquiry as to admissibility. Further, we were told that the solicitor D acting for the defendant indicated to the justices that he wished to have the question of admissibility resolved and a ruling made upon it before taking any decision as to the calling of the defendant in the substantive trial of the charge.

E The justices retired and, having considered the submissions, the chairman thereafter announced that they were not willing to hold any preliminary inquiry, that decision having been taken after consultation with the deputy clerk to the justices. The case was thereupon adjourned to enable the current application for judicial review to be made.

F We have before us an affidavit sworn by Mr. John Edmund Pearson who is the clerk to the justices for the petty sessional area of the City of Liverpool. In it he points out that he does not issue directions to justices upon matters of law and indeed has no power to do so, but his practice was, and is, to make known to the individual court clerks his views on points of law and he expects those clerks when advising justices to inform them of his views. That seems to me to be a perfectly proper procedure.

G His affidavit, after making reference to observations of Lord Lane
C.J. in S.F.J. (An Infant) v. Chief Constable of Kent, The Times, 17
June 1982 and Lord Widgery C.J. in Williams v. Mohamed [1977]
R.T.R. 12, continues:

H "I came to the conclusion that the proper advice to be given to magistrates was that they could not hold a trial within a trial and that they should be cautious about deciding to deal with preliminary points and that the admissibility of a statement would not seem to be an appropriate matter to be decided by way of a preliminary point. After the enactment of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 the question was raised as to whether sections 76 and 78 affected the way in which justices should deal with issues of the kind raised in the present case. Having looked at the two sections I came to the conclusion that the procedure for dealing with the way in which the admissibility of a confession should be dealt with was not affected by either of those sections. I advised my court clerks accordingly and told them that the advice that I would give to magistrates was that neither of those sections affected the decision in S.F.J. (An Infant) v. Chief Constable of Kent. I observe that in Vel (Kevin) v. Chief Constable of North Wales, The Times, 14 February 1987 it was held that section 78 did not affect the procedure laid down in the case of S.F.J. (An Infant) v. Chief Constable of Kent."

In a sentence the submission made on behalf of the applicant was that that advice is inappropriate having regard to sections 76 and 78 of the Act, and in the light of section 76(2) the law has changed so as to require magistrates to hold, what in the Crown Court would be referred to as, a trial within a trial or an inquiry on the voire dire. The submissions made before us by Mr. Moran on behalf of the applicant were supported, or at least not resisted, by Mr. Maddison who appeared on behalf of the Crown Prosecution Service.

First, counsel submitted that the terms of section 76(2) were mandatory and admitted of only one construction, namely that the court had to decide, once a representation was made to it, whether a confession had been properly or improperly obtained before taking a decision to "allow the confession to be given in evidence." There were, therefore, two stages: first, the inquiry as to admissibility; and secondly, the admission of the confession in evidence if, and only if, as a result of the first stage the justices found that the confession "(notwithstanding that it may be true) was not obtained" by one or other of the processes set out in sub-paragraphs (a) and (b) of section 76(2). These two stages, quite separate and distinct the one from the other, represented a change in practice which the section required. Counsel acknowledged that prior to the passing of the Act, the justices had a discretion to consider whether or not in any particular case it was appropriate for them to embark upon a separate trial within a trial. The section had removed that discretion once a representation was made to the court. There remained, however, a discretion vested in the defence as to whether an attack upon a confession should be mounted in a trial within a trial or as part of the substantive hearing.

A trial within a trial took place only if it was "represented to the court that the confession was or may have been obtained" by one or other of the improper processes.

Two advantages to the defendant were indicated to us, as they were to the justices. Upon the authority of Wong Kam-ming v. The Queen [1980] A.C. 247, a defendant cannot be asked about the truth of a confession during an inquiry as to its admissibility. The defendant was therefore entitled to give evidence as to admissibility under the umbrella of that protection. If the justices declined to deal with the matter quite separately that protection would be lost. Further, submitted counsel, a defendant is entitled to know the strength of the case which he has to meet at the end of the prosecution case. This may affect his decision whether to go into the witness box. A ruling upon admissibility prior to or at the closure of the prosecution case was therefore important to the defendant.

Counsel referred us to a number of authorities. These, it was submitted, highlighted the common law position before the passing of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. Reverting to the authority cited in his affidavit by Mr. Pearson, namely S.F.J. (An Infant) v. Chief Constable of Kent, The Times, 17 June 1982, that was a decision of the

Reg. v. Liverpool Juvenile Ct., Ex p. R. (D.C.)

Russell L.J.

A Divisional Court on 10 June 1982 and was an appeal by way of case stated. It was there submitted that justices were required to hear the evidence of a police officer proving a confession twice, once on the voire dire to prove admissibility and later in the substantive trial. Rejecting the submission, Lord Lane C.J. said, according to the transcript:

B "It is perfectly correct to speak of a trial within a trial when the case is one which is being conducted by a judge and jury. Frequently, and in modern times even more frequently, the jury is asked to leave the court when an issue is properly tried by the judge on a matter with which the jury at that stage have no concern. More often than not it is a question of the admissibility of evidence, and for obvious reasons that is conducted in the absence of the jury by the judge, the reason being that it is no good conducting the matter in front of the jury, because if the evidence is held to be inadmissible, the jury will then have heard all sorts of matters which they have no business to hear. Hence the reason for the trial within a trial.

D "But where the matter is being conducted by the magistrates' court, then there is no question of having a trial within a trial, because the justices are the judges both of fact and of law. They are the people who not only have to determine the question of admissibility, but also the question of guilt or innocence, namely the main issue of the trial. There may, during the course of the trial before the justices, be all sorts of subsidiary or preliminary or incidental matters which they have to decide: amongst them maybe, as was the case here, questions of admissibility of evidence. They decide those as separate issues, not as a trial within a trial. Consequently there was no need in the present case for the evidence which they had heard relating to the voluntary nature or otherwise of the oral and written statements by the appellant to be repeated to the justices after the issue of admissibility had been determined."

Later, however, Lord Lane C.J. said:

F "I find it quite impossible to lay down any general rule as to when justices should announce their decision on this type of point, and indeed when the point itself should necessarily be taken. Every case will be different. Some sort of preliminary point, for instance with regard to the admissibility of a document or something like that, can plainly, with the assistance perhaps of the clerk, be decided straightaway. Other points, such as the one with which we are dealing here, may require a decision at a later stage of the case, possibly after further argument. It may be that in some cases the defendant will be entitled to know what the decision of the justices with regard to the admissibility of a confession is at the close of the prosecution case in order to enable him to know what proper course he should take with regard to giving evidence and calling evidence and so on."

This last observation, submits counsel, is the very point which the section now resolves.

It was taken up by Robert Goff L.J. in A.D.C. (An Infant) v. Chief Constable of Greater Manchester (unreported), 15 March 1983, when sitting as a Divisional Court with McNeill J. After referring to and approving the words of Lord Lane C.J. in S.F.J. (An Infant) v. Chief

Constable of Kent and words in a similar vein by Lord Widgery C.J. in Williams v. Mohamed [1977] R.T.R. 12, Robert Goff L.J. said:

“I recognise that in very many cases it would indeed be proper for justices to deal with the issue of admissibility of a confession before the close of the prosecution case. To give a very simple and perhaps extreme example, if the only evidence before justices is the evidence of a confession and nothing else, then as a matter of common justice the justices ought to deal with the issue of the admissibility of that confession as a preliminary point, before the close of the prosecution case, so that the defendant can then decide whether to make a submission of no case to answer.”

This situation is precisely the point in the instant case, but it is submitted that by virtue of section 76(2) it is no longer a matter for the exercise of discretion by the justices. They are now required to hold a trial within a trial. Should they admit the confession in consequence of the preliminary inquiry but later hear further evidence affecting its weight or admissibility, the justices may subsequently allow it to play no part in their findings. This situation may also arise if the defence chooses not to avail itself of the option to require a preliminary inquiry but chooses to attack the confession during the course of the substantive hearing. In either event there is no need for the evidence as to the obtaining of the confession to be given twice although, as earlier indicated, a defendant may have to return to the witness box after the trial within a trial: see Conway v. Hotten [1976] 2 All E.R. 213.

Finally, counsel submitted that should the defence not avail itself of the right to a trial within a trial by virtue of section 76(2) there remained an inherent jurisdiction in the court to exclude a confession at a later stage in the proceedings as well as by virtue of section 78 of the Act which specifically refers to “the circumstances in which the evidence was obtained.”

For my part I have come to the conclusion that all the submissions of counsel to which I have referred are valid. I do not think that to give effect to them would result in any insurmountable practical difficulties in the magistrates’ court in the summary disposal of criminal offences and, indeed, in some cases the new procedure could result in a saving of time where exclusion of evidence in the way of a confession is finally ruled upon at the end of the prosecution case.

To summarise the effect of this judgment I would, therefore, rule that:

1. The effect of section 76(2) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 is that in summary proceedings justices must now hold a trial within a trial if it is represented to them by the defence that a confession was or may have been obtained by either of the improper processes appearing in sub-paragraphs (a) or (b) section 76(2).

2. In such a trial within a trial the defendant may give evidence confined to the question of admissibility and the justices will not be concerned with the truth or otherwise of the confession.

3. In consequence of paragraphs 1 and 2 above, the defendant is entitled to a ruling upon admissibility of a confession before, or at, the end of the prosecution case.

4. There remains a discretion open to the defendant as to the stage at which an attack is to be made upon an alleged confession. A trial within a trial will only take place before the close of the prosecution

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Liverpool Juvenile Ct., Ex p. R. (D.C.)

Russell L.J.

A case if it is represented to the court that the confession was, or may have been, obtained by one or other of the processes set out in subparagraphs (a) or (b) section 76(2). If no such representation is made the defendant is at liberty to raise admissibility or weight of the confession at any subsequent stage of the trial. For the avoidance of doubt, I consider that "representation" is not the same as, nor does it include, cross-examination. Thus the court is not required to embark upon, nor is the defence bound to proceed upon, a voire dire merely because of a suggestion in cross-examination that the alleged confession was obtained improperly.

5. It should never be necessary to call the prosecution evidence relating to the obtaining of a confession twice.

I wish to make it plain that the above rulings are confined to the summary disposal of criminal offences. They should not be taken as applicable in all cases where the justices are concerned with committal proceedings where different considerations may prevail: see Reg. v. Oxford City Justices, Ex parte Berry [1987] 1 All E.R. 1244, a decision of the Divisional Court. Nor is this judgment intended to lay down any guidance as to the trial of indictable offences in the Crown Court.

For my part I would grant this application for judicial review and direct that the order of mandamus should go in the form in which relief is sought in the application.

HOTSON RESPONDENT
AND
EAST BERKSHIRE AREA HEALTH AUTHORITY APPELLANTS

1987 May 11, 12, 13;
July 2

Lord Bridge of Harwich, Lord Brandon of Oakbrook, Lord Mackay of Clashfern,
Lord Ackner and Lord Goff of Chieveley

Negligence—Hospital—Failure to diagnose injury—Delay of five days in treatment of injury from fall—Plaintiff suffering permanent disability—25 per cent. chance that plaintiff's disability attributable to hospital's delay in treating injury—Whether plaintiff entitled to damages for loss of chance of good recovery—On balance of probabilities fall causing disability

The plaintiff, then aged 13, fell some 12 feet while climbing a tree and sustained an acute traumatic fracture of the left femoral epiphysis. He was taken to hospital, but his injury was not correctly diagnosed or treated for five days. In the event, he suffered avascular necrosis of the epiphysis, involving disability of the hip joint with the virtual certainty that osteoarthritis would later develop. He brought an action for damages against, inter alia, the defendant health authority, who admitted negligence in failing to diagnose and treat his injury promptly. Simon Brown J. found that even if the health authority had diagnosed the injury correctly and treated the plaintiff promptly there had been a high probability, which he assessed as a 75 per cent. risk, that avascular necrosis would still have developed. He held that the plaintiff was entitled to damages for the loss of the 25 per cent. chance that he would have made a nearly full recovery and awarded him £11,500. The Court of Appeal dismissed an appeal by the health authority.

On appeal by the health authority:—

Held, allowing the appeal, that it was for the plaintiff to establish on a balance of probabilities that the delay in treatment had at least materially contributed to the development of the avascular necrosis and for the judge to resolve on a balance of probabilities the conflict of medical evidence as to what had caused the avascular necrosis; that the judge's findings of fact were unmistakably to the effect that on a balance of probabilities the plaintiff's fall had left insufficient blood vessels intact to keep the epiphysis alive, which amounted to a finding of fact that the fall had been the sole cause of the avascular necrosis; and that, accordingly, the plaintiff had failed on the issue of causation and no question of quantification had arisen (post, pp. 237E–G, 238D–F, 240C–D, 244E–F, 245A–B, 246G–247A, F–G, 248E).

Per Lord Bridge of Harwich. (i) There are formidable difficulties in the way of accepting the superficially attractive analogy between the principle applied in cases of damages for a lost chance in actions based on contract or tort and the principle of awarding damages for the lost chance of avoiding personal injury or, in medical negligence cases, for the lost chance of a better medical result which might have been achieved by prompt diagnosis and correct treatment, but the present appeal is not a suitable occasion for reaching a settled conclusion (post, pp. 237H–238B).

(ii) If the plaintiff had proved on a balance of probabilities that the authority's negligent failure to diagnose and treat his injury promptly had materially contributed to the development of avascular necrosis, no principle of English law would have entitled the authority to a discount from the full measure of damage to reflect the chance that, even given prompt treatment, avascular necrosis might well still have developed (post, p. 238B-C).

3 W.L.R.

Hotson v. East Berkshire H.A. (H.L.(E.))

Per Lord Mackay of Clashfern. It would be unwise in the present case to lay it down as a rule that a plaintiff could never succeed by proving loss of a chance in a medical negligence case (post, p. 240H).

Per Lord Ackner. The debate on the loss of a chance cannot arise where there has been a positive finding that before the duty arose the damage complained of had already been sustained or had become inevitable (post, p. 247C). Once liability is established on the balance of probabilities, the loss which the plaintiff has sustained is payable in full. It is not discounted by reducing his claim by the extent to which he has failed to prove his case with 100 per cent. certainty (post, p. 248A).

APPEAL from the Court of Appeal.

This was an appeal by the fourth defendants, the East Berkshire Area Health Authority, by leave of the House of Lords from the judgment of the Court of Appeal (Sir John Donaldson M.R., Dillon and Croom-Johnson L.J.J.) [1987] 2 W.L.R. 287 given on 14 November 1986 dismissing an appeal by the health authority and a cross-appeal by the plaintiff, Stephen John Hotson, from a judgment of Simon Brown J. [1985] 1 W.L.R. 1036 given on 15 March 1985.

B

The Court of Appeal refused the health authority leave to appeal, but on 5 February 1987 the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords (Lord Bridge of Harwich, Lord Ackner and Lord Goff of Chieveley) [1987] 1 W.L.R. 224 allowed a petition by them for leave.

The facts are set out in their Lordships' opinions.

Adrian Whitfield Q.C., Kieran Coonan and Andrew Grubb for the health authority.

Graeme Williams Q.C. and David Ashton for the plaintiff.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

2 July. LORD BRIDGE OF HARWICH. My Lords, the respondent plaintiff is now 23 years of age. On 26 April 1977, as a schoolboy of 13, whilst playing in the school lunch hour he climbed a tree to which a rope was attached, lost his hold on the rope and fell some 12 feet to the ground. He sustained an acute traumatic fracture of the left femoral epiphysis. Within hours he was taken to St. Luke's Hospital, Maidenhead, for which the appellant health authority ("the authority") was responsible. Members of the hospital staff examined him, but failed to diagnose the injury and he was sent home. For five days he was in severe pain. On 1 May 1977 he was taken to the hospital once more and this time X-rays of his hip yielded the correct diagnosis. He was put on immediate traction, treated as an emergency case and transferred to the Heatherwood Hospital where, on the following day, he was operated on by manipulation and reduction of the fracture and pinning of the joint. In the event the plaintiff suffered an avascular necrosis of the epiphysis. The femoral epiphysis is a layer of cartilage separating the bony head from the bony neck of the femur in a growing body. Avascular necrosis results from a failure of the blood supply to the epiphysis and causes deformity in the maturing head of the femur. This in turn involves a greater or lesser degree of disability of the hip joint with a virtual certainty that it will in due course be aggravated by osteoarthritis developing within the joint.

F

G

The plaintiff sued the authority, who admitted negligence in failing to diagnose the injury on 26 April 1977. Simon Brown J. [1985] 1 W.L.R. 1036, in a judgment delivered on 15 March 1985, awarded £150 damages for the pain suffered by the plaintiff from 26 April to 1 May 1977 which he would have been spared by prompt diagnosis and treatment. This element of the damages is not in dispute. The authority denied liability for any other element of damages. The judge expressed his findings of fact as follows, at pp. 1040-1041:

H

3 W.L.R.

Hotson v. East Berkshire H.A. (H.L.(E.))

Lord Bridge
of Harwich

A “(1) Even had the health authority correctly diagnosed and treated the plaintiff on 26 April there is a high probability, which I assess as a 75 per cent. risk, that the plaintiff’s injury would have followed the same course as it in fact has, that is, he would have developed avascular necrosis of the whole femoral head with all the same adverse consequences as have already ensued and with all the same adverse future prospects. (2) That 75 per cent. risk was translated B by the health authority’s admitted breach of duty into an inevitability.
Putting it the other way, their delay in diagnosis denied the plaintiff the 25 per cent. chance that, given immediate treatment, avascular necrosis would not have developed. (3) Had avascular necrosis not developed, the plaintiff would have made a very nearly full recovery.
C (4) The reason why the delay sealed the plaintiff’s fate was because it allowed the pressure caused by haemarthrosis—the bleeding of ruptured blood vessels into the joint—to compress and thus block the intact but distorted remaining vessels with the result that even had the fall left intact sufficient vessels to keep the epiphysis alive (which, as finding (1) makes plain, I think possible but improbable) such vessels would have become occluded and ineffective for this D purpose.”

On the basis of these findings he held, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff was entitled to damages for the loss of the 25 per cent. chance that, if the injury had been promptly diagnosed and treated, it would not have resulted in avascular necrosis of the epiphysis and the plaintiff would have made a very nearly full recovery. He proceeded to assess E the damages attributable to the consequences of the avascular necrosis at £46,000. Discounting this by 75 per cent., he awarded the plaintiff £11,500 for the lost chance of recovery. The authority’s appeal against this element in the award of damages was dismissed by the Court of Appeal (Sir John Donaldson M.R., Dillon and Croom-Johnson L.JJ.)
[1987] 2 W.L.R. 287 on 14 November 1986. The authority now appeal
F by leave of your Lordships’ House.

I would observe at the outset that the damages referable to the plaintiff’s pain during the five days by which treatment was delayed in consequence of failure to diagnose the injury correctly, although sufficient to establish the authority’s liability for the tort of negligence, have no relevance to their liability in respect of the avascular necrosis.
G There was no causal connection between the plaintiff’s physical pain and the development of the necrosis. If the injury had been painless, the plaintiff would have to establish the necessary causal link between the necrosis and the authority’s breach of duty in order to succeed. It makes no difference that the five days’ pain gave him a cause of action in respect of an unrelated element of damage.

H Before examining the judge’s findings more closely, it is necessary to say something of the conflict of expert medical evidence which the judge had to resolve. The evidence is highly technical and not altogether easy to follow. But at least this much is clear, that the failure of the blood supply to the epiphysis which caused the avascular necrosis could itself only have been caused in one of two ways: either the injury sustained in the fall caused the rupture of such a high proportion of the vessels supplying the epiphysis with blood that necrosis was bound to develop, or the blood vessels remaining intact were sufficient to keep the epiphysis alive but were subsequently occluded by pressure within the joint caused by haematoma (bruising) or haematosi (bleeding into the joint).

The plaintiff's expert witness was extremely tentative in his view as to the part which the delay in treatment may have played in causing avascular necrosis. In his evidence-in-chief he described the risk of the plaintiff suffering avascular necrosis even if promptly treated as "very considerable" and "very high." He said:

"Statistically, on reports published, he had a marginally better chance of escaping it than having avascular necrosis had it been treated expeditiously."

He was asked:

"Was there a chance, if the condition had been diagnosed and treated promptly, that no avascular necrosis would have occurred at all in any part?"

He replied: "There was a small chance, yes." But he also said that the delay in treatment had made the development of total avascular necrosis of the epiphysis inevitable. His first three answers to questions put to him in cross-examination were as follows:

"Q. As I understand it, Mr. Bucknill, you accept that even if there had been no delay, it is likely that there would have been avascular necrosis of the whole head? A. Yes, indeed. Q. And so the probabilities are that the delay in this case made no difference to the eventual outcome of this head? A. As I said, I think it made it inevitable that avascular necrosis occurred rather than likely. Q. In other words, what was always a probability became inevitable? A. Yes."

Later he modified these answers. He said that, given prompt treatment, he thought avascular necrosis was "likely but not probable." He explained that by "likely" he meant about a 40 per cent. chance, by "probable" he meant something over 60 per cent. He also explained his view that delay would have made a total avascular necrosis inevitable by the occlusion of intact blood vessels resulting from haematoma.

By contrast the authority's expert witness was emphatic, even dogmatic, in his evidence. His opinion was that the initial traumatic rupture of the blood vessels caused by the fall must have been so extensive that avascular necrosis was bound to result. He rejected the theory that the failure of the blood supply could be attributed to a haematoma, a condition which, in his opinion, would not occur in this injury. In this connection he distinguished between a haematoma and a haematosi, a condition which could occur in this injury but which would not, in his opinion, occlude intact blood vessels.

The judge indicated his assessment of these two witnesses as follows:

"I regret that I found certain parts of the evidence of both experts, highly qualified and experienced although they both undoubtedly are, difficult to accept, either as a result of internal inconsistency within their evidence or because of what seemed to be an intrinsic want of logic in some particular expressed view. I recognise that the explanation for this may well lie in the deficiencies of my own medical understanding, but the forensic process requires only that I do my best. In the result I find myself unattracted to, and finally unable to accept, either of the competing extreme views."

3 W.L.R.

Hotson v. East Berkshire H.A. (H.L.(E.))

Lord Bridge
of Harwich

A In analysing the issue of law arising from his findings the judge said [1985] 1 W.L.R. 1036, 1043–1044:

B “In the end the problem comes down to one of classification. Is this on true analysis a case where the plaintiff is concerned to establish causative negligence or is it rather a case where the real question is the proper quantum of damage? Clearly the case hovers near the border. Its proper solution in my judgment depends upon categorising it correctly between the two. If the issue is one of causation then the health authority succeed since the plaintiff will have failed to prove his claim on the balance of probabilities. He will be lacking an essential ingredient of his cause of action. If, however, the issue is one of quantification then the plaintiff succeeds because it is trite law that the quantum of a recognised head of damage must be evaluated according to the chances of the loss occurring.”

C He reached the conclusion that the question was one of quantification and thus arrived at his award to the plaintiff of one quarter of the damages appropriate to compensate him for the consequences of the avascular necrosis.

D It is here, with respect, that I part company with the judge. The plaintiff's claim was for damages for physical injury and consequential loss alleged to have been caused by the authority's breach of their duty of care. In some cases, perhaps particularly medical negligence cases, causation may be so shrouded in mystery that the court can only measure statistical chances. But that was not so here. On the evidence there was a clear conflict as to what had caused the avascular necrosis.

E The authority's evidence was that the sole cause was the original traumatic injury to the hip. The plaintiff's evidence, at its highest, was that the delay in treatment was a material contributory cause. This was a conflict, like any other about some relevant past event, which the judge could not avoid resolving on a balance of probabilities. Unless the plaintiff proved on a balance of probabilities that the delayed treatment was at least a material contributory cause of the avascular necrosis he failed on the issue of causation and no question of quantification could arise. But the judge's findings of fact, as stated in the numbered paragraphs (1) and (4) which I have set out earlier in this opinion, are unmistakably to the effect that on a balance of probabilities the injury caused by the plaintiff's fall left insufficient blood vessels intact to keep the epiphysis alive. This amounts to a finding of fact that the fall was the sole cause of the avascular necrosis.

G The upshot is that the appeal must be allowed on the narrow ground that the plaintiff failed to establish a cause of action in respect of the avascular necrosis and its consequences. Your Lordships were invited to approach the appeal more broadly and to decide whether, in a claim for damages for personal injury, it can ever be appropriate, where the cause of the injury is unascertainable and all the plaintiff can show is a statistical chance which is less than even that, but for the defendant's breach of duty, he would not have suffered the injury, to award him a proportionate fraction of the full damages appropriate to compensate for the injury as the measure of damages for the lost chance.

H There is a superficially attractive analogy between the principle applied in such cases as Chaplin v. Hicks [1911] 2 K.B. 786 (award of damages for breach of contract assessed by reference to the lost chance of securing valuable employment if the contract had been performed) and Kitchen v. Royal Air Force Association [1958] 1 W.L.R. 563 (damages for solicitors' negligence assessed by reference to the lost chance of prosecuting a successful civil action) and the principle of awarding damages for the lost chance of avoiding personal injury or, in medical negligence cases, for the lost chance of a better medical result which might have been achieved by prompt diagnosis and correct treatment. I think there are formidable difficulties in the way of accepting the analogy. But I do not see this appeal as a suitable occasion for reaching a settled conclusion as to whether the analogy can ever be applied. A B

As I have said, there was in this case an inescapable issue of causation first to be resolved. But if the plaintiff had proved on a balance of probabilities that the authority's negligent failure to diagnose and treat his injury promptly had materially contributed to the development of avascular necrosis, I know of no principle of English law which would have entitled the authority to a discount from the full measure of damage to reflect the chance that, even given prompt treatment, avascular necrosis might well still have developed. The decisions of this House in Bonnington Castings Ltd. v. Wardlaw [1956] A.C. 613 and McGhee v. National Coal Board [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1 give no support to such a view. C D

I would allow the appeal to the extent of reducing the damages awarded to the plaintiff by £11,500 and the amount of any interest on that sum which is included in the award.

LORD BRANDON OF OAKBROOK. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speeches prepared by my noble and learned friends, Lord Bridge of Harwich, Lord Mackay of Clashfern and Lord Ackner. I agree with all three speeches, and for the reasons contained in them I would allow the appeal. E

LORD MACKAY OF CLASHFERN. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speeches prepared by my noble and learned friends, Lord Bridge of Harwich and Lord Ackner. I agree with them that this appeal should be allowed for the reasons which they have given. F

In their printed case the authority first took the position that they were entitled to succeed in this appeal because the plaintiff had not proved that any loss or damage (other than five days' pain and suffering) had been caused by the authority's breach of duty. They also submitted that damages for loss of a chance were not recoverable in tort and at the close of the hearing Mr. Whitfield, for the authority, invited your Lordships to decide this case not only on the ground of fact which he submitted was available but also on the more general ground that damages for loss of a chance could not be awarded. This latter submission has been discussed in the course of the hearing very fully and I wish to add some observations, particularly on that aspect of the case. G H

When Mr. Williams, who appeared for the plaintiff, was invited to say what he meant by a chance he said that in relation to the facts of this case as found by the judge what was meant by a chance was that if 100 people had suffered the same injury as the plaintiff 75 of them would have developed avascular necrosis of the whole femoral head and 25 would not. This, he said, was an asset possessed by the plaintiff when he arrived at the authority's hospital on 26 April 1977. It was this asset

3 W.L.R.

Hotson v. East Berkshire H.A. (H.L.(E.))

Lord MacKay
of Clashfern

A which Mr. Williams submits the plaintiff lost in consequence of the negligent failure of the authority to diagnose his injury properly until 1 May 1977.

B The case closest on its facts to the present from the United Kingdom, cited at the hearing before your Lordships, is Kenyon v. Bell, 1953 S.C. 125. In that case the lower lid of a child's eye was cut as a result of an accident and subsequently the eye had to be removed by operation. An C action for damages was raised against the medical practitioner who had first treated the injury, alleging that he had failed to exercise reasonable care and ordinary professional skill in carrying out his examination and treatment of the injury and that as a result the child had not been given certain treatment which "would have made the saving of the eye a D certainty or alternatively . . . would have materially increased the chance of saving the eye." The medical practitioner contended that since all that was being offered to be proved was the weaker of the two alternative statements the case should not be allowed to proceed to proof since the weaker alternative alleging that the treatment would materially have increased the chance of saving the eye did not justify a claim for damages. Lord Guthrie held that the loss of a chance of saving the eye was not of itself a matter which would entitle the claim to E succeed but founding particularly on the use of the word "material" in the pleadings to qualify the chance of saving the eye by proper treatment Lord Guthrie held that on the evidence the chance of saving the eye by proper treatment might be proved to be so material that the natural and reasonable inference to draw from the evidence would be that the loss of the eye was due to the absence of such treatment. In that event, the claim would succeed. Accordingly he allowed it to go to proof. This illustrates that where what is at issue is a patient's condition on being
F presented to a medical practitioner the question whether the condition was such that proper treatment could effect a particular result is to be determined on the balance of probabilities and that one way of describing that balance is to say that there was at that time a sufficient chance that the particular result could be attained to justify holding that the loss of that result was caused by the absence of proper treatment. On the other hand, Lord Guthrie makes it clear that, in his opinion, while the fault could be charged against the doctor as being failure to give the child the opportunity of having an eye preserved by proper treatment, unless the eye would have been saved by such treatment no loss would have been established and no claim for damages justified in respect thereof.

G After the proof, Lord Strachan in a decision, which is unreported, of 9 April 1954 held that the defender had established that the boy's eye was irreparably injured on 15 March 1951 and that no treatment could have made any difference because the initial injury involved a perforating wound of the sclera with consequent haemorrhaging into the interior of the eye.

H In my opinion, it is perfectly correct to apply the same approach in the present case: what was the plaintiff's condition on being first presented at the hospital? Did he have intact sufficient blood vessels to keep the affected epiphysis alive? The judge had evidence from the authority's expert which amounted to an assertion that the probability was 100 per cent. that the fall had not left intact sufficient vessels to keep the epiphysis alive while he had evidence from Mr. Bucknill, for the plaintiff, which although not entirely consistently suggested that the probability was perhaps between 40 and 60 per cent., say 50 per cent.,

that sufficient vessels were left intact to keep the epiphysis alive. The concluding sentence in the judge's fourth finding in fact makes it plain, in my opinion, that he took the view, weighing that testimony along with all the other matters before him, that it was more probable than not that insufficient vessels had been left intact by the fall to maintain an adequate blood supply to the epiphysis and he expressed this balance by saying that it was 75 per cent. to 25 per cent., a result reached perhaps as Mr. Williams suggested by going for a figure midway between the competing estimates given by the parties' experts in evidence. Although various statistics were given in evidence, I do not read any of them as dealing with the particular probability which the judge assessed at 75 per cent. to 25 per cent. In the circumstances of this case the probable effect of delay in treatment was determined by the state of facts existing when the plaintiff was first presented to the hospital. It is not, in my opinion, correct to say that on arrival at the hospital he had a 25 per cent. chance of recovery. If insufficient blood vessels were left intact by the fall he had no prospect of avoiding complete avascular necrosis whereas if sufficient blood vessels were left intact on the judge's findings no further damage to the blood supply would have resulted if he had been given immediate treatment, and he would not have suffered the avascular necrosis.

As I have said, the fundamental question of fact to be answered in this case related to a point in time before the negligent failure to treat began. It must, therefore, be a matter of past fact. It did not raise any question of what might have been the situation in a hypothetical state of facts. To this problem the words of Lord Diplock in Mallett v. McMonagle [1970] A.C. 166, 176 apply:

"In determining what did happen in the past a court decides on the balance of probabilities. Anything that is more probable than not it treats as certain."

In this respect this case is the same, in principle, as any other in which the state of facts existing before alleged negligence came into play has to be determined. For example, if a claimant alleges that he sustained a certain fracture in a fall at work and there is evidence that he had indeed fallen at work, but that shortly before he had fallen at home and sustained the fracture, the court would have to determine where the truth lay. If the claimant denied the previous fall, there would be evidence, both for and against the allegation, that he had so fallen. The issue would be resolved on the balance of probabilities. If the court held on that balance that the fracture was sustained at home, there could be no question of saying that since all that had been established was that it was more probable than not that the injury was not work-related, there was a possibility that it was work-related and that this possibility or chance was a proper subject of compensation.

I should add in this context that where on disputed evidence a judge reaches a conclusion on the balance of probabilities it will not usually be easy to assess a specific measure of probability for the conclusion at which he has arrived. As my noble and learned friend Lord Bridge of Harwich observed in the course of the hearing, a judge deciding disputed questions of fact will not ordinarily do it by use of a calculator.

On the other hand, I consider that it would be unwise in the present case to lay it down as a rule that a plaintiff could never succeed by proving loss of a chance in a medical negligence case. In McGhee v.

3 W.L.R.

Hotson v. East Berkshire H.A. (H.L.(E.))

Lord Mackay
of Clashfern

A National Coal Board [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1 this House held that where it was proved that the failure to provide washing facilities for the pursuer at the end of his shift had materially increased the risk that he would contract dermatitis it was proper to hold that the failure to provide such facilities was a cause to a material extent of his contracting dermatitis and thus entitled him to damages from his employers for their negligent failure measured by his loss resulting from dermatitis. Material increase

B of the risk of contraction of dermatitis is equivalent to material decrease in the chance of escaping dermatitis. Although no precise figures could be given in that case for the purpose of illustration and comparison with this case one might, for example, say that it was established that of 100 people working under the same conditions as the pursuer and without facilities for washing at the end of their shift 70 contracted dermatitis: of

C 100 people working in the same conditions as the pursuer when washing facilities were provided for them at the end of the shift 30 contracted dermatitis. Assuming nothing more were known about the matter than that, the decision of this House may be taken as holding that in the circumstances of that case it was reasonable to infer that there was a relationship between contraction of dermatitis in these conditions and the absence of washing facilities and therefore it was reasonable to hold

D that absence of washing facilities was likely to have made a material contribution to the causation of the dermatitis. Although neither party in the present appeal placed particular reliance on the decision in McGhee since it was recognised that McGhee is far removed on its facts from the circumstances of the present appeal your Lordships were also informed that cases are likely soon to come before the House in which

E the decision in McGhee will be subjected to close analysis. Obviously in approaching the matter on the basis adopted in McGhee much will depend on what is known of the reasons for the differences in the figures which I have used to illustrate the position. In these circumstances I think it unwise to do more than say that unless and until this House departs from the decision in McGhee your Lordships cannot affirm the proposition that in no circumstances can evidence of loss of a chance

F resulting from the breach of a duty of care found a successful claim of damages, although there was no suggestion that the House regarded such a chance as an asset in any sense.

By agreement of the parties we were supplied with a list of American authorities relevant to the questions arising in this appeal, although they were not examined in detail. Of the cases referred to, the one that I

G have found most interesting and instructive is Herskovits v. Group Health Cooperative of Puget Sound (1983) 664 P.2d 474, a decision of the Supreme Court of Washington en banc. In this case the claim arose in respect of Mr. Herskovits' death. He was seen at Group Health Hospital at a time when he was suffering from a tumour but this was not diagnosed on first examination. The medical evidence available suggested that at that stage, assuming the tumour was a stage 1 tumour, the

H chance of survival for more than five years was 39 per cent. When he was treated later the tumour was a stage 2 tumour and the chance of surviving more than five years was 25 per cent. The defendant moved for summary judgment on the basis that, taking the most favourable view of the evidence that was possible, the case could not succeed. The Superior Court of King County granted the motion. This decision was reversed by a majority on appeal to the Supreme Court. The first judgment for the majority in the Supreme Court was delivered by Dore

J. Early in his judgment he read from section 323 of the American Restatement, Second, Torts, vol. 2 (1965), which is in these terms:

“One who undertakes, gratuitously or for consideration, to render services to another which he should recognise as necessary for the protection of the other’s person or things, is subject to liability to the other for physical harm resulting from his failure to exercise reasonable care to perform his undertaking, if (a) his failure to exercise such care increases the risk of such harm . . .”

After noting that the Supreme Court of Washington had not faced the issue of whether, under this paragraph, proof that the defendant’s conduct had increased the risk of death by decreasing the chances of survival was sufficient to take the issue of proximate cause to the jury he said, at p. 476:

“Some courts in other jurisdictions have allowed the proximate cause issue to go to the jury on this type of proof. . . These courts emphasised the fact that defendants’ conduct deprived the decedents of a ‘significant’ chance to survive or recover, rather than requiring proof that with absolute certainty the defendants’ conduct caused the physical injury. The underlying reason is that it is not for the wrongdoer, who put the possibility of recovery beyond realisation, to say afterward that the result was inevitable Other jurisdictions have rejected this approach, generally holding that unless the plaintiff is able to show that it was more likely than not that the harm was caused by the defendant’s negligence, proof of a decreased chance of survival is not enough to take the proximate cause question to the jury. . . . These courts have concluded that the defendant should not be liable where the decedent more than likely would have died anyway.”

To the question whether the plaintiff should be allowed, in the case before him, to proceed to a jury he returned an affirmative answer; and gave as the reason, at p. 477:

“To decide otherwise would be a blanket release from liability for doctors and hospitals any time there was less than a 50 per cent. chance of survival, regardless of how flagrant the negligence.”

In support of this reasoning he referred to Hamil v. Bashline (1978) 481 Pa. 256; 392 A.2d 1280, a decision of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court, and said:

“The Hamil court distinguished the facts of that case from the general tort case in which a plaintiff alleges that a defendant’s act or omission set in motion a force which resulted in harm. In the typical tort case, the ‘but for’ test, requiring proof that damages or death probably would not have occurred ‘but for’ the negligent conduct of the defendant, is appropriate. In Hamil and the instant case, however, the defendant’s act or omission failed in a duty to protect against harm from another source. Thus, as the Hamil court noted, the fact finder is put in the position of having to consider not only what did occur, but also what might have occurred.”

He goes on to quote from Hamil, 481 Pa. 256, 271; 392 A.2d 1280, 1287–1288:

“‘Such cases by their very nature elude the degree of certainty one would prefer and upon which the law normally insists before a

A person may be held liable. Nevertheless, in order that an actor is not completely insulated because of uncertainties as to the consequence of his negligent conduct, section 323(a) [of the Restatement, Second, Torts] tacitly acknowledges this difficulty and permits the issue to go to the jury upon a less than normal threshold of proof.”

B He goes on, at pp. 477–478, to refer to another decision, namely Hicks v. United States (1966) 368 F.2d 626, as containing a succinct statement of the relevant doctrine, at p. 632, and quotes:

C “‘Rarely is it possible to demonstrate to an absolute certainty what would have happened in circumstances that the wrongdoer did not allow to come to pass. The law does not in the existing circumstances require the plaintiff to show to a certainty that the patient would have lived had she been hospitalised and operated on promptly.’”

He refers also to a general observation in the Supreme Court of the United States dealing with a contention similar to that argued before him by the doctors and the hospital. In Lavender v. Kurn (1946) 327 U.S. 645, 653 the Supreme Court said:

D “It is no answer to say that the jury’s verdict involved speculation and conjecture. Whenever facts are in dispute or the evidence is such that fair-minded men may draw different inferences, a measure of speculation and conjecture is required on the part of those whose duty it is to settle the dispute by choosing what seems to them to be the most reasonable inference.”

E He therefore concluded, at p. 479, that the evidence available which showed at maximum a reduction in the 39 per cent. chance of five years’ survival to a 25 per cent. chance of five years’ survival was sufficient to allow the case to go to the jury on the basis that the jury would be entitled to infer from that evidence that the delay in treatment was a proximate cause of the decedent’s death. He pointed out, however, that

F causing reduction of the opportunity to recover (also described as a loss of chance) by one’s negligence did not necessitate a total recovery against the negligent party for all damages caused by the victim’s death. He held that damages should be awarded to the injured party and his family based only on damages caused directly by premature death, such as lost earnings and additional medical expenses and the like.

G The approach of Dore J. bears some resemblance to the approach taken by some members of this House in McGhee v. National Coal Board [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1, and by Lord Guthrie in Kenyon v. Bell, 1953 S.C. 125. Brachtenbach J. dissented. He warned against the danger of using statistics as a basis on which to prove proximate cause and indicated that it was necessary at the minimum to produce evidence connecting the statistics to the facts of the case. He gave an interesting

H illustration of a town in which there were only two cab companies, one with three blue cabs and the other with one yellow cab. If a person was knocked down by a cab whose colour had not been observed it would be wrong to suggest that there was a 75 per cent. chance that the victim was run down by a blue cab and that accordingly it was more probable than not that the cab that ran him down was blue and therefore that the company running the blue cabs would be responsible for negligence in the running down. He pointed out that before any inference that it was a blue cab would be appropriate further facts would be required as, for example, that a blue cab had been seen in the immediate vicinity at the time of the accident or that a blue cab had been found with a large dent in the very part of the cab which had struck the victim. He concluded that the evidence available was not sufficient to justify the case going to the jury and noted, at p. 491:

"The apparent harshness of this conclusion cannot be overlooked. The combination of the loss of a loved one to cancer and a doctor's negligence in diagnosis seems to compel a finding of liability. Nonetheless, justice must be dealt with an even hand. To hold a defendant liable without proof that his actions caused plaintiff harm would open up untold abuses of the litigation system."

Pearson J. agreed that the appeal should be allowed but did not agree with the reasoning by which that result was supported by Dore J. Pearson J., after examining the authorities and an academic article, stated that he was persuaded that a middle course between the reasoning of Dore J. and Brachtenbach J. was correct and concluded, at p. 487: "that the best resolution of the issue before us is to recognise the loss of a less than even chance as an actionable injury." He recognised that this also required that the damage payable be determined by the application of that chance expressed as a percentage to the damages that would be payable on establishing full liability.

I have selected references to the view expressed by the judges who took part in this decision to illustrate the variety of views open in this difficult area of the law. These confirm me in the view that it would not be right in the present case to affirm the general proposition for which Mr. Whitfield contended. On the other hand, none of the views canvassed in Herskovits' case, 644 P.2d 474 would lead to the plaintiff succeeding in the present case since the judge's findings in fact mean that the sole cause of the plaintiff's avascular necrosis was the injury he sustained in the original fall, and that implies, as I have said, that when he arrived at the authority's hospital for the first time he had no chance of avoiding it. Accordingly, the subsequent negligence of the authority did not cause him the loss of such a chance.

I have the impression from reading the judgments of the Court of Appeal that this aspect of the facts in the present case may not have been in the forefront of the discussion there. Much of the judgment of the Court of Appeal will remain for consideration in the future.

LORD ACKNER. My Lords, this appeal, as Mr. Graeme Williams for the respondent (the plaintiff in the action) submitted, raises a short point of classification. Adopting, although somewhat adapting, the words of Dillon L.J. [1978] 2 W.L.R. 287, 298, in his short judgment the fundamental question is "What does the law regard as the damage which the plaintiff has suffered? Was it the onset of avascular necrosis or was it the loss of the chance of avoiding that condition?"

The claim, as pleaded, is a simple one for damages for personal injuries suffered as a result of negligent treatment. Paragraph 9 of the amended statement of claim alleges:

"The plaintiff now suffers from a permanent deformity of the left hip and a loss of movement therein and wasting of the left leg with a resultant limp, none of which injuries the plaintiff would have

3 W.L.R.

Hotson v. East Berkshire H.A. (H.L.(E.))

Lord Ackner

A suffered save for the aforesaid negligence of the defendants which is hereinafter set out."

To establish his cause of action, the plaintiff had to prove that the defendants (the appellants) were under the duty alleged, that they broke that duty and that as a result of that breach of duty he suffered the injuries alleged. It is, of course, axiomatic that the facts upon which liability is based must be proved on the balance of probabilities.

It is common ground that the defendants, in breach of their duty, failed to treat the plaintiff for five days and that as a consequence of that breach of duty he suffered pain during that period for which he was properly compensated by the award made by the trial judge of £150. The permanent deformity of the hip and other injuries described in the statement of claim were in an entirely separate and unrelated category and were due to the avascular necrosis of the left femoral epiphysis.

The judge explained most helpfully the mechanism by which the avascular necrosis with the resultant distortion and collapse of the epiphysis can occur [1985] 1 W.L.R. 1036, 1038-1039:

"The femoral epiphysis (the epiphysis as I shall refer to it henceforth) is the spongy extremity of the upper femur, its surface being covered with cartilage, which slots into the cavity of the acetabulum to form the hip joint. In a child the epiphysis is connected to the neck of the femur by an epiphysial plate (sometimes called a growth plate) which is essentially a sandwich filling of cartilage between, on the upper side, the epiphysis and on the lower side the bony femoral neck. The plate exists only in a growing skeleton and indeed it enables the bone to grow; in maturity it forms bone across the gap. The major threat created by an injury such as the plaintiff's is that it will so interfere with the blood supply to the epiphysis that avascular necrosis will develop. This is a condition whereby through lack of sufficient blood the epiphysis becomes de-mineralised, weakened and softened and thus denser, distorted and deformed. When that occurs, not only does it cause misshapeness of the joint with associated pain, restriction in mobility and general disability, but it also carries with it the virtual certainty that osteoarthritis will develop within the joint."

At the trial it was contended on the plaintiff's behalf, thereby departing from paragraph 9 of the amended statement of claim, to which I have already made reference, that the defendants' failure to diagnose and treat the injury immediately when he first attended hospital rather than when he returned five days later substantially increased the risk that avascular necrosis would develop and thus give rise to the long-term disability which resulted. The defendants contended, relying upon the expert evidence of their surgeon Mr. Bonney, that the initial injury when the plaintiff fell and thereby sustained the fracture separation of the left femoral epiphysis, was so severe that the avascular necrosis of the epiphysis was, thereafter and in any event, inevitable. It was thus argued that the delay would not have increased the risk of avascular necrosis.

The vital issue of fact which the judge had to determine was whether or not the fall left intact sufficient blood vessels to keep the epiphysis alive. If it did not, then the subsequent failure to diagnose and treat the injuries for a period of five days could not be responsible for the avascular necrosis. The judge, again most helpfully, gave a simple and short explanation of the system of blood supply to the epiphysis and the likely effect upon that supply of the injury sustained by the plaintiff when he fell. He said, at p. 1041:

“There are in a child three sets of blood vessels to the epiphysis: those running along the back of the femoral neck, those running along the front, and those which run through the round ligament. It was common ground between the experts (a) that the blood supply along the front of the femoral neck (some 20 per cent. of the total supply) would have been ruptured by the fall when the femoral shaft rotated; and (b) that the supply through the round ligament (something less than 30 per cent. of the total) would not have been ruptured.”

Thus the essential question to determine was—what was the effect of the fall upon the remaining 50 per cent. of the blood supply which was to be found in the blood vessels running along the back of the femoral neck? Mr. Bonney took the view that these blood vessels must have been ruptured by the fall. The plaintiff’s surgeon, Mr. Bucknill, disagreed, contending that the effect of the fall was to rotate the femur externally so as to lessen the tension upon the rear vessels. He could see no good reason to conclude that these would have been severed.

The judge was unable to accept either of the competing extreme views. His conclusions were, at pp. 1040–1041:

“(1) Even had the health authority correctly diagnosed and treated the plaintiff on 26 April there is a high probability, which I assess as a 75 per cent. risk, that the plaintiff’s injury would have followed the same course as it in fact has, that is, he would have developed avascular necrosis of the whole femoral head with all the same adverse consequences as have already ensued and with all the same adverse future prospects. . . . (4) The reason why the delay sealed the plaintiff’s fate was because it allowed the pressure caused by haemarthrosis—the bleeding of ruptured blood vessels into the joint—to compress and thus block the intact but distorted remaining vessels with the result that even had the fall left intact sufficient vessels to keep the epiphysis alive (which, as finding (1) makes plain, I think possible but improbable) such vessels would have become occluded and ineffective for this purpose.” (Emphasis added.)

The judge was thus making clear that he accepted Mr. Bonney’s opinion to this extent, viz. that the blood vessels running along the back of the femoral neck containing approximately one-half of the total blood supply must have been, on the balance of probabilities, ruptured by the fall.

He thus found that immediately after the fall, that is before admission to hospital and therefore before the duty was imposed upon the defendants properly to diagnose and treat, the epiphysis was doomed. Accordingly the judge had determined as a matter of fact, on the balance of probabilities, that the compression and blocking of the blood vessels had had no effect on the plaintiff’s ultimate condition. In determining what happened in the past the court decides on the balance of probabilities. Anything that is more probable than not is treated as certainty: Mallet v. McMonagle [1970] A.C. 166, 176, per Lord Diplock.

3 W.L.R.

Hotson v. East Berkshire H.A. (H.L.(E.))

Lord Ackner

A In the result the judge had by his clear findings decided that the negligence of the defendants in failing to diagnose and treat for a period of five days had not caused the deformed left hip. The judge, in agreement with the submission made to your Lordships by counsel for the defendants, said in terms that in the end the problem came down to one of classification [1985] 1 W.L.R. 1036, 1043–1044:

B “Is this on true analysis a case where the plaintiff is concerned to establish causative negligence or is it rather a case where the real question is the proper quantum of damage?”

The judge thought, at p. 1044, that the case “hovers near the border.” To my mind, the first issue which the judge had to determine was an issue of causation—did the breach of duty cause the damage alleged. If it did not, as the judge so held, then no question of quantifying damage arises. The debate on the loss of a chance cannot arise where there has been a positive finding that before the duty arose the damage complained of had already been sustained or had become inevitable.

C Kitchen v. Royal Air Force Association [1958] 1 W.L.R. 563 has no relevance to this appeal. In that case there was an undoubted breach of contract which caused the plaintiff to suffer more than nominal damages. By reason of the solicitor’s negligence, she had lost a worthwhile action. What the court there had to do was to value that action. It is, of course, obvious that it is not only actions that are bound to succeed that have a value. Every action with a prospect of success has a value and it is a familiar task for the court to assess that value where negligence has prevented such an action being brought. Again, Chaplin v. Hicks [1911] 2 K.B. 786, strongly relied upon by the plaintiff, provides no assistance. In that case a young lady actress-to-be had made a contract with the defendant under which she had an opportunity of appearing in a competition in which, if successful, she would have obtained a remunerative engagement as an actress. In the words of Fletcher Moulton L.J., at p. 797:

F “The contract gave the plaintiff a right of considerable value, one for which many people would give money; therefore to hold that the plaintiff was entitled to no damages for being deprived of such a right because the final result depended on a contingency or chance would have been a misdirection.”

G In a sentence, the plaintiff was not entitled to any damages in respect of the deformed hip because the judge had decided that this was not caused by the admitted breach by the defendants of their duty of care but was caused by the separation of the left femoral epiphysis when he fell some 12 feet from a rope on which he had been swinging.

H On this simple basis I would allow this appeal. I have sought to stress that this case was a relatively simple case concerned with the proof of causation, upon which the plaintiff failed, because he was unable to prove, on the balance of probabilities, that his deformed hip was caused by the defendants’ breach of duty in delaying over a period of five days a proper diagnosis and treatment. Where causation is in issue, the judge decides that issue on the balance of the probabilities. Unless there is some special situation, e.g. joint defendants where the apportionment of liability between them is required, there is no point or purpose in expressing in percentage terms the certainty or near certainty which the plaintiff has achieved in establishing his cause of action.

Once liability is established, on the balance of probabilities, the loss which the plaintiff has sustained is payable in full. It is not discounted by reducing his claim by the extent to which he has failed to prove his case with 100 per cent. certainty. The decision by Simon Brown J. in the subsequent case of Bagley v. North Herts Health Authority, reported only in (1986) 136 N.L.J. 1014, in which he discounted an award for a stillbirth, because there was a five per cent. risk that the plaintiff would have had a stillborn child even if the hospital had not been negligent, was clearly wrong. In that case, the plaintiff had established on a balance of probabilities, indeed with near certainty, that the hospital's negligence had caused the stillbirth. Causation was thus fully established. Such a finding does not permit any discounting—to do so would be to propound a wholly new doctrine which has no support in principle or authority and would give rise to many complications in the search for mathematical or statistical exactitude.

Of course, where the cause of action has been established, the assessment of that part of the plaintiff's loss where the future is uncertain involves the evaluation of that uncertainty. In Bagley, if the child had, by reason of the hospital's breach of duty, been born with brain injury, which could lead in later life to epilepsy, then it would have been a classic case for the evaluation, inter alia, of the chance of epilepsy occurring and discounting, to the extent that the chance of that happening fell below 100 per cent., what would have been the sum of damages appropriate if epilepsy was a certain consequence.

I would accordingly allow the appeal by reducing the damages awarded to the plaintiff by £11,500, being the amount awarded by the trial judge for the "lost chance of recovery," together with the amount of any interest on that sum which is included in the award.

LORD GOFF OF CHIEVELEY. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speeches prepared by my noble and learned friends Lord Bridge of Harwich, Lord Mackay of Clashfern and Lord Ackner. For the reasons they give, I too would allow the appeal.

The plaintiff was crossing a pelican crossing showing green in the traffic's favour when he was struck by a car driven by the first defendant. He was thrown up on the bonnet and into contact with the windscreen which shattered and propelled onto the road where he was struck by another car driven by the second defendant. The plaintiff sustained multiple injuries and in particular a fracture dislocation of the cervical spine which resulted in tetraplegia. The plaintiff brought an action in negligence against both defendants. At the trial expert medical evidence established four possible causes of the tetraplegia, namely, the initial impact with the first defendant's car, impact with the windscreen, impact with the ground and impact with the second defendant's car. The judge concluded that although it was probable that the first impact did not cause the spinal injury there was an equal probability that each of the three subsequent impacts could have been the cause, and that, therefore, each of the defendants must bear the responsibility for the plaintiff's tetraplegia. The judge held that all three parties had been negligent and that since it was impossible to say that one of the parties was more or less to blame than the other the responsibility should be borne equally by all three. On that basis he ordered judgment to be entered against both defendants for two thirds of the plaintiff's damages which he assessed at a total of £596,553.67. The judge included in the damages awarded the sums of £20,580 and £24,500 being respectively the costs of alterations to the plaintiff's parents house and the costs of alterations to the house which the plaintiff intended to purchase. The defendants had contended that the plaintiff was not entitled to both sums.

On appeal by both defendants:—

Held, (1) dismissing the appeal on causation, that although the plaintiff had failed to prove affirmatively on a balance of probabilities that the second defendant had caused or materially contributed to his tetraplegia, nevertheless, since it had been proved that the second defendant owed a duty of care to the plaintiff and that his negligent driving had created a risk of injury capable of causing tetraplegia the second defendant was equally liable with the first defendant for the plaintiff's injury (post, pp. 260A–D, 262E–H, 272A–H).

(2) Dismissing the appeal on quantum, that since the defendants had denied liability the plaintiff was not in a position to decide firmly whether or not he would purchase a house; that it would be unreasonable to expect the plaintiff to live in discomfort in his parents' house pending the decision at the trial, and that, in the circumstances, the plaintiff was entitled to the costs of alterations to both houses (post, pp. 260E-H, 262H, 274B-E).

(3) Allowing the appeal on apportionment, that since the evidence indicated that each of the three parties was equally to blame for the plaintiff's injuries judgment should be entered for the plaintiff against each defendant for 50 per cent. of the plaintiff's claim and an order for contribution between both defendants on a fifty-fifty basis (post, pp. 256C-F, 257B-C, 262H, 275E-276A).

APPEAL from Sir Douglas Frank Q.C. sitting as a deputy judge of the Queen's Bench Division.

By writ dated 5 September 1984 the plaintiff, Simon Peter Fitzgerald, claimed damages from the first defendant, Vernon Lane, and the second defendant, Prafulbhai Jayantibhai Patel, for personal injuries and

Fitzgerald v. Lane (C.A.)

A consequential loss arising out of the defendants' negligent driving on 21 March 1983. By his defence dated 9 October 1984 the first defendant denied negligence. By his defence dated 2 October 1984 the second defendant also denied negligence.

B On 9 July 1986 the judge held that all three parties had been negligent and that since it was impossible to say that one of the parties was more to blame than the other the responsibility should be borne equally by all three. On the basis of that finding he ordered judgment to be entered against both defendants for two thirds of the plaintiff's damages which he assessed at a total of £596,553.67.

By notices of appeal dated 24 July 1986 the defendants appealed on the grounds of causation, the judge's findings of negligence, quantum and apportionment.

C Second defendant's notice of appeal.

(A) Causation

D (1) The judge erred in finding that the plaintiff's injuries were caused by the collision between the plaintiff and the second defendant's motor car. (2) The judge having found that the probabilities as to the cause of the plaintiff's tetraplegia were equal between three of the possible scenarios namely (a) impact between the plaintiff's head and the windscreen of the first defendant's motor car (b) the plaintiff striking the road surface when thrown from the first defendant's car after impact therewith and (c) the second defendant's motor car striking the plaintiff, he should have found that the plaintiff had failed to prove causation against the second defendant. There was no dispute that in whichever scenario the plaintiff had been rendered tetraplegic the impact with the first defendant's motor car was in law causative thereof. (3) The judge failed to advise himself of the evidence that the plaintiff showed no signs of voluntary movement after the first impact. That made it probable that the plaintiff had been rendered tetraplegic by the first impact (by whatever mechanism) or that his head had struck the windscreen of the first defendant's car so hard as to render him unconscious (and probably breaking his neck at the same time—scenario (b) above) or both. The judge ought to have inferred that the impact with the second defendant's car was not a probable cause and/or was an improbable explanation of the tetraplegia. (4) The judge having reminded himself of the particular (and peculiar) position in which the plaintiff's body would have had to be if the impact with the second defendant's motor car were to break the plaintiff's neck failed to remind himself that the evidence was that his body was not in such position when struck. (5) The judge was in error in inferring that the plaintiff's impact with the second defendant's motor car was violent. He drew that inference from the extent of the damage to the second defendant's car and in particular to the bumper and number plate when there was no such evidence, and from the distance the plaintiff's body travelled after the impact when the judge's earlier finding of fact had been that the impact took place where the plaintiff's body was found i.e. his body did not travel any distance after impact nor did the second defendant's car run over the same. (6) The judge erred in advising himself that the principle as set out in McGhee v. National Coal Board [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1 was applicable to the facts of the present case and that it obliged him to hold the second defendant liable.

(B) Negligence of the second defendant

(7) The judge erred in his finding that the second defendant was driving too fast. That finding was in conflict with his earlier finding of fact that the second defendant was driving at 25 miles per hour and with the evidence that he was driving at 15 to 20 miles per hour. (8) The judge erred in finding that additionally or alternatively the second defendant was not keeping a proper look out. This finding was in conflict with the judge's earlier finding of fact that the second defendant had seen the plaintiff leave the pavement although that finding was in turn incompatible with the judge's further finding that the second defendant was talking to his passenger at the time and had his attention distracted. The latter finding was based on the evidence of Mrs. Milne who as the judge found was 100 yards away from the crossing (and even more from the second defendant's car) and who admitted that she was in the nearside of the south bound traffic and did not see the second defendant's car until impact. (9) If the judge inferred that had the plaintiff not been struck by the first defendant's car but had proceeded across the crossing he would have been struck by the second defendant's motor car (on which hypotheses the judge appears to have found the second defendant to have been negligent) he was in error in inferring the same. The braking in fact applied by the second defendant brought his car to a halt before it reached the point at which the collision hypothesised by the judge would have occurred. (10) The judge erred in holding that the second defendant should have stopped sooner and or applied his brakes harder than he did. The judge ought to have directed himself that he was under no duty to the plaintiff to do so unless (which was not suggested) he ought to have foreseen that the plaintiff would be hurled towards him at 30 miles per hour by the force of impact with the first defendant's motor car.

(C) Apportionment

(11) The judge erred in finding that the plaintiff, the first defendant and the second defendant should bear equal responsibility for the plaintiff's injuries. (12) The judge having found that the plaintiff was hurrying across the pedestrian crossing when the lights were red against him and green in favour of vehicular traffic ought to have found that his negligence was the precipitating, predominant and most blameworthy cause of his injuries. (13) The judge erred in failing to hold that any fault on the part of the second defendant (if causative of the plaintiff's injuries at all) was less than the fault of the first defendant and far less than the fault of the plaintiff.

(D) Quantum

(14) The judge found that the plaintiff was entitled to recover £20,580 as the cost of the conversion of his parents' house (which had just been carried out), and £24,500 as the immediate cost of converting another house. It is submitted that the judge ought (a) to have found it reasonable for the plaintiff to wait for the cheaper option of an estate development during which a bungalow could be purchased and modifications incorporated (b) to have made allowance for accelerated receipt (c) to have made some allowance for the value of the work done to the plaintiff's parents' house or (d) to have disallowed wholly or in part one of the sets of costs of conversion.

3 W.L.R.

Fitzgerald v. Lane (C.A.)

A The first defendant's notice of appeal(A) Negligence of the first defendant

(1) The judge erred in his finding that the first defendant was driving too fast. The judge found as a fact that the first defendant was driving at 30 miles per hour. Such a finding of fact was erroneously based upon the hypothetical evidence of a consulting engineer in preference to the eye-witness evidence. (2) The judge erred in his finding that the first defendant probably could have seen the plaintiff before and after he entered the crossing. Such finding of fact was erroneously based upon a false comparison of the positions and views of the pelican crossing of the first defendant and another witness.

(B) Apportionment

(3) The judge erred in finding that the plaintiff, the first defendant and the second defendant should bear equal responsibility for the plaintiff's injuries. (4) The judge erred in failing to give any reasoned judgment evaluating the degree of blame to be apportioned to each of the parties causative of the plaintiff's injuries. (5) The judge having found that the plaintiff was walking fast across the pelican crossing when the lights were red against him and green in favour of traffic, ought to have found that his negligence was the primary and most blameworthy cause of his injuries. (6) The judge having found as fact that the second defendant (i) was travelling at 25 miles per hour when he saw the plaintiff leaving the pavement (ii) on his own admission he could have stopped earlier (iii) probably was talking to his passenger at the time and thereby had his attention distracted ought to have found that the second defendant was more to blame for causing the plaintiff's injuries than the first defendant was.

(C) Quantum

(7) The judge having found as fact that the plaintiff had expended £20,580.00 to convert his parents' house to his needs and that £24,500.00 would be the immediate cost of converting another house to his needs, ought to have found that (a) the plaintiff could reasonably stay at his parents' converted house until the cheaper option of a purpose-built bungalow upon an estate development became available to him (b) an allowance ought to be made for accelerated receipt (c) an allowance ought to be made for the element of betterment to the plaintiff's parents' house occasioned by the conversion (d) the plaintiff did not reasonably need to convert two properties to his needs or should at least give credit for such part of the benefit of the conversion of his parents' house as would become "unused" by virtue of his move to another converted house. Such credit ought to be given in the proportion of the amount of time (and use) he occupied his parents' converted house in relation to his maximum life expectancy of 30 years.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Sir Edward Eveleigh.

Dermod O'Brien Q.C. and Henry de Lotbiniere for the second defendant.

William Gage Q.C. and Simon S. Brown for the first defendant.

Robin Stewart Q.C. and Kieran May for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

6 March. The following judgments were handed down.

SIR EDWARD EVILLIGH. The carriageway of Esher High Street is 30 feet wide. It runs approximately north and south. On the afternoon of 21 March 1983 the traffic was busy. There were two lanes of traffic moving south. The nearside lane had been travelling slowly and a car had stopped just before the studs of a pelican crossing. There was a line of traffic behind it and there were other stationary vehicles facing south in a line beginning at the other side of the crossing. A second line of traffic moving south was travelling fairly freely with the lights of the pelican crossing showing green in its favour. The plaintiff, a young man of 22 years of age and 6 feet tall, walked briskly on to the crossing and crossed the road close to the studs on the north side. When he reached the centre of the road he was struck by the offside front corner of a Morris 1100 driven by the first defendant from north to south. He was thrown up on to the bonnet and into contact with the windscreen which shattered and then he was propelled forward and on to the offside of the road where he was struck by a Ford Cortina driven by the second defendant in the opposite direction. The plaintiff sustained multiple injuries and in particular injury to the neck which resulted in partial tetraplegia.

Sir Douglas Frank Q.C., sitting as a deputy judge of the Queen's Bench Division, found that all three parties had been negligent. He assessed the total award of damages at the sum of £596,553.67. He held that both drivers were responsible for the plaintiff's tetraplegia. He then said:

"As to the apportionment of the liability, on the facts I have recited I find that it is impossible to say that one of the parties is more or less to blame than the other and hold that the responsibility should be borne equally by all three."

On the basis of that finding he ordered judgment to be entered for the plaintiff against both defendants for two-thirds of the plaintiff's damages.

Both defendants now appeal. Each says that the judge was wrong in holding him to have been negligent. Alternatively, each says that the other and the plaintiff should have been ordered to bear a greater share of the responsibility. The second defendant further contends that the judge was wrong in awarding a sum of money in respect of the expense of conversions to the house of the plaintiff's parents as well as a sum for him to carry out conversions on a house which he wishes to buy.

The first defendant's evidence is well summarised in the judgment:

"He was driving a Morris 1100 in the offside lane which was clear of traffic whereas the nearside lane was filled with traffic bumper-to-tail. He said that his speed approaching the crossing was 15 to 20 miles per hour, that he drove over the crossing and afterwards saw a blur of a person in a running stance looking straight ahead. The plaintiff impacted himself on the nearside of the wheel arch and then smashed the windscreen. He said that he immediately braked and stopped 20 to 30 feet from the crossing. He was certain that the collision did not take place on the crossing but some 20 feet beyond it. On the contrary, approaching the crossing he took a precautionary glimpse to the left and saw cars on the crossing. He had not seen the plaintiff before the blur appeared because the cars on the nearside lane blocked his view."

3 W.L.R.

Fitzgerald v. Lane (C.A.)

Sir Edward Eveleigh

A The judge concluded that the first defendant's car was travelling at about 30 miles per hour. In my opinion, this conclusion was supported by the evidence. There is no doubt that the collision occurred on the crossing and that the point of contact with the first defendant's car was the offside headlamp and wing, which had been damaged. A Mr. Greenaway, following behind the first defendant, saw the plaintiff walking briskly across the nearside pavement towards the crossing, although he did not see him on the crossing. The evidence of the first defendant, which was clearly wrong as to the point of impact with his car and the position of the plaintiff in the road, is a strong indication that he knew little or nothing about it until the moment of impact, or the smallest fraction of a second before, and yet the plaintiff had almost reached the centre of the road. The judge was fully entitled to conclude that the first defendant was negligent. He was not keeping a proper look-out and, in my opinion, was travelling at an excessive speed, bearing in mind the situation that existed on his nearside.

C At first sight, I thought that to find the second defendant negligent was requiring a much too heavy standard of skill and care from him. If the collision between the second defendant's car and the plaintiff occurred at the distance from the crossing where the plaintiff's body was found, the time between the first and second collision with the vehicles would be less than a second. However, the evidence in the case, and particularly that of the second defendant himself, provides us with further material in which to assess his conduct.

D The second defendant said that he saw the plaintiff on the pavement and saw him rush across the road. At one point in his evidence he said that he braked gently when the plaintiff started to cross, but he had also said that he braked when he saw the plaintiff bounce from the other car and made no reference to having slowed down before that. When cross-examined, he said that he could have stopped before he did. The judge came to the conclusion that the second defendant was on a collision course immediately the plaintiff left the pavement and yet the defendant carried on as though nothing unusual had happened, and then, when the plaintiff was struck by the first defendant's car, the second defendant did not brake sufficiently, or as effectively as he would have been able to do had he so controlled his car beforehand as to be ready to cope with an emergency. This, I think, is the effect of the judge's findings.

E There were a number of answers given in evidence by the second defendant which would entitle the judge to come to this conclusion. He saw the witness and clearly he did not accept the statement which he made at one point in his evidence, namely that he braked gently when he saw the plaintiff leave the pavement and braked "immediately" when he saw the collision with the first defendant's car. He did not accept the second defendant's evidence that he stopped one yard short of the crossing. The evidence of Mrs. Milne gave the overall impression that the second defendant could have stopped sooner than he did. The blow to the plaintiff must have been severe because not only was his body turned round in the road, but the bumper bar was dented and the number plate and valance damaged.

G H I confess that I have had difficulty in seeing where the second defendant was to blame, particularly as his claim that he braked gently when he first saw the plaintiff leave the pavement is, to some extent, supported by the evidence of Mrs. Milne when she says that he was travelling slowly. However, the judge heard all the witnesses and I am not prepared to substitute my own assessment of the manner in which the second defendant was driving for that carefully arrived at by the judge. That being so, I do not think that his decision should be reversed.

The plaintiff does not challenge the finding that he was guilty of contributory negligence. The judge dealt with the question of contributory negligence and contribution together. I repeat what he said:

"As to the apportionment of the liability, on the facts I have recited I find that it is impossible to say that one of the parties is more or less to blame than the other and hold that the responsibility should be borne equally by all three."

After assessing the damages, he said, "In view of my findings, one third of the amount of the award will be paid by each of the defendants." He then accepted the submission of counsel for the plaintiff that the order to give effect to his findings would be that judgment should be entered for the plaintiff against both defendants for two thirds of the plaintiff's claim.

The judge's finding indicates that he thought that each of the three parties was equally at fault. That being so, the correct form of judgment should be "judgment for the plaintiff for 50 per cent. of his claim against each defendant." There would then follow an order for contribution between the two defendants on a fifty-fifty basis. Subsection (1) of section 1 of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act 1945 reads:

"Where any person suffers damage as the result partly of his own fault and partly of the fault of any other person or persons, a claim in respect of that damage shall not be defeated by reason of the fault of the person suffering the damage, but the damages recoverable in respect thereof shall be reduced to such extent as the court thinks just and equitable having regard to the claimant's share in the responsibility for the damage: . . ."

In applying this subsection, I have always understood that the court should consider the position between the plaintiff and each defendant separately. In The Mafiores and The Abadesa [1967] 1 A.C. 826 Lord Pearce said, at p. 846:

"To get a fair apportionment it is necessary to weigh the fault of each negligent party against that of each of the others. It is, or may be, quite misleading to substitute for a measurement of the individual fault of each contributor to the accident a measurement of the fault of one against the joint fault of the rest."

The case was concerned with apportionment under section 1 of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911, but the observation of Lord Pearce, which I have quoted, related to the hypothetical facts of a factory accident case which he had postulated. Later, referring specifically to the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act 1945, section 1, he said, at p. 846:

"Its intention was to allow a plaintiff, though negligent, to recover damages reduced to such an extent as the court thinks just and equitable, having regard to his share in the responsibility for the damage (section 1(1)). But that share can only be estimated by weighing his fault against that of the defendant or, if there are two defendants, against that of each defendant. It is true that

3 W.L.R.

Fitzgerald v. Lane (C.A.)

Sir Edward Eveleigh

A apportionment as between the defendants comes theoretically at a later stage (under the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act 1935). But as a matter of practice the whole matter is decided at one time and the court weighs up the fault of each in assessing liability as between plaintiff and defendants themselves. And I see nothing in the Act of 1945 to show that it intends the court to treat the joint defendants as a unit whose joint blameworthiness could only, one presumes, be the aggregate blameworthiness of its differing components.”

C Let us assume that the first defendant had suffered injury from the flying glass of his windscreen and that he had counterclaimed against the plaintiff for damages. Would he, too, have been entitled to two-thirds of his damages against the plaintiff? The illogicality of two parties equally to blame being found liable for two-thirds of each others damages is too obvious. I would allow the appeal of each of the defendants in relation to the apportionment and order judgment for the plaintiff against each defendant for 50 per cent. of the plaintiff's claim and order contribution between the defendants on a fifty-fifty basis.

D I now deal with the question of causation. The tetraplegia resulted from a fracture dislocation of the cervical spine of a type most commonly caused by forward flexion of the head. Both doctors were examined with a view to establishing which of four stages of the accident was responsible for such a movement of the head. The doctors agreed that there were four possibilities, namely the initial impact, impact with the windscreen, impact with the ground and the impact with the second defendant's car. Evidence was given by Dr. Pallis on behalf of the plaintiff and by Dr. Hopkins on behalf of the second defendant. We have been taken through their evidence very carefully. Counsel for the first defendant sought to establish that the probability was that the final collision caused or contributed to the tetraplegia. Indeed, it was established that, if the head had been in contact with the bumper of the Cortina, which was denied, and if the body was closer to the ground, there could have been

E imparted a forward flexion to cause the injury. When Dr. Hopkins was asked his assessment of the probability of each of the four possibilities, he said that he placed 30 per cent. on each of the first three and only 10 per cent. on the last. However, he seemed to think that the last impact was less severe than the damage to the car would indicate, and the judge did not accept his assessment. At one point Dr. Pallis was persuaded to agree that the cause was the totality of the injuries, in the F sense that they had a cumulative effect. However, when asked to consider the matter again, he said:

G

“my conclusions were that the tetraplegia could have been caused by either collision or that both collisions could materially have contributed to the damage.”

H The judge carefully considered the medical evidence. He said:

“I am in no doubt that the impact of the plaintiff with the Cortina was violent. That seems an inescapable conclusion from the two facts, namely, the extent of the damage to the second defendant's car and, in particular, to the bumper and number plate and the distance the plaintiff's body travelled after the impact. My conclusion is that although I am satisfied that it is probable that the first collision did not cause the spinal injury there is an equal probability of the three subsequent impacts having been the cause, and, therefore, each of the defendants must bear the responsibility. The principle to be applied is not in doubt and was stated succinctly by Lord Wilberforce in McGhee v. National Coal Board [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1, 6 in these words: 'First, it is a sound principle that where a person has, by breach of a duty of care, created a risk, and injury occurs within the area of that risk, the loss should be borne by him unless he shows that it had some other cause.'

I think that the judge was saying that each of the three possibilities was equally probable and that he was unable to distinguish between them. After very careful consideration, I cannot treat him as meaning that all three combined to produce the injury by a cumulative effect.

I have considered whether it is possible for me to reach my own conclusion as to the probable cause of the injury, but I have concluded that I cannot. There are answers given by the doctors which, taken in isolation, might entitle one to reach a certain conclusion, but to do so would be to ignore the overall effect of the evidence. The judge expresses no preference for the evidence of either doctor, save that he clearly rejects Dr. Hopkins's assessment of the probabilities which I have referred to above. The reference to McGhee v. National Coal Board [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1 indicates to my mind that the judge was finding it impossible to distinguish between the three causes. It is also established on the evidence that the injury might have been caused by each of the impacts, with the last impact exacerbating the injury already suffered by the neck.

The plaintiff and the first defendant relied upon McGhee's case. The facts of that case were very different from the facts in this case. That case was concerned with the failure of an employer to alleviate a condition which was already a potential source of dermatitis. We are concerned to determine whether the impact with the second defendant's car caused or contributed to the tetraplegia by inflicting the causative blow to an uninjured neck, or by increasing the harmful consequences to an already injured neck. In McGhee's case [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1 Lord Salmon said, at pp. 12-13:

"In the circumstances of the present case, the possibility of a distinction existing between (a) having materially increased the risk of contracting the disease, and (b) having materially contributed to causing the disease may no doubt be a fruitful source of interesting academic discussions between students of philosophy. Such a distinction is, however, far too unreal to be recognised by the common law."

I appreciate that these words and similar expressions of opinion are more easily applied in considering the development of a disease than in relation to injuries sustained in a road accident which might be the result of one single blow. However, the principle enunciated in McGhee's case has been taken a step further in Wilsher v. Essex Area Health Authority [1987] 2 W.L.R. 425. In that case the plaintiff had been born prematurely, suffering from various illnesses, including oxygen deficiency. The plaintiff was negligently given excess oxygen in treatment designed to remedy the condition. He claimed damages for an incurable condition of the retina, resulting in near blindness, which, it was alleged, was caused or contributed to by the excess oxygen. However, excess oxygen

Sir Edward Eveleigh

A was merely one of several different factors, any one of which could have caused or contributed to the eye condition. Medical evidence was unable to single out the responsible factor. The majority of the Court of Appeal held that the defendants were liable. Mustill L.J. said, at pp. 459–460:

B “There is, however, one problem which must be tackled. I had at one time believed that the present case is on all fours with the McGhee case [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1 and that any apparent difference between the two simply stemmed from the way in which the problem happened to be expressed. I am now persuaded that this is not so, and that the two situations really are different. In the McGhee case there was only one risk operating, namely that contact of a sweaty skin with brick dust would lead to dermatitis. The fact that such contact did cause the injury was not in dispute. Just as in Bonnington Castings Ltd. v. Wardlaw [1956] A.C. 613 the defenders’ fault lay in not taking proper steps to reduce that single risk. The uncertainty was whether the fault had tipped the scale. In the present case there is a greater uncertainty. Instead of a single risk factor known to have caused the injury there is a list of factors, which cannot be fully enumerated in the current state of medical science, any one of which might have caused the injury. What the defendants did was not to enhance the risk that the known factor would lead to injury, but to add to the list of factors which might do so. I acknowledge that this is much further from the facts of Bonnington Castings Ltd. v. Wardlaw, which was the springboard for the McGhee case than were the facts of the McGhee case itself. The question is whether this makes a crucial difference. The root of the problem lies in the fact that, for reasons of policy, the House of Lords mitigated the rigour of the rule that the plaintiff must prove that the breach caused the loss, in the interests of achieving a result which was considered to be just. Given that this was a decision based on policy, rather than a chain of direct reasoning, the difficulty is to know whether a similar approach can properly be adopted in the different circumstances of the present case. After much hesitation I have come to the conclusion that it can. Reading all the speeches together, the principle applied by the House of Lords seems to me to amount to this. If it is an established fact that conduct of a particular kind creates a risk that injury will be caused to another or increases an existing risk that injury will ensue; and if the two parties stand in such a relationship that the one party owes a duty not to conduct himself in that way; and if the party does conduct himself in that way; and if the other party does suffer injury of the kind to which the risk related; then the first party is taken to have caused the injury by his breach of duty, even though the existence and extent of the contribution made by the breach cannot be ascertained. If this is the right analysis, it seems to me that the shape taken by the enhancement of the risk ought not to be of crucial significance. In the McGhee case [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1, the conduct of the employers made it more likely that the pursuer would contract dermatitis, and he did contract dermatitis. Here, the conduct of those for whom the defendants are liable made it more likely that Martin would contract RLF, and he did contract RLF. If considerations of justice demanded that the pursuer succeed in the one case, I can see no reason why the plaintiff should not succeed in the other.”

In the present case, when the plaintiff was struck by the second defendant's car, his neck might already have been injured to an unknown degree, or it might not have been previously injured. In the latter case the impact with the second defendant's car clearly caused the tetraplegia. If the neck was already injured, then on the evidence in the case as to the manner in which the plaintiff's body came into contact with that car, further damage to some degree must have been inflicted. The bumper was dented in the middle and the number plate and valance below it were broken. There was clearly a risk in that kind of collision that the plaintiff's head would be struck, or forced forward, in a manner which could result in tetraplegia.

No injury to the back of the plaintiff's head was recorded at the hospital. The evidence shows that an injury could have been overlooked. It is also possible, as I read the evidence, for the back and shoulders to have taken the initial impact and for the head to have been forced forward against the resistance of a body which was in contact with the road. In my opinion, therefore, the case is covered by the decision in Wilsher v. Essex Area Health Authority [1987] 2 W.L.R. 425 and the second defendant is liable to the plaintiff.

I can deal briefly with the contention that the defendants should not pay for the alterations to the house of the plaintiff's parents as well as to the house he intends to buy. The council undertook to pay for the alterations to the house. There was some delay in doing this and the plaintiff was indeed able to manage when he came out of hospital with temporary alterations. The plaintiff eventually decided that he could not live with his parents because the strain upon them and him was too great. He has not been criticised for taking this attitude but it is said that he should not in effect get the money twice. In my opinion, the plaintiff was in no position to decide firmly that he would buy a house because the defendants denied liability, and there was no offer of an advance to assist him in buying a house. Therefore, the question which has to be determined is whether he ought to have put up with makeshift alterations until he knew whether or not he would be able to purchase a house. In all the circumstances of this case I cannot say that it was unreasonable for the plaintiff to go ahead with the permanent alterations which were carried out to the parents' house. They were designed to add to his comfort and indeed have done so. If, on his behalf, it had been said that he had put up with inadequate accommodation after leaving hospital and he had suffered discomfort and inconvenience as a result, it may well have been suggested that he should have taken advantage of the council's offer to improve his conditions. I think it will be unusual for the costs of alterations to two houses to be allowed, and certainly would not wish to encourage plaintiffs to think otherwise. On the facts of this case, however, I cannot say that expense has been incurred unreasonably.

NOURSE L.J. I agree. I express some views of my own on the issue of causation as against the second defendant. The judge stated his finding on causation in these words:

“My conclusion is that although I am satisfied that it is probable that the first collision did not cause the spinal injury there is an

3 W.L.R.

Fitzgerald v. Lane

Nourse L.J.

A equal probability of the three subsequent impacts having been the cause, and, therefore, each of the defendants must bear the responsibility."

B Reading these words against his immediately preceding consideration of the evidence of Dr. Pallis and Dr. Hopkins, I think it is clear that the judge meant that there was an equal possibility of each of the three subsequent impacts having been either the sole cause of, or a material contributor to, the plaintiff's tetraplegia. I will add that, once he had excluded the first impact and rejected Dr. Hopkins' view that the fourth impact was intrinsically less probable than the others, it is difficult to see to what more precise conclusion the evidence could have led him.

C It follows from the judge's finding that the plaintiff has failed to prove, on the balance of probabilities, that the second defendant caused or materially contributed to the tetraplegia. The question is whether the judge was correct in holding that the second defendant is nevertheless liable under an application of the decision of the House of Lords in McGhee v. National Coal Board [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1. If we had had to decide this case without their assistance, I would have found that question just as difficult as did the members of this court in Wilsher v. Essex Area Health Authority [1987] 2 W.L.R. 425. But I think that the majority have now shown us that the decision in the McGhee case established a principle whose application is wide enough to bridge the evidential gap in this case as comprehensively as it did in the other two. The decision of the majority now binds this court.

D The principle was stated by Mustill L.J. at pp. 459-460: see ante, p. 259F-H.

E The submissions of Mr. O'Brien, for the second defendant, were to the following effect. He said that, if the plaintiff was to recover against the second defendant, he had to prove that the collision with the latter's car occurred before he had suffered, or fully suffered, the injury or injuries which caused his tetraplegia. If he could not prove that, he could not prove that the second defendant had caused or contributed to the condition. This was a question of historic fact which the judge's finding had answered against the plaintiff. It could not be resolved by an application of the McGhee principle, which was confined to cases where the evidential gap was the product of an imperfect state of medical knowledge.

F I do not think that these submissions are correct. I think that they would emaciate the McGhee principle to an extent not countenanced by the decision in Wilsher's case, perhaps reducing it to no principle at all. Their validity rests largely on the proposition that the McGhee principle can apply to this case only if it is shown that the plaintiff had not suffered, or fully suffered, the injury or injuries which caused his tetraplegia before the fourth impact occurred. The correctness of that proposition must be tested by a consideration of the Wilsher case, in order to see whether any of the other possible causes of the plaintiff's retrolental fibroplasia had materialised before the catheter had first been negligently inserted in one of his veins. If none of them had, there might be good support for the proposition, because it could then be said that the comparable question of historic fact had never arisen in that case. However, it is admittedly difficult to discern from the judgments what the true position was. And it must be said that some at least of the conditions referred to by Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V.-C. [1987] 2

W.L.R. 425, 466 are conditions which would have been caused by the plaintiff's extreme prematurity and would presumably have existed from the moment of his birth. This factual obscurity is unfavourable to the proposition, because it suggests that the order in which the various possible causes occurred or materialised was not regarded as being a matter of any importance. Accordingly, I think that Wilsher's case must be approached on the footing that there were several other possible causes of the plaintiff's disability, any one or more of which could have occurred or materialised before the negligent act.

In these circumstances, the proposition on which Mr. O'Brien's submissions were largely built is not made out. Nor do I think that there is anything in the submission that the McGhee principle is confined to cases where the evidential gap is the product of an imperfect state of medical knowledge in a general sense. It is true that both McGhee and Wilsher were cases of that kind, but to confine the principle to them alone would raise distinctions which could not be allowed in the application of one which is said to have been adopted in the interests of justice. The distinction sought to be made in the present case is a good example. There is no satisfactory distinction between a case where the evidential gap is the product of an imperfect state of medical knowledge in a general sense and one where it is the product of the inability of each of two medical witnesses to say which of four impacts was more likely than any of the other three to have caused the plaintiff's tetraplegia.

An examination of these niceties has been brought upon us by the ingenuity of Mr. O'Brien's submissions. Having done my best to dispose of them, I gladly return to the principle as it was clearly and simply stated by Mustill L.J., bearing in mind that the majority in Wilsher's case treated McGhee's case as being a case where there were two separate possible causes of the plaintiff's dermatitis, namely exposure to brick dust and the absence of adequate washing facilities; see per Glidewell L.J., at p. 463H.

Does the principle apply to the state of affairs which is found to have existed in the present case? I think that it does. It is an established fact that the negligent driving of the second defendant and his collision with the plaintiff, to whom he owed a duty of care, created a risk that injury of a kind which can cause tetraplegia would be caused to the plaintiff. The plaintiff did suffer an injury or injuries which caused tetraplegia. The collision with the second defendant's car was one of three possible causes of the condition. In McGhee's case there were two, in Wilsher's case about five. It is not suggested that any distinction is to be made solely because there are two defendants in this case. It does not matter whether the risk was created before or after the third impact had occurred, nor whether the fourth impact in fact caused or contributed to the plaintiff's condition. A benevolent principle smiles on these factual uncertainties and melts them all away.

For these reasons I think that the judge's decision on the question of causation was correct. On all other questions I agree with the judgments of Sir Edward Eveleigh and Slade L.J. and have nothing which I wish to add.

SLADE L.J. The facts of this case have been summarised in the judgment of Sir Edward Eveleigh and I will only repeat them to the extent necessary to explain my conclusions in my own words. The

A difficulties which face this court in attempting to unravel the facts in relation to this sad accident, which involved a pedestrian and two cars and happened in the space of a few seconds nearly four years ago, are formidable. We can never be certain that we have discovered the whole truth. The best we can do is to proceed on what we consider to be the balance of probabilities.

B Five principal issues arise, to which I will refer under the headings shown below.

(1) The liability of the first defendant

C Two particular findings of fact made by the judge have been challenged by Mr. Gage on behalf of the first defendant, namely the findings that the first defendant (i) at the time of the accident was travelling at about 30 miles per hour; (ii) he probably could have seen the plaintiff before and after he entered the crossing if he had kept a proper look-out.

D The first defendant's own evidence was that he was approaching the crossing at a speed of 15 to 20 miles per hour, but, as the judge commented, his faulty recollection of the locus of the collision and the point of impact (to which matters I will revert) threw doubt on the reliability of his recollection of other matters. Mr. Gregory, a manager of a nearby shop who saw the accident, whose statement was admitted under the Civil Evidence Act 1968, estimated the traffic to have been moving at around 10 to 20 miles per hour. On the other hand, Mr.
E Greenaway, who had been driving behind the first defendant in the same lane, separated from his car only by one other car (a Mercedes), gave oral evidence that he and the two cars in front of him were travelling at about 25 to 30 miles per hour. In addition to this, a consulting engineer, Mr. E. T. Page, with long experience of investigating road accidents, gave some technical evidence based primarily on the unchallenged hypothesis that the glass from a broken windscreen, and a pedestrian such as the plaintiff, must have left the first defendant's F vehicle at the speed of that vehicle. By applying that hypothesis to various points at which the plaintiff could have entered the crossing, he expressed various alternative deductions in evidence as to the speed of the first defendant's car. Another eye witness, Mr. Evans, who was sitting in his stationary car in the lane nearest to the point where the plaintiff started to cross the road, identified this point in the course of his oral evidence. This point accorded with Mr. Page's deduction of a G speed of 30 miles per hour. Quite apart from the plaintiff's point of entry to the road, Mr. Page gave evidence in general terms that, while a speed of more than 30 miles per hour on impact would have tended to lift a pedestrian's body on to the roof, a speed in excess of 20 miles per hour would have been required, to result in the body breaking the windscreen, as occurred in the present case. I think that the evidence of H Mr. Greenaway, Mr. Page and Mr. Evans, taken in conjunction, justified a finding that the first defendant was travelling at about 30 miles per hour. Furthermore, I agree with the judge's finding that a reasonable motorist, on approaching the crossing at that particular time, would have been travelling at a speed much slower than 30 miles per hour. The conclusion that he was driving too fast is, I think, reinforced by various other factors, to which I will refer below.

Mr. Gage, however, has rightly stressed that any sensible assessment must involve an appreciation of the first defendant's position. It is now common ground that the plaintiff entered the pelican crossing while the lights were red against him. Though the first defendant, according to his own evidence, did not realise it until he was "two or three cars distances" away, the lights were green in his favour and, it was submitted, he was entitled to expect that pedestrians would not cross against the lights, particularly at a hurried pace. Furthermore, according to the first defendant's evidence, his vision was obscured by cars in the inside lane.

On the other hand, the first defendant, who was aware of the nature of the road was also aware that he was overtaking a line of stationary or slow moving traffic which was in the inside lane. Mr. Evans' car was actually stationary; he had deliberately left a gap between his own car and the car in front. The first defendant, according to his own evidence, did not even notice Mr. Evans' stationary car. It was an inherently perilous situation. The whole of the crossing appears to have been clear of vehicular traffic. This by itself should have suggested the possibility that a pedestrian would emerge from the gap. The presence of pelican crossing signs made this possibility more likely. The first defendant himself said he "took a precautionary glance left at the pedestrian crossing when he was on it." Unfortunately, if he did look to the left, he did not do so until it was too late. Apart from the sight of a blur, he never saw the plaintiff at all. Though the first defendant's own evidence was that the accident occurred some 20 feet south of the crossing, the judge was satisfied that the collision occurred on the crossing and this finding is not now challenged. Furthermore, significantly, though his evidence was that the plaintiff collided with the nearside of his car, the judge was left in no doubt that the collision occurred on the front offside. This latter finding, which again is not now challenged, suggests that the plaintiff must have been nearing the centre of the road when the vehicle struck him. Mr. Greenaway, who presumably would have had a less good view than the plaintiff, said he saw the plaintiff leave the pavement and foresaw the accident. In contrast, the fair inference appears to be that, even though the plaintiff had nearly reached the centre of the road at the moment of impact, the first defendant knew nothing of his presence until immediately before that moment. It is, I think, significant that there is no evidence that he swerved in the smallest degree in an attempt to avoid the plaintiff.

On this evidence, I think the judge was entitled to find that the first defendant was not only driving too fast, but was not keeping a proper look out for pedestrians. On this basis, it is not disputed that there is a sufficient causative link between his negligence and the plaintiff's tetraplegia. Accordingly, I do not think the finding of liability against the first defendant can be disturbed.

(2) The liability of the second defendant

The judge found as facts that the second defendant

"(i) was travelling at about 25 miles per hour when he saw the plaintiff leave the pavement; (ii) on his own admission he could have stopped earlier; (iii) he probably was talking to his passenger at the time and thereby had his attention distracted."

The second defendant's evidence was that he was approaching the pedestrian crossing at a speed of 15 to 20 miles per hour. Mrs. Milne, to whose evidence I will refer further below, also estimated that he was

3 W.L.R.

Fitzgerald v. Lane (C.A.)

Slade L.J.

A travelling at about 15 to 20 miles per hour. However, the second defendant's passenger, Mr. A. K. Patel, put the speed at 25 miles per hour. All the evidence suggested that the impact between his car and the plaintiff was a violent one. Though the finding was challenged on this appeal, in my opinion the judge was entitled to find that the speed was 25 miles per hour.

B I now refer to parts of the second defendant's own evidence. As he progressed northwards towards the traffic lights, which were green, he first saw the plaintiff on the pavement and then saw him moving fast off the pavement. This important piece of evidence was given on at least four separate occasions during the course of his examination-in-chief, it was quite plain that the plaintiff was going to cross the road, even though the lights were green for traffic. As regards the time when he
C first started braking, he appeared at one point early in his evidence to have suggested that he began to brake when he saw the plaintiff rushing on the pavement and to have braked more strongly when he bounced on the windscreen. However, the clear effect of his later evidence was that he first braked when the plaintiff bounced on the windscreen of his car and not before that time. At one point he admitted in terms that this was the first time when he braked and even then he only braked gently.
D He explained to the judge that, until the impact occurred, he did not think that the plaintiff was coming towards him. He accepted in terms that he could have stopped sooner than he did. He also accepted he had been talking on and off with his passenger, Mr. A. K. Patel, and that he might have been talking with him just a moment before the accident occurred. Mrs. Milne, whose car was about the fourth in line of the E vehicles travelling southwards, waiting to pass through the traffic lights, saw the incident. She described in evidence how she saw what she thought was a bundle of clothes or a satchel being thrown across the road and then realised it was a body. Referring to the driver of the Cortina, she said:

F "I watched and prayed that he would stop and I noticed the white Cortina, the driver, was turning his head towards the passenger that he had in the front seat."

Under cross-examination she insisted: "I just say, I had time to think about 'Please stop, please stop.'"

G The judge referred to this evidence of Mrs. Milne in his judgment and, though he did not say so explicitly, clearly accepted it. In my judgment, the evidence of the second defendant, Mrs. Milne and Mr. A. K. Patel sufficed to support the three findings of fact in relation to the second defendant referred to above.

H Mr. O'Brien, on behalf of the second defendant, stressed the difficulties of the split second decision which the second defendant had to make when he was faced with a body that had become a projectile hurtling towards him at about 30 miles per hour. However, the judge commented: "I do not think the second defendant did have only a split second before he saw the plaintiff." I agree. The inferences which, on the balance of probabilities, I would draw from the second defendant's own evidence, coupled with that of Mrs. Milne, is that (i) the second defendant saw the plaintiff hurrying towards the pavement and realised that he was intending to cross the road, even though the lights were green; (ii) he should have at once realised that, if he did not brake immediately, there was a grave risk that his own car would collide with the plaintiff as he attempted to cross the road (whether or not the first defendant's car hit the plaintiff first); (iii) he should have braked hard at once; (iv) he did not brake at once because he was driving too fast and had his attention distracted by talking to his passenger; (v) for the same reason he reacted inadequately, by braking only gently, even after he had seen the plaintiff hit the windscreen of the first defendant's car.

In my judgment, making proper allowances for the difficult situation in which the second defendant found himself, the evidence was amply sufficient to justify the conclusion that (subject, of course, to the plaintiff's own contributory negligence) the second defendant was in breach of his duty of care to the plaintiff and that the second collision was in fact attributable to the second defendant driving too fast and/or not keeping a proper look-out. No one can be sure that, if the second defendant had begun to brake as soon as he saw the plaintiff hurrying towards the crossing (as I think he should have done), he would altogether have avoided colliding with him. It is, however, certain that the impact, if it had occurred at all, would have been much less violent than in fact it was. Subject to the question of causation, the judge was, in my opinion, entitled to find that liability on the part of the second defendant was established. Causation, however, raises formidable problems, to which I shall now turn.

(3) Causation

The first defendant does not dispute that, if, contrary to his submission, negligence against him is proved, such negligence must in law be treated as having been a cause of the plaintiff's tetraplegia. However, he does not admit that the impact of his car on the plaintiff directly physically caused the tetraplegia. Both he and the plaintiff seek to assert that, as the judge held, the second defendant must on a causative basis also be held responsible for this injury.

The judge heard medical evidence from two consultant neurologists, Dr. Pallis and Dr. Hopkins, called respectively on behalf of the plaintiff and the second defendant. As to the tetraplegia, Dr. Pallis began his evidence by stating his ultimate conclusion, which was that "the tetraplegia could have been caused by either collision or both collisions could materially have contributed to the damage." He was asked in examination-in-chief whether he could "exclude either car as playing a part in the causing of the tetraplegia" and he said he could not. He mentioned four possible causes or "scenarios" of the tetraplegia, namely (1) a whiplash effect due to the initial impact of the Morris car on the plaintiff; (2) the impact between the plaintiff and the windscreen of the Morris; (3) the plaintiff's head hitting the ground at some time between the impact of the Morris and the impact of the Cortina; (4) the impact between the Cortina and the plaintiff. He considered scenario (1) the least likely of the four possibilities because he thought it unlikely that the plaintiff's head could have been flexed forward by the impact of the Morris car on his legs. He "could not exclude" scenario (2). He thought scenario (3) "unlikely but not impossible. He likewise considered scenario (4) a possibility, for reasons explained by him in some detail.

In re-examination Dr. Pallis reaffirmed his conclusions that scenario (4) was "quite a plausible scenario" and that the tetraplegia could have been caused by either collision or that both collisions could materially have contributed to the damage.

A Dr. Hopkins accepted the four scenarios put forward by Dr. Pallis as representing the potential possibilities, though he gave much higher credit to scenario (1) than Dr. Pallis had done, because he thought that, if the plaintiff's head was slightly turned to the right at the last moment before the first impact, his head might have remained in the same place and have been forced to flex forward. As to scenario (4), he agreed that, if the Cortina had struck the plaintiff with the plaintiff's head and
B body in precisely the right position, a relatively small force could have caused tetraplegia; but he inferred from the evidence which he had heard that the Cortina came to a halt almost immediately, and therefore concluded that scenario (4) was much less probable than the other three scenarios. In re-examination he expressed a view in terms of probabilities, placing 30 per cent. on each of the first three scenarios and 10 per cent.
C on the last. However, in cross-examination, he had accepted that each of the four scenarios was a possible cause of the tetraplegia and that neither collision could be excluded on a balance of probabilities from being a material cause of the plaintiff's injury.

The judge dismissed scenario (1) as a probable cause of the injury on the grounds that:

D "There is no evidence at all that the plaintiff had turned to the right, but, on the contrary, the evidence is that he was walking straight ahead."

However, having heard the evidence of Dr. Pallis and Dr. Hopkins and summarised it, he expressed his ultimate conclusion as to causation thus:

E "My conclusion is that although I am satisfied that it is probable that the first collision did not cause the spinal injury there is an equal probability of the three subsequent impacts having been the cause, and, therefore, each of the defendants must bear the responsibility."

F Though there has been some debate as to the meaning of this important passage in the course of argument, I do not read it as meaning that, on the balance of probabilities, all three subsequent impacts combined to produce the injury by a cumulative effect; I read it as meaning that it is equally probable that any one of them did so. In reaching his conclusion, the judge applied, or purported to apply, the principle stated by Lord Wilberforce in McGhee v. National Coal Board [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1, 6, to which I will revert:

G "First, it is a sound principle that where a person has, by breach of a duty of care, created a risk, and injury occurs within the area of that risk, the loss should be borne by him unless he shows that it had some other cause."

H Mr. O'Brien submitted that, misapplying the McGhee principle, the judge had asked himself the wrong question. He had asked himself whether any of the four scenarios could, on the balance of probabilities, be excluded as a cause or the cause of the tetraplegia. Instead, he should have asked himself whether it had been proved on the balance of probabilities that, having regard to the impact of the plaintiff with the first defendant's car which had already occurred, the second collision thereafter caused or materially contributed to the plaintiff's tetraplegia.

Having regard to the form of the pleadings and the argument at the trial, it would in my opinion have been the judge's duty, if he thought he properly could, to make a finding of fact as to whether or not, on the balance of probabilities, (a) at the moment of impact with the Cortina, the plaintiff had already been rendered tetraplegic by the impact with the Morris; or (b) he had already been rendered partially tetraplegic at that moment but the impact with the Cortina aggravated the complaint; or (c) he was not rendered tetraplegic by the impact with the Morris.

It has not been suggested that the McGhee principle would have absolved the judge from making any such finding merely because it was difficult. Having regard to his other findings, a finding in the form (a) would inevitably have left the first defendant solely liable for having caused the tetraplegia and would have absolved the second defendant from responsibility for this injury: Performance Cars Ltd. v. Abraham [1962] 1 Q.B. 33. As Lord Reid pointed out in Baker v. Willoughby [1970] A.C. 467, 493, that case exemplifies "the general rule that a wrongdoer must take the plaintiff (or his property) as he finds him: that may be to his advantage or disadvantage." A finding in the form (b) would have left the second defendant liable to the extent that he had made the tetraplegia worse and the first defendant liable for the balance: compare Thompson v. Smiths Shiprepairers (North Shields) Ltd. [1984] Q.B. 405. A finding in the form (c) would, at least prima facie, have led to the conclusion that the second defendant's negligence was the sole immediate physical cause of the tetraplegia.

In the course of argument on the facts, we have been invited to hold that the judge could and should properly have made one or other of these findings. However, having carefully studied the evidence, I, for my part, am not prepared to say that the judge erred in declining or omitting to find that any one of the four impacts was more likely than the others to have been the cause of the tetraplegia. I accept that the evidentiary material available to him regarding the relevant events, which took place over the space of a few seconds, would not have sufficed to enable him to make any such finding with any conviction as to its correctness, and correspondingly does not suffice to enable this court to do so. However, I think he did go wrong in saying that there was no evidence that the plaintiff had turned to the right. The plaintiff himself gave repeated evidence to the effect that he had turned to the right immediately before the impact with the first defendant's car. While, in my opinion, this makes no difference in the ultimate result, I would therefore express my conclusion as to the effect of the evidence on causation slightly differently from the judge by saying that, on the evidence, it is equally probable that any one or more of the four impacts may have been the cause of the tetraplegia and that the available evidence does not permit a precise attribution of the cause on the balance of probabilities. On the basis of the principle established by Bonnington Castings Ltd. v. Wardlaw [1956] A.C. 613, it would have sufficed for the plaintiff to prove that the second defendant's negligence had materially contributed to his tetraplegia, even if it was not the sole cause. But, subject to the McGhee principle, I do not think the evidence suffices to show that.

Against this background, Mr. O'Brien has submitted that the plaintiff has simply failed to prove his case against the second defendant in as much as he has failed to show that, on the balance of probabilities, the second defendant's fault, as opposed to the first defendant's fault, either caused or materially contributed to the plaintiff's tetraplegia. The

A plaintiff, as he pointed out, may already have been tetraplegic when struck by the second defendant's car.

In McGhee's case the respondents were found to have been at fault by failing to provide showers for the appellant for use after his work on brick kilns. They attempted to escape liability for his dermatitis by submitting that it had not been shown on the balance of probabilities that their fault had caused or materially contributed to his dermatitis, because it had not been shown on the balance of probabilities that he would not have contracted dermatitis if adequate washing facilities had been provided. As Lord Wilberforce put it [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1, 6:

C "But the question remains whether a pursuer must necessarily fail if, after he has shown a breach of duty, involving an increase of risk of disease, he cannot positively prove that this increase of risk caused or materially contributed to the disease while his employers cannot positively prove the contrary."

D The House of Lords answered this question in the negative by deciding that, notwithstanding this evidentiary gap, a finding in the court below that the respondents' breach of duty had materially increased the risk of injury to the appellant, amounted for practical purposes to a finding that such breach had materially contributed to his injury. Their respective rationes decidendi, slightly differently expressed, are to be found set out in the passages cited by Mustill L.J. in Wilsher v. Essex Area Health Authority [1987] 2 W.L.R. 425 at pp. 455 to 458, but are comprehensively summarised by him in a passage which I will cite below. Meantime, however, it is to be observed that in McGhee there was only one relevant risk operating, namely that contact of the employee's skin with brick dust would cause dermatitis; there was no doubt at all that such contact had in fact caused the injury.

E The Wilsher decision first came to our notice after the first hearing of these appeals had been concluded and we thought it necessary to invite further argument in the light of it. In that case the infant plaintiff was suffering from a condition of near blindness ("RLF"). While in hospital, through mistakes made by members of the hospital's staff, he had been given excess oxygen in two separate episodes. He sought to recover damages from the hospital authority on the grounds that the excess oxygen in his bloodstream had caused the RLF. The evidence showed that excess oxygen could cause or contribute to RLF: see [1987] 2 W.L.R. 425, 459, 463). It also showed, however, that there are a number of other disabilities or diseases from which premature babies, such as the plaintiff in that case, are liable to suffer and which singly or in combination can or may cause RLF. The medical evidence did not go so far as establishing on the balance of probabilities that the two episodes involving the administration of excess oxygen had caused or contributed to the RLF. It did, however, show that they had added new factors to the existing list of factors which had subjected the plaintiff to the risk of RLF.

H Mustill L.J., who delivered the leading judgment, pointed out that, in one respect, the facts of Wilsher's case were different from those of McGhee's case, at p. 459:

"Instead of a single risk factor known to have caused the injury, there is a list of factors which cannot be fully enumerated in the current state of medical science any one of which might have caused the injury. What the defendants did was not to enhance the risk that the known factors would lead to injury but to add to the factors which might do so.”

A

However, Mustill L.J. considered that this made no crucial difference, saying, at pp. 459–460:

“The root of the problem lies in the fact that, for reasons of policy, their Lordships’ House mitigated the rigour of the rule that the plaintiff must prove that the breach caused the loss, in the interests of achieving a result which was considered to be just. Given that this was a decision based on policy, rather than a chain of direct reasoning, the difficulty is to know whether a similar approach can properly be adopted in the different circumstances of the present case. After much hesitation I have come to the conclusion that it can. Reading all the speeches together, the principle applied by the House seems to me to amount to this. If it is an established fact that conduct of a particular kind creates a risk that injury will be caused to another or increases an existing risk that injury will ensue; and if the two parties stand in such a relationship that the one party owes a duty not to conduct himself in that way; and if the [one] party does conduct himself in that way; and if the other party does suffer injury of the kind to which the risk related; then the first party is taken to have caused the injury by his breach of duty, even though the existence and extent of the contribution made by the breach cannot be ascertained. If this is the right analysis, it seems to me that the shape taken by the enhancement of the risk ought not to be of crucial significance. In the McGhee case [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1, the conduct of the employers made it more likely that the pursuer would contract dermatitis, and he did contract dermatitis. Here, the conduct of those for whom the defendants are liable made it more likely that Martin would contract RLF, and he did contract RLF. If considerations of justice demanded that the pursuer succeed in the one case, I can see no reason why the plaintiff should not succeed in the other.”

Though Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V.-C. dissented on this point, Glidewell L.J. agreed with Mustill L.J. that the McGhee principle applied, on similar grounds.

Mr. O’Brien, in his forceful and able argument, has submitted that, while the McGhee principle could have been successfully invoked by the plaintiff against the first defendant, if it had been necessary to do so, it has no application to his claim against the second defendant. I hope and think his essential submissions can be fairly summarised as follows. In both McGhee’s case [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1 and Wilsher’s case [1987] 2 W.L.R. 425 the court was concerned with hypothetical questions. In McGhee’s case the question was: “Would the employee not have contracted dermatitis if the employers had provided proper washing facilities?” In Wilsher the question was: “Would the plaintiff not have contacted RLF but for the administration of excess oxygen?” In both those cases medical science had not advanced sufficiently to enable those hypothetical questions to be answered. Where medical science is insufficiently advanced to enable the plaintiff to establish the causal link between the proved increase of risk (such as was proved in both those

Slade L.J.

A cases) and the development of the condition of injury within the area of that risk, McGhee's case can be applied to bridge the evidential gap.

B In the present case, however, Mr. O'Brien submitted, the relevant question for the court is not a hypothetical one, but a straightforward question of historical fact: "Was the plaintiff rendered tetraplegic by the second collision or had he already been so rendered by the first collision?" As Lord Reid said in Davies v. Taylor [1974] A.C. 207, 212–213:

C "When the question is whether a certain thing is or is not true—whether a certain event did or did not happen—then the court must decide one way or the other. There is no question of chance or probability. Either it did or it did not happen. But the standard of civil proof is a balance of probabilities. If the evidence shows a balance in favour of it having happened then it is proved that it did in fact happen. . . . You can prove that a past event happened, but you cannot prove that a future event will happen and I do not think that the law is so foolish as to suppose that you can."

D In Mr. O'Brien's submission (and this I think is common ground) the McGhee principle does not absolve a judge from the duty of making a decision on a pure question of historical fact, if a decision is possible. There is no presumption of law that the plaintiff was not already tetraplegic at the moment of the second collision. In the present case, it was submitted, if the judge, having heard the evidence, was not able to say on the balance of probabilities that the second collision caused or materially contributed to the tetraplegia, he should have dismissed the claim of the plaintiff against the second defendant insofar as it was based on that tetraplegia; there is no evidential gap except in the sense that there always is in any case where a plaintiff fails to prove a past fact, on the balance of probabilities.

F I initially found these submissions persuasive. We are, I think, entitled and indeed perhaps bound to follow Mustill L.J.'s statement of the McGhee principle [1987] 2 W.L.R. 425, 459–460 as authoritative. That statement (rightly in my respectful opinion) is prefaced with the words:

G "If it is an established fact that conduct of a particular kind creates a risk that injury will be caused to another or increases an existing risk that injury will ensue . . ."

H In McGhee's case [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1 it was an established fact (established by the evidence on the balance of probabilities) that the employer's failure to provide washing facilities increased an existing risk that the employee would suffer dermatitis. In Wilsher's case it was an established fact (again established by the evidence on the balance of probabilities) that the two administrations of oxygen both created a risk that the plaintiff would suffer RLF and increased the existing risk that he would suffer from it. In the present case, I was particularly impressed by Mr. O'Brien's submission that the second defendant's conduct could only be said to have created a risk that the plaintiff would suffer tetraplegia or to have increased an existing risk that such injury would ensue, if it were presumed that he did not already suffer from it at the moment of the second collision; and that there was no justification for any such presumption. I was doubtful whether the McGhee principle could have any application to a case where a plaintiff was injured on successive occasions by two tortfeasors, not acting in concert so as to render the second tortfeasor liable for damage which he could not positively, on the balance of probabilities, be shown to have caused.

In the end, however, on the particular facts of the present case, I have come to the conclusion that the McGhee principle was rightly applied for these short reasons. Mr. O'Brien's submissions focused attention on the moment of impact between the plaintiff and the second defendant's car. In my judgment, however, attention should be focused on the moment when the second defendant's negligent course of conduct began, that is to say (if my assessment of the facts is right) when he first saw the plaintiff on the pavement hurrying towards the crossing and failed to brake immediately. At that moment of time the plaintiff was a fit and able man. If this is the right way to look at the matter, applying the McGhee principle as explained by Mustill L.J., I have no difficulty in holding that the second defendant, by failing to brake when he should have done, created a risk that physical injury involving tetraplegia would be caused to the plaintiff or increased the existing risk that such injury would ensue. I can thus see no material distinction in the facts of the present case from those of McGhee or of Wilsher.

Broad considerations of justice may be potentially misleading guides where questions of causation arise. Nevertheless, I would add that, if considerations of broad justice demanded that the respective plaintiffs should succeed against the respective defendants in both McGhee's case [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1 and Wilsher's case [1987] 2 W.L.R. 425, I find it hard to see why the plaintiff in the present case should fail in his claim against the negligent second defendant merely because (through no lack of diligence in assembling the relevant evidence) he cannot positively prove that his collision with the second defendant's car (as opposed to the first defendant's car) caused or materially contributed to his tetraplegia. A conclusion to this effect would seem to me unjust to the first defendant, bearing in mind that it would leave him saddled with paying the entire bill of damages due to the plaintiff, while on the judge's and my own view of the facts the second defendant was no less culpable than the first defendant. It could also cause potential injustice to the plaintiff, in particular if the first defendant were to prove incapable of paying the full amount of the damages recoverable. In my view of the facts, both defendants, by their negligent conduct, began to expose the plaintiff to risk of physical injury more or less simultaneously. In my judgment, the mere fact that the first defendant happened to collide with the plaintiff a few seconds before the second defendant does not entitle the second defendant to avoid liability for the injury that ensued on the grounds that the plaintiff has not adduced sufficient evidence to prove his case against him. Nor, in my opinion, is the present case in its essentials distinguishable from McGhee's case and Wilsher's case merely because the evidential gap in this case is not solely due to an insufficient advance in medical science.

(4) Housing alterations

The plaintiff came out of hospital in May 1984. He then returned to his parents' house, where he occupied a bed-sitting room. This

A accommodation, however, was not entirely appropriate for the plaintiff's disability. Certain works of alteration were proposed. The matter was sent out to tender in July 1985 and in September 1985 the works were begun. They were not completed at the date of trial; they were not in fact finished until July 1986. They were carried out under the auspices of the Surrey County Council, who paid the cost amounting to £20,580.
B The council, by virtue of the Health and Social Services and Social Security Adjudications Act 1983, have to charge for these works and requested that this item be included in the plaintiff's claim. While the second defendant's counsel reserved the right to argue against it in a higher court, the defendants' counsel at the trial accepted in principle that the claim, if reasonable, would have been a valid one, but resisted C it on the grounds that it was unreasonable. As I understand the position, it was not suggested that the works of alteration would have been inappropriate or that they would have represented unreasonable expenditure if the plaintiff had intended to occupy the room on a permanent or semi-permanent basis. The unreasonableness was said to arise because it was the plaintiff's stated intention, if possible, to move to a home of his own in one or two years' time and the additional cost D of providing such a home was the subject of a separate head of claim.

An expert, Mr. Spencely, gave evidence as to the plaintiff's housing needs. In the course of his evidence he discussed various options open to the plaintiff. The first was to purchase a bungalow that met the necessary criteria and to adapt it. The second was to negotiate with a developer of a bungalow before it was built. The third was to purchase a plot of land and build a purpose-designed bungalow. The cheapest E option, in his view, was the second, the probable cost of negotiating alterations being between £3,000 and £12,000; the difficulty about this course was in finding a developer who was proposing to build a suitable bungalow in the right place at the right time. Mr. Spencely's evidence was that the probable cost of adapting a three-bedroomed bungalow for F a tetraplegic would be about £24,500.

In the event, the judge included in the amount of damages awarded both this sum of £24,500 and the sum of £20,580. Both defendants say he erred in awarding the full amount of both these sums. Mr. Gage submitted that the plaintiff did not reasonably need to convert two properties to his needs and should not have been allowed the cost of two conversions. As his primary submission Mr. O'Brien, on behalf of G the second defendant, submitted that the judge ought to have found it reasonable for the plaintiff to wait for the cheaper option of an estate development during which a bungalow could be purchased and modifications incorporated. On this basis his primary submission was that the proper award in this context would have been £20,580, plus a sum between £3,000 and £12,000. Alternatively, he submitted that, at H the very least, the judge ought to have made some discount for accelerated receipt of the sum of £24,500. He pointed out that at the trial the plaintiff had given evidence to the effect that he wished to move to his own home within a year.

It was clearly the duty of the plaintiff, like any other plaintiff, to take reasonable steps to mitigate his damage. Correspondingly, he would not have been entitled to debit the defendants with expenditure incurred by him in connection with his housing arrangements which was unnecessary or unreasonable. Ordinarily, I would accept, a plaintiff could not expect to be allowed the cost of alterations to two houses. On the special facts of the present case, however, I do not think that it can be said that the plaintiff has failed to take reasonable steps to mitigate his damage or that he has incurred expenditure which was either unnecessary or unreasonable.

As to the £24,500, it was a readily foreseeable consequence of the defendants' negligence and the plaintiff's resulting injuries that, as soon as he would be in a position to do so, this young man would wish to purchase a house where he could lead an independent life and pay for it to be adapted to his special needs. The submission that some discount should be allowed for accelerated payment of this sum does not attract me. By the time when the expenditure has to be incurred, the disadvantageous effects of inflation on its amount are likely to counter-balance any advantages of accelerated payment.

As to the sum of £20,580, I think it might well have been said that the expenditure on the room in the plaintiff's parents' house was unnecessary or unreasonable if liability on the part of the defendants had already been admitted. However, as Mr. Stewart rightly stressed on his behalf, it had not. The plaintiff did not know whether he was going to recover anything in the action or whether in the foreseeable future he was going to be in a position to buy a house of his own. It might have been several years or more before this was possible. It was clearly sensible for him to take advantage of the room offered to him by his parents on being discharged from hospital. And I cannot see that, in all the circumstances, in the absence of any admission of liability by the defendants or any offer by them of an advance of money towards house purchase, it was unreasonable for him to arrange for the doing of the work required to make that room tolerably comfortable, having regard to his needs. I do not think he could reasonably have been expected to continue to live in discomfort in that room pending the decision at the trial. No evidence was called in an attempt to demonstrate what the plaintiff should reasonably have done instead of what in fact he did do. The defendants' notices of appeal raise in the alternative a submission that the judge should have made some allowance for the element of betterment to the plaintiff's parents' house, but this point has not been pursued.

I do not think that this ground of appeal has been established.

(5) Contributory negligence, apportionment and contribution

At the trial the plaintiff's counsel conceded that he was guilty of contributory negligence. In these circumstances, the judge, having decided issues (1), (2) and (3) above in favour of the plaintiff, had two further decisions to make, apart from those relating to the quantum of damage. First, he had to decide the extent to which the damage recoverable should be reduced by reason of the plaintiff's own fault under section 1(1) of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act 1945. Secondly, he had to decide how great a contribution in respect of the damage each defendant should recover from the other under section 1(1) of the Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1978. The judge dealt very

3 W.L.R.

Fitzgerald v. Lane (C.A.)

Slade L.J.

A briefly with the questions of contributory negligence and contribution together in the passages cited or referred to by Sir Edward Eveleigh in his judgment. As Sir Edward Eveleigh has said, the judge's finding indicated that he considered each of the three parties to be equally at fault. Section 1(1) of the Act of 1945 requires the damages recoverable to be reduced "to such extent as the court thinks just and equitable, B having regard to the claimant's share in the responsibility for the damage." Counsel on behalf of each of the respective defendants has submitted in effect that on any footing the plaintiff's share in the responsibility for the damages was, on the facts, greater than that of his client and the judge should have applied the subsection accordingly.

C I have considerable sympathy with this submission. There can be no doubt that the plaintiff was, to a significant extent, the creator of his own great misfortune. It was he who set in motion the whole train of events, by carelessly and unnecessarily hurrying into a busy road at a pelican crossing at a time when the lights were red for pedestrians and green for traffic, and when a line of more or less stationary traffic in the D nearside lane increased the risk of injury from traffic approaching from the offside lane. In contrast, each of the defendants, as a result of the plaintiff's negligence, found himself confronted by a quite unexpected emergency. If hearing the case at the trial, I might well have held that the plaintiff's share in the responsibility for his injuries must be regarded as larger than that of either of the defendants. However, this court is always slow to interfere with the decision of a judge of first instance on a question of apportionment such as this and, subject to what is said below, I see no sufficient grounds to interfere with the decision of the E judge in this context.

Nevertheless, I do not think that the form of order actually made by the judge gave effect to his clear conclusion that the plaintiff's responsibility for the injury was no less (though no greater) than that of either of the defendants. If only one of the defendants had appeared before him, this conclusion must, more or less inevitably, have led to a F ruling that the damages recoverable by the plaintiff against that defendant should be reduced by 50 per cent. (not $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent.) under section 1(1) of the Act of 1945. I can see no possible grounds in principle or logic why the amount of the reduction should be less, merely because two defendants were parties to the action instead of one. One the issue of contributory negligence, the judge, with respect to him, was, in my opinion, led into error by considering the share of the responsibility of G the plaintiff for his injury vis-à-vis the defendants conjunctively instead of individually; "that share can only be estimated by weighing his fault ... against that of each defendant": see The Miraflores and The Abadesa [1967] 1 A.C. 826, per Lord Pearce at p. 846. (The emphasis is mine.) If the judge had taken the latter course, it seems clear that he would have regarded the responsibility of the plaintiff vis-à-vis each H defendant as being 50 per cent.

Section 2(1) of the Act of 1978 requires that, as between the two defendants, the amounts of their respective contributions "shall be such as may be found by the court to be just and equitable having regard to the extent of that person's responsibility for the damage in question." I see no sufficient grounds for differing from the judge's conclusion that the responsibility of each of the two defendants for that part of the injury for which the plaintiff was not responsible was equal.

I therefore agree that the appeal of each of the defendants should be allowed on the limited issue of apportionment, and that the judge's order should be varied by giving judgment for the plaintiff against each defendant for 50 per cent. (instead of two-thirds) of the plaintiff's claim and by ordering contribution between the defendants on a fifty-fifty basis.

*Appeal of each defendant allowed on the limited issue of apportionment.
Plaintiff to have judgment against each defendant for 50 per cent. of his claim, the contribution to be on a fifty/fifty basis.
Leave to all parties to appeal.*

Revenue—Capital gains tax—Tax avoidance—Extra-statutory concession—Arrangement for transfer of farm to taxpayer—Taxpayer taking up residence abroad—Sale of farm—Taxpayer's claim to concession for non-residents to charge to capital gains tax—Whether concession intra vires—Whether concession available where arrangement made for purpose of reducing statutory liability to tax

In 1980, the taxpayer's wife decided to sell a farm she had inherited in 1977 and, on 18 August 1980, the taxpayer entered into an agreement whereby he would work and reside in Germany. For the purpose of taking advantage of the extra-statutory concession D2, which granted substantial relief to charge to capital gains tax on a disposal made after a taxpayer ceased to be ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom, the wife by deed of gift transferred the farm to the taxpayer on 29 August. On 13 September the taxpayer left the United Kingdom for Germany and on 17 September the farm was sold at auction. The taxpayer invested the proceeds of sale outside the United Kingdom. The inspector assessed the taxpayer to the full amount of tax in reliance on the "rubric," set out at the beginning of the booklet "Extra-Statutory Concessions in Operation at 8 August 1980," that concessions therein set out, which included concession D2, would not be applied where there was an attempt to use them for tax avoidance purposes. Correspondence followed but the inspector made the assessment for the full amount of tax.

Held, dismissing the application, (1) that, since extra-statutory concession D2 had been published in the booklet, there was nothing secretive about the concession that prevented it from being evenly applied and, since its provisions fell well within the concept of good management and of administrative common sense, it was intra vires; that there was nothing improper in limiting the terms of the concession by a separate provision and, since the rubric itself was not discriminatory and could be applied generally to all who came within its terms, all the concessions in the booklet were limited by the terms of the rubric so that they could only be applied in circumstances where there had been no attempt to use a concession for the purpose of avoiding tax (post, pp. 286E–H, 290G–H).

(2) That the transfer of the farm from the wife to the husband was a transaction that lacked any element of bounty and it had been made for the sole purpose of taking advantage of concession D2 in circumstances where the taxpayer had neither suffered a reduction in income nor incurred expenditure that would qualify for a reduction in liability for tax; that the arrangement whereby the taxpayer left the United Kingdom after the farm had been transferred to him but before its sale was an arrangement made solely for the purpose of diminishing the amount of tax chargeable on the profits of sale and, therefore, it was an arrangement for tax avoidance within the meaning of the rubric and, accordingly, the provisions of concession D2 did not apply to the profits on the sale of the farms (post, pp. 289D—290A).

(3) That, although the taxpayer had no right of appeal against the revenue's decision that the extra-statutory concession was not applicable, the taxpayer had been given the opportunity to make submissions before the assessment was made; and that, therefore, there were no grounds on which the assessment could be criticised and the full amount of tax chargeable on the transaction was payable (post, p. 290E-G).

3 W.L.R. Reg. v. Inspector of Taxes, Ex p. Fulford-Dobson (Q.B.D.)

A APPLICATION for judicial review.

B The wife of the taxpayer, Roger Fulford-Dobson, transferred to him a farm she owned just before he left the United Kingdom to work and reside in Germany. The farm was sold by auction a few days after he had taken up residence in Germany and he sought to take advantage of extra-statutory concession D2 published in the booklet, "Extra-Statutory Concessions in Operation at 8 August 1980" (I.R.1 (1980)), to reduce the amount of capital gains tax chargeable on the profit of the sale. The Inspector of Taxes for Reading District 5 refused to grant the concession and by letter dated 19 October 1984 to the taxpayer's accountants, he conveyed the decision that extra-statutory concession D2 would not be applied on the disposal by the taxpayer of the farm.

C The taxpayer applied for judicial review and the remedy of an order of certiorari to quash the assessment to capital gains tax dated 20 December 1983. He also sought a declaration that (a) in the operation of the system of extra-statutory concessions the Board of Inland Revenue were not entitled to discriminate between taxpayers who brought themselves within the terms of the relief; (b) every taxpayer was entitled to avail himself of all lawful means to minimise the burden of tax on himself and to enter into any legally effective transaction for that purpose; (c) unless specifically authorised by statute the board might not impeach such transactions on the grounds of their motive; and (d) the term "tax avoidance" was not applicable to lawful tax planning effected by transactions which were not fictitious or artificial.

E The grounds on which relief was sought were that (1) the system of extra-statutory concessions existed outside the legal framework of taxation authorised by Parliament and could only be controlled through the exercise of judicial review; (2) the decision of the board was in breach of natural justice because it was arrived at from information derived by inquisitorial processes which gave the taxpayer no opportunity to put his case to the board and the board was acting as judge in its own cause; (3) the arbitrary operation of the extra-statutory concessions system by the revenue discriminated unfairly between taxpayers and constituted an abuse of power; (4) it was in the public interest that clear guidelines should be laid down to control quasi-judicial powers exercised without statutory authority by the revenue; and (5) the delay in making the application was due to the necessity to consider alternative courses of action and taking legal advice thereon and the taxpayer's illness, and consequent matrimonial upheaval.

G The taxpayer died on 26 April 1986 and, by leave of the court, the executors of his will were substituted as applicants to the proceedings.

The facts are stated in the judgment.

Ian Ferrier for the applicant executors.

Alan Moses for the Crown.

H McNEILL J. On 9 July 1985, Mr. Roger Fulford-Dobson was given leave to apply for judicial review by way of certiorari to quash an assessment upon him to capital gains tax dated 20 December 1983 and for associated declaratory relief.

On 26 April 1986, Mr. Fulford-Dobson died. Prior to the hearing of the application I gave leave ex parte for the executors appointed in his will to be substituted as applicants, in the interests of the estate. The assessment was in the sum of £59,000 upon chargeable gains of £200,000. No issue arises before me as to figures. A

The real meat in the application, however, lies behind the assessment. What is really challenged is the refusal of the Board of Inland Revenue to extend to Mr. Fulford-Dobson an extra-statutory concession. If it had been extended to him, he would have been chargeable only on a much smaller sum, with tax payable of £3,885. The extra-statutory concession in point is D2 which is set out in the booklet, Extra-Statutory Concessions in Operation at 8 August 1980 (I.R.1 (1980)), the relevant part of which reads: B

“When a person leaves the United Kingdom and is treated on his departure as not resident and not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom he is not charged to capital gains tax on gains accruing to him from disposals made after the date of his departure.” C

The statutory provision to which this concession relates is section 2 of the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979 which reads:

“(1) Subject to any exceptions provided by this Act,”—and I interpolate that that is not relevant here—“a person shall be chargeable to capital gains tax in respect of chargeable gains accruing to him in a year of assessment during any part of which he is resident in the United Kingdom . . .” D

By section 155(1) “year of assessment” in relation to capital gains tax means “a year beginning on 6 April and ending on 5 April in the following calendar year . . .”

In the event which happened, which I shall have to describe later in detail, it is common ground between the parties (a) that until 13 September 1980 Mr. Fulford-Dobson was resident and ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom, that is to say, within the year of assessment 1980–81; and (b) that from 13 September 1980 he was not resident or ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom. Accordingly, the assessment, if not quashed, is not open to the appeal procedure provided by the tax legislation. E

Concession D2, as I have said, is to be found in the booklet “Extra-Statutory Concessions in Operation at 8 August 1980.” Inside the front cover of the booklet the following appears: F

“The concessions described within are of general application, but it must be borne in mind that in a particular case there may be special circumstances which will require to be taken into account in considering the application of the concession. A concession will not be given in any case where an attempt is made to use it for tax avoidance.” G

It is the latter sentence which is central to the argument. The passage itself has for convenience during the hearing been called the “rubric” and I adopt that word. H

The assessment was made because the board concluded that what was done was to attempt to use the concession for tax avoidance. The applicants contend that what was done was legitimate tax planning. Before I turn to the facts and the law, two other matters can be got out of the way. First, so far as declaratory relief is concerned, Mr. Ferrier for the applicants concedes that he is not entitled to (a), (b) and (c) which are in essence so worded as to invite the court to determine

McNeill J.

A matters which are not factually established and in a sense to give "academic" decisions, and further that (d) is decided one way or the other by the decision on certiorari. Secondly, Mr. Ferrier made it plain that he mounted no challenge to the decision of the board on what in now accepted legal shorthand are called "Wednesbury principles: Lord
B Wednesbury Corporation [1948] 1 K.B. 223 and Council of Civil Service
Unions v. Minister for the Civil Service [1985] A.C. 374, 410.

C The facts are short and simple. Mr. Fulford-Dobson was married. He had been in the Merchant Navy, but early in 1980 he was without employment. In 1977 his wife had inherited a property called "Hardings Farm." During 1980 she was considering the sale of the property. A letter from accountants acting, it appears, for both Mr. and Mrs.
Fulford-Dobson, dated 7 December 1983 to H.M. Inspector of Taxes makes it clear that the proposed sale had generated "a vast amount of correspondence," and involved considerable organisation, in relation, for example, to contracts of employment of farm workers, obtaining vacant possession of farm cottages, termination of grazing rights, investigation of rights of way and the like.

D During the same period in 1980, Mr. Fulford-Dobson was negotiating employment with a German firm of publishers at Herrsching. His contract of employment was concluded and signed on 18 August 1980.
He was thereby required to work and reside in Herrsching and to commence work on Monday 15 September 1980. On 29 August 1980, that is, 11 days after the contract of employment, Mrs. Fulford-Dobson transferred Hardings Farm to her husband by deed of gift. On 13 E September he left for Germany. On 17 September Hardings Farm was sold by auction.

In his affidavit of 21 May 1985, Mr. Fulford-Dobson was wholly frank. He said:

F "The purpose of the gift by my wife to me was to avail ourselves of concession D2 and to provide me with funds which I could invest outside the United Kingdom during my employment abroad without liability to United Kingdom tax."

A similar statement appears in the accountant's letter to the inspector of taxes of 23 May 1984, three paragraphs of which I must read:

G "There were two reasons for the transfer of Hardings Farm by Mrs.
Fulford-Dobson to her husband. The first and most important was that it was realised that Mr. Fulford-Dobson would not be liable to U.K. income tax on foreign source income during his period of non-residence. Investing the proceeds abroad thus presented them, in common with other non-residents, with the opportunity to add to their wealth bases taking advantage of the high rates of interest payable worldwide at that time. The other reason was to ensure H that, when the sale took place, it would be outside the scope of capital gains tax by virtue of Mr. Fulford-Dobson's foreign employment and the fact that he would be not resident and not ordinarily resident for U.K. tax purposes.

"As your papers will show, until 15 September 1980 Mr. Fulford-Dobson had been unemployed for some time. However the family's finances were such that he had been under pressure to obtain gainful employment and negotiations for his German employment commenced early in 1980 (see enclosed copy of employer's letter dated 20 August 1980).

"It was whilst negotiations for his overseas employment were being concluded that the opportunity for avoiding capital gains tax on the sale of Hardings Farm was recognised. Naturally, following the principles laid down in the Duke of Westminster case [1936] A.C. 1 our clients transferred ownership of the farm to Mr. Fulford-Dobson on 29 August 1980."

The inspector's response was by letter dated 19 October 1984. The major part of that letter reads:

"Your client's contention is that no gain is chargeable for the year ended 5 April 1981 (other than the small agreed gain of £3,885) since at the date of disposal of Hardings Farm he had left the United Kingdom. You will of course be aware of the fact that to 29 August 1980 Mrs. Fulford-Dobson owned the farm and on that date she gifted it to her husband. It is accepted by yourself in your letter of 23 May 1984 that one of the two reasons for the transfer of Hardings Farm from Mrs. Fulford-Dobson to her husband was 'to ensure that when the sale took place it would be outside the scope of capital gains tax by virtue of Mr. Fulford-Dobson's foreign employment and the fact that he would be not resident and not ordinarily resident for U.K. tax purposes.' Of course, your contention that Mr. Fulford-Dobson would be outside the scope of U.K. capital gains tax is based on the applicability of extra-statutory concession D2 operated by the Board of Inland Revenue. The application of all extra-statutory concessions is subject to the general condition which is printed on the inside cover of the booklet I.R.1 and reads . . ."

The letter then recites the passages which I have already read. It continues:

"I am instructed to inform you that in the particular circumstances of this case and in the light of the transactions which your client and his wife entered into, the Board of Inland Revenue do not consider this condition satisfied. The extra-statutory concession D2 will not be applied with the result that Mr. Fulford-Dobson is chargeable on the gain which accrued on the disposal of Hardings Farm under the terms of section 2 of the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979.

"I would therefore ask for the detailed computations of gain arising on the disposal of the farm and your agreement subject to my acceptance of the figures that the appeal should be determined in that figure. I should mention, perhaps, that if agreement of the gain is not possible, the appeal will have to be listed for hearing by the commissioners and of course, my contentions before the commissioners will be based on the terms of section 2 of the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979, the commissioners not being able to concern themselves with the application of an extra-statutory concession."

The decision so conveyed had been reached by Mr. J. P. B. Bryce, an assistant secretary employed by the Board of Inland Revenue in the Policy Division, and dealing with taxes on capital gains. At paragraphs 6 to 9 of his affidavit, he deposes:

"6. In October 1984 I was required to decide whether or not the applicant should benefit from the extra-statutory concession D2

Reg. v. Inspector of Taxes, Ex p. Fulford-Dobson (Q.B.D.)

McNeill J.

A referred to in his affidavit. There was before me at this stage the applicant's tax file and also the tax file of Mrs. Fulford-Dobson. In addition there was before me the correspondence making up the bundle referred to as MTC1 in Mr. Cooper's affidavit, save for the correspondence between the accountants and the National Westminster Bank. 7. All extra-statutory concessions, including extra-statutory concession D2, have to be construed in accordance B with the warning published on the inside of the extra-statutory concession booklet. . . ." Again, I have read the passage which has been called the "rubric." The affidavit continues: "Accordingly it is made clear to anyone who seeks to take advantage of a concession that it will not be available where an attempt is made to use it for tax avoidance. 8. After the protective assessment had been raised C further correspondence took place between the accountants and the revenue. . . . (See MTC1.) On 19 April 1984 the inspector specifically asked for the reasons for the gift by Mrs. Fulford-Dobson. The reasons were given in a letter written on behalf of the applicant dated 23 May 1984." That is the letter which I have just read. "I formed the view that the letter made it clear that the reason for the gift was for the purpose of avoiding capital gains tax D upon the sale of the farm. The gift combined with the use of a concession was a scheme designed to avoid tax. I also took the view that the gift coupled with the attempt to use the concession came within the prohibition set out in the warning notice. As must have been apparent to the applicant, or at least the accountants, the concession would not be granted to a taxpayer if an attempt were made to use it for tax avoidance. 9. The final decision not to grant E the concession was only made after careful consideration of all the facts and matters which the applicant's advisers chose to lay before the revenue in letters passing between them and the revenue.
Furthermore between the receipt of the letter from the accountants dated 23 May 1984 and the decision of 19 October 1984, discussion took place between members of Policy and Technical Divisions of F the Board and the Solicitor to the Board."

That last paragraph which I have read went more to the possibility at that stage of a Wednesbury challenge being directed at the board, but, as I have said, Mr. Ferrier for the applicants expressly abandons any such contention.

G I should say for completeness that in paragraph 6 of that affidavit the deponent made reference to correspondence between the accountants and the National Westminster Bank Plc. The whole of the correspondence now exhibited by Mr. Cooper makes it clear that there was correspondence and the passing of advice between the bank and the accountants, and that in the course of the letters from the assistant H manager of the trust and tax services estate planning unit of the bank there are references to the law, but it is noteworthy that nowhere in the correspondence, either from the bankers or from the accountants, is there any reference to the rubric or the condition imposed on the concessions, including concession D2.

Mr. Ferrier conceded that if the applicants could not bring the case within the concession the assessment could not be challenged (except to the extent that as it was a "protective" or "estimated" assessment the figures might require adjustment). However, he sought to attack the legal validity of extra-statutory concessions but contended that, if valid, a taxpayer could not be deprived of a concession otherwise appropriate by the words on the inner cover of the booklet. These, he said, were, like the concessions themselves, unauthorised by statute and the inclusion of them was an unlawful assumption of authority by the board. Further, he said, if the words were to be read as part of each concession they were discriminatory in the sense that they did not operate evenhandedly to all taxpayers but only to a selected number of taxpayers. They did not, he said, apply indifferently (using the word used by Walton J. in Vestey v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (No. 2) [1979] Ch. 198, 204B, to which I shall return later) to all who fall, or who can bring themselves, within the scope of the concession. A B

His second submission was that if the code, being the whole wording of the booklet, was intra vires the board was wrong in law in raising this assessment. The facts did not disclose an attempt to use the concession for “tax avoidance” as those words are properly to be understood in law. Thirdly, he said that the procedure adopted by the board in reaching its decision was unfair and in breach of natural justice. The board was, he argued, guilty of procedural impropriety. C

Mr. Ferrier developed his first submission by reference to the decision of the House of Lords in Reg. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, Ex parte National Federation of Self-Employed and Small Businesses Ltd. [1982] A.C. 617. That decision in essence turned on the locus standi of the federation to challenge the failure to collect tax from the so-called Fleet Street casuals, but their Lordships took the view that the point should not have been decided as a preliminary issue: Lord Diplock, for example, concluded that it has not even been shown that the board did anything ultra vires or unlawful. D E

The federation’s case, in part at least, was based on the statutory obligation on the revenue to “collect and cause to be collected every part of the inland revenue:” see section 13 of the Inland Revenue Regulation Act 1890. The complaint was that the revenue by a so-called, but according to Lord Wilberforce inaccurately called, “amnesty” decided not to investigate tax lost in years before 1978–79, and this, it was contended by the federation, was unlawful. The revenue in reply claimed to be making “a special arrangement” for the collection of tax pursuant to the Income Tax (Employments) Regulations 1973 (S.I. 1973 No. 334). Lord Wilberforce regarded what was done as falling within the care and management of the revenue within section 1 of the Taxes Management Act 1970. Lord Diplock, too, regarded it as a managerial function. He said, at p. 637: F G

“I do not doubt, however, and I do not understand any of your Lordships to doubt, that if it were established that the board were proposing to exercise or to refrain from exercising its powers not for reasons of ‘good management’ but for some extraneous or ulterior reason, that action or inaction of the board would be ultra vires and would be a proper matter for judicial review if it were brought to the attention of the court by an applicant with ‘a sufficient interest’ in having the board compelled to observe the law.” H

“It is enough for me to say that I agree with my noble and learned friend that no court considering this evidence could avoid reaching the conclusion that the board and its inspector were acting solely for

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Inspector of Taxes, Ex p. Fulford-Dobson (Q.B.D.)

McNeill J.

‘good management’ reasons and in the lawful exercise of the discretion which the statutes confer on them.”

Of their Lordships, only Lord Scarman referred to Vestey v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [1980] A.C. 1148, and he only on the question of fairness. It is I think plain that to “dispense” with the obligation and power to collect back tax from 4,000 to 5,000 casuals did not attract the criticism that extra-statutory concessions attracted in the Vestey case.

The question of fairness was further considered by their Lordships in Reg. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, Ex parte Preston [1985] A.C. 835. Lord Scarman said, at p. 851g: “My third proposition is that unfairness in the purported exercise of a power can be such that it is an abuse or excess of power.” He referred to Council of Civil Service Unions v. Minister for the Civil Service [1985] A.C. 374, and to his own judgment in H.T.V. Ltd. v. Price Commission [1976] I.C.R. 170.

Mr. Ferrier recognised the force of some later words of Lord Scarman in Ex parte Preston where he said, at p. 852:

“I accept that the court cannot in the absence of special circumstances decide by way of judicial review to be unfair that which the commissioners by taking action against the taxpayer have determined to be fair. But circumstances can arise when it would be unjust, because it would be unfair to the taxpayer, even to initiate action under Part XVII of the Act of 1970”—that is to say, the part dealing with tax avoidance.

In Ex parte Preston the taxpayer complained that having withdrawn certain claims for relief and paid certain tax on the strength of information from an inspector that he, the inspector, did not intend to raise any further inquiries on his tax affairs, the revenue could not reopen the same matter and request further information, but he failed on the facts to get judicial review of the request. It could only be if there was conduct equivalent to breach of contract or breach of representation that the taxpayer could show abuse or excess of jurisdiction.

Mr. Ferrier said that he relied on the formulation of the remedy by Lord Templeman in Ex parte Preston, at p. 862c, and that there were here special circumstances which enabled the court to interfere. He reminded me of Lord Templeman’s words, at p. 864e: “the commissioners themselves must bear in mind that their primary duty is to collect, not to forgive, taxes.”

Mr. Ferrier relied strongly on the passages in the Vestey cases critical of extra-statutory concessions: see the much quoted words of Walton J. in Vestey v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (No. 2) [1979] Ch. 198, 203–204. Walton J.’s criticism in Vestey v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [1979] Ch. 177, 197, received the approval of Lord Wilberforce in Vestey v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (Nos. 1 and 2) [1980] A.C. 1148, 1173: and see Lord Edmund-Davies, at pp. 1194 et seq., and he expressed the view that it was high time to consider the basis of the claim by the executive to make extra-statutory concessions.

It is not difficult to understand their Lordships’ concern in that case. The discretion said to be exercisable there was to assess each of the resident beneficiaries of an overseas discretionary trust on the basis that each was the recipient of the whole of the appointed sums. Secondly, that was said to be consistent with the earlier decision of the House of Lords in Congreve v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [1948] 1 All E.R. 948, which, to reach the result which their Lordships' desired, had to be overruled. A

It is, however, to be noted that although extra-statutory concessions were criticised, Walton J. appears to have accepted that if there was some published code of concessions which applied indifferently to all who fall or can bring themselves within its scope the position might be different. There was no such code in Vestey's case. Lord Edmund-Davies [1980] A.C. 1148, 1194 cited this passage of Walton J. with apparent approval. Lord Wilberforce, at p. 1173A, appears to have accepted, as in the Fleet Street casuals case, that the revenue could act with "administrative common sense." B

Despite the strong words of their Lordships, extra-statutory concessions have persisted. Parliament has not sought to legislate to provide for concessions, despite the words of Scott L.J. in Absalom v. Talbot [1943] 1 All E.R. 589, 598, cited by Lord Edmund-Davies in Vestey's case [1980] A.C. 1148, 1195: C

"The fact that such extra-legal concessions have to be made to avoid unjust hardships is conclusive that there is something wrong with the legislation." D

Mr. Ferrier argued that the existence of concession D2 meant that section 2 of the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979 was unworkable. The reality was, he said, that the assessment was made not under the section but under the concession as limited by the rubric. His difficulty was that if he successfully established that the concession itself was unlawful, it is unnecessary to consider the rubric; it falls with the concession. The taxpayer is then left with section 2 and in no way can Mr. Ferrier argue that he would not be caught by that. Nor am I persuaded that the rubric is discriminatory. It is, in terms, of general application to all those who come within its words. This, of course, does not decide what those words mean; that is the next question to be answered. E

So far as the argument based on Vestey's case is concerned, I am not prepared to hold that concession D2 is unlawful. I consider it as falling well within the concept of good management or of administrative common sense, as those words were used by their Lordships and already cited by me, and they are within the proper exercise of managerial discretion. F

There is really no additional argument of any substance advanced by Mr. Ferrier to isolate the rubric from the concession to say that the concession is lawful but the rubric unlawful. In my judgment, the rubric is effectively part of each concession. It loses none of its force by being given a special and early place in the booklet: indeed, perhaps, it gains force from that. And, indeed, why should a taxpayer have the advantage of a concession when he is attempting to use it for tax avoidance? That, of course, begs the question, what is "tax avoidance" in this context? G

Mr. Ferrier relied strongly on the decision of the House of Lords in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Duke of Westminster [1936] A.C. 1. The issue in that case was whether arrangements entered into between the Duke and his servants were covenants providing for payments to those servants or contracts of employment providing for their remuneration. If the former, the payments were deductible for the purposes of surtax: not otherwise. Their Lordships, by a majority, held the documents on their proper construction to be covenants. It was in H

3 W.L.R. Reg. v. Inspector of Taxes, Ex p. Fulford-Dobson (Q.B.D.) McNeill J.

A that case that Lord Tomlin, at p. 19, delivered the much quoted sentence: "Every man is entitled if he can to order his affairs so as that the tax attaching under the appropriate Acts is less than it otherwise would be." I comment that the words "if he can" are sometimes conveniently forgotten. So, said Mr. Ferrier, tax planning to reduce the incidence of tax is a legitimate exercise. I accept that as a proposition. The question is whether it was on the facts here legitimate.

B Mr. Ferrier invited my attention to the distinction drawn between tax evasion and tax avoidance in Whiteman and Wheatcroft on Income Tax, 2nd ed. (1976), para. 1-15. He then took me to a line of authority which, far from giving to the "supposed doctrine" that in revenue cases the court looks at the substance of the matter, ignoring the legal position, the quietus for which Lord Tomlin hoped, made it clear that
C the court will now look at the substance of transactions to see what the reality was. The fact that the motive for a transaction may be to avoid tax does not invalidate the transaction, unless a statute so provides: per Lord Wilberforce in W. T. Ramsay Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [1982] A.C. 300, 323E. His Lordship there went on to consider the Duke of Westminster's case. If a transaction is genuine the court cannot go behind it to look at some supposed underlying substance, but if there is D a composite transaction it can look to see if there is some underlying purpose. So too in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Burmah Oil Co. Ltd. (1981) 54 T.C. 200 and Furniss v. Dawson [1984] A.C. 474.

E In the former of those cases the principle was formulated by Lord Diplock and adopted expressly by Lord Brightman in the latter. There must be a pre-ordained series of transactions. It may or may not include the achievement of a legitimate commercial object. There must be steps inserted which have no commercial purpose apart from the avoidance of tax. If these conditions exist, the inserted steps are to be disregarded for fiscal purposes. The court must then look at the end result after they are disregarded. These cases are far from the present case. This was, says Mr. Ferrier, a genuine gift from wife to husband; a real transaction between living people.

F Finally, he invited my attention to the recent decision of the Privy Council in Commissioner of Inland Revenue v. Challenge Corporation Ltd. [1987] A.C. 155. The appeal was from New Zealand where the taxing statute provided that every arrangement, the purpose or effect of which was tax avoidance, was void against the commissioner. "Tax avoidance" was defined in section 99(1) of the New Zealand Income Tax Act 1976 in the following terms:
G

" 'Tax avoidance' includes—(a) Directly or indirectly altering the incidence of any income tax: (b) Directly or indirectly relieving any person from liability to pay income tax: (c) Directly or indirectly avoiding, reducing, or postponing any liability to income tax."

H It is right also that I should read further on in section 99 to make the point clear. Subsection (2) provides:

"Every arrangement made or entered into, whether before or after the commencement of this Act, shall be absolutely void as against the commissioner for income tax purposes if and to the extent that, directly or indirectly,—(a) Its purpose or effect is tax avoidance; . . ."

I need not read the remainder of the section.

Lord Templeman distinguished tax evasion, tax avoidance, and what was called tax mitigation. He said, at p. 167: A “Tax evasion also can be dismissed. Evasion occurs when the commissioner is not informed of all the facts relevant to an assessment of tax. Innocent evasion may lead to a re-assessment. Fraudulent evasion may lead to a criminal prosecution as well as re-assessment. In the present case the taxpayer fulfilled its duty to inform the commissioner of all the relevant facts.” B

Nobody suggests here that there is any question of tax evasion. He continued:

“The material distinction in the present case is between tax mitigation and tax avoidance. A taxpayer has always been free to mitigate his liability to tax.” He then quoted the sentence of Lord Tomlin in Duke of Westminster's case [1936] A.C. 1, 19, that I have already read. In that case however the distinction between tax mitigation and tax avoidance was neither considered nor applied. Income tax is mitigated by a taxpayer who reduces his income or incurs expenditure in circumstances which reduce his assessable income or entitle him to reduction in his tax liability. Section 99 does not apply to tax mitigation because the taxpayer's tax advantage is not derived from an ‘arrangement’ but from the reduction of income which he accepts or the expenditure which he incurs. Thus when a taxpayer executes a covenant and makes a payment under the covenant he reduces his income. If the covenant exceeds six years and satisfies certain other conditions the reduction in income reduces the assessable income of the taxpayer. The tax advantage results from the payment under the covenant.” C

Mr. Ferrier seeks to bring himself within that and submits that this was, as I have said, tax planning for the purpose and with the intended effect of mitigating capital gains tax. Lord Templeman continued, at p. 168:

“Section 99 does apply to tax avoidance. Income tax is avoided and a tax advantage is derived from an arrangement when the taxpayer reduces his liability to tax without involving him in the loss or expenditure which entitles him to that reduction. The taxpayer engaged in tax avoidance does not reduce his income or suffer a loss or incur expenditure but nevertheless obtains a reduction in his liability to tax as if he had.” F

Lord Templeman said, at p. 169: G

“In an arrangement of tax avoidance the financial position of the taxpayer is unaffected (save for the costs of devising and implementing the arrangement) and by the arrangement the taxpayer seeks to obtain a tax advantage without suffering that reduction in income, loss or expenditure which other taxpayers suffer and which Parliament intended to be suffered by any taxpayer qualifying for a reduction in his liability to tax. In Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Duke of Westminster [1936] A.C. 1 the Duke avoided tax by reducing his assessable income without reducing his income by the method of substituting an annuity for a wage payable to his gardener. So long as the gardener continued to work, the Duke gained a tax advantage over other taxpayers who paid wages to their working gardeners.” H

McNeill J.

A Mr. Moses submitted for the revenue that the rubric was to be construed as part of the concession, and I have already indicated that I so regard it. As I have said before the rubric is part of each concession and is so to be read. I am reinforced in that view by his submission that if they give a concession the commissioners are entitled to take reasonable steps to prevent the abuse of the concession. They must act fairly and evenhandedly in the administration of the scheme, but there is no abuse or excess of power if they do what they have done here. It is not without significance that neither Mr. Fulford-Dobson in his affidavit, nor the accountants in the correspondence ever suggest unfair treatment or discrimination.

C As to tax avoidance, Mr. Moses submitted, Mr. Fulford-Dobson and the accountants in the passages I have already read from the affidavit and the correspondence make it abundantly clear that the purpose and intent of what was done was to avoid tax. What the Duke of Westminster did was, according to Lord Templeman, tax avoidance. Questions have been raised as to whether that case would now be decided in the same way. Whatever the answer to those questions be, Mrs. Fulford-Dobson is very much, said Mr. Moses, in the position of the Duke. If she had not given Hardings Farm to her husband and the auction had continued while it was still in her name, she would undoubtedly have been chargeable to tax on her gain. The clear inference from the papers was that that was in contemplation until her husband was offered the job in Germany. Then, on advice, things moved quickly. Although Lord Templeman uses the word "arrangement" repeatedly in the course of his speech, the word "arrangement" clearly encompasses both the complicated arrangements described, for example, in W.T. Ramsay Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [1982] A.C. 300 and Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Burmah Oil Co. Ltd., 54 T.C. 200 cases, but also the very simple arrangement here, that is to say, the gift to the husband, the departure of the husband to Germany, and the sale four days afterwards.

F The question, I am bound to say, remains in my mind: did the advisors recognise the significance of the rubric? The trigger to the whole arrangement or operation, misconceived as I am now satisfied it was, was the prospect of saving the capital gains tax on the sale of the farm once the husband was to become non-resident before the date of the auction. That was the tax advantage which could not otherwise be secured. The gift, as Mr. Moses put it, lacked all elements of bounty. It was part of a scheme devised by the accountants and the bankers to avoid tax.

G It seems to be plain as a pikestaff upon the facts that this was tax avoidance as that term is used in the rubric. The taxpayer here, Mr. Fulford-Dobson, suffered no reduction in income, suffered no loss, incurred no expenditure (save his professional advisers' fees and expenses), nothing which, in Lord Templeman's words on the legislation there in point, Parliament intended to be suffered by any taxpayer qualifying for a reduction in his liability for tax. I repeat that from the passage I have already read at p. 169 of his judgment.

H I return to Lord Tomlin's much quoted sentence in the Duke of Westminster's case [1936] A.C. 1, 19: "Every man is entitled if he can" and again I stress those three words "if he can"—"to order his affairs so as that the tax attaching . . . is less than it otherwise would be." It is plain to me, using the same words, that on the facts here it cannot be done, or, more accurately, that the taxpayer, Mr. Fulford-Dobson, could not so order his affairs as to attempt to use concession D2 to avoid tax. What was done was done deliberately for the admitted purpose of tax avoidance, but in total disregard of the clear words limiting the availability of the concession.

Finally, I turn to the last submission that was made, that is to say, that there was a procedural impropriety in the way the matter was handled. In the skeleton argument which he very helpfully provided, Mr. Ferrier claimed that the breaches upon which he relied were that no proper hearing was given to the taxpayer; that there was no effective appeal to an independent arbiter; and that there was secrecy surrounding the procedures which resulted in the taxpaying public and their advisers not knowing the attitude which the revenue was likely to take in cases in which the concession was sought to be applied. This, he said, was not conducive to public confidence in the operation of the extra-statutory concession scheme.

Taking those points in turn, I was invited to consider, first of all, the reported decision of Reg. v. Criminal Injuries Compensation Board, Ex parte Lain [1967] 2 Q.B. 864. In that case, Mr. Ferrier said, there was a code and it was sufficient if the board followed their code. Here, he said, and this is linked with the later point, there is no code or scheme other than appears from the booklet. To my mind, that of itself does not give any ground for saying that there was procedural impropriety.

I was also invited to consider the decision in Chief Constable of the North Wales Police v. Evans [1982] 1 W.L.R. 1155, where their Lordships, and in particular Lord Brightman, analysed the obligations essentially under two headings. (1) Did the constable there subject to disciplinary proceedings know what the allegation against him was? (2) Did he get an opportunity to answer it? On the facts there it was held that he had not had that opportunity. However, here, first of all it is accepted by Mr. Ferrier that the word "hearing" encompasses consideration of written representations. Here it is perfectly clear from the correspondence that the taxpayer knew perfectly well what was being said against him, and the correspondence makes it abundantly clear that he had every opportunity, and took it through his professional advisers, to answer the charges.

So far as appellate procedures are concerned, the answers are two-fold. One is that on the material here the applicants did not have, and concede that they did not have, access to the normal appellate procedure under the legislation. They have the right to come to this court to seek judicial review, but there is nothing which ought to be written into the code as I see it, and I do not think Mr. Ferrier goes so far as to suggest that there should be some additional appellate procedure available in cases which are not within the statutory code.

Finally, so far as secrecy is concerned, I suppose in the broadest possible sense it might be said that tax advisers would like to know what, on a variety of different sets of facts, the revenue is likely to do in the given set of facts. I did not get any real assistance from the reference over to the value added tax tribunals, but of course against that broad desirability, if that is an appropriate phrase, the other side is that the revenue is dealing in each particular case confidentially with the tax affairs of an individual taxpayer. I cannot find that there is anything contrary to procedural propriety in not issuing a series of judgments or decisions on particular sets of facts, and I reject that as a charge of impropriety.

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Inspector of Taxes, Ex p. Fulford-Dobson (Q.B.D.)

McNeill J.

A Mr. Ferrier argued, relying to an extent on the decision already cited, H.T.V. Ltd. v. Price Commission [1976] I.C.R. 170, that if the administrative body (there the Price Commission) changed the rules or the practice in mid-stream, or as he graphically put it, moved the goal posts while the shot was being taken, that can be, and was there regarded, as an unfair practice and procedurally improper. There is not B a shred of evidence to suggest here that the case of this taxpayer was treated in any way inconsistent with the practice of the revenue in dealing with such cases.

In all the circumstances, on the facts and the law, I decline to give the relief sought and the application is dismissed.

I have, of course, to consider one other matter and that is this. The decision here was given on 19 October 1984. The application for judicial C review was not launched until 21 May 1985. There is an explanation given, as it has to be given, on form 86A. It reads:

"The delay in making this application is due to the necessity to consider alternative courses of action and take legal advice thereon and the applicant's illness, and consequent matrimonial upheaval."

D That matter is amplified in Mr. Fulford-Dobson's affidavit at paragraphs 11, 12 and 13. Paragraph 11 reads:

"In October 1984"—that is the month of the decision—"I was temporarily estranged from my wife and suffering from over-addiction to alcohol. 12. I am informed and I believe that on 28 January 1985 my wife and her solicitor were advised by counsel that E an appeal to the commissioners against the decision of the board would be unsuccessful in view of the terms of section 2 of the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979 that 'a person shall be chargeable to capital gains tax in respect of chargeable gains accruing to him in a year of assessment during any part of which he is resident in the United Kingdom' but that decision was subject to judicial review by this Honourable Court."

F I should add that the point then apparently considered by Mrs. Fulford-Dobson, the solicitor and counsel had been plainly put to the accountants in a letter of 21 November 1983 from the inspector of taxes. It is a little surprising that over 12 months elapsed before Mrs. Fulford-Dobson, who in many respects and in reality seems to be the prime mover behind this arrangement, sought that advice. In paragraph 13 Mr. Fulford-Dobson says:

"I completed residential treatment for my alcoholic addiction and re-united with my wife at the end of April 1985. However before documentation could be sent to me the matrimonial situation deteriorated and I am now temporarily residing away from the matrimonial home until our difficulties can be sorted out."

H That affidavit, as I have said, is dated 21 May 1985.

I have had some hesitation over this question because the rules are perfectly clear that proceedings must be brought promptly or within three months of the decision and this application is seven months after the decision. There is power in the court to extend time. It may perhaps be academic in view of the decision I have reached on the facts and the law. I am inclined to the view, but reluctantly, that in the absence of any real investigation of the reasons for the delay that I cannot in

McNeill J. Reg. v. Inspector of Taxes, Ex p. Fulford-Dobson (Q.B.D.) [1987]

discretion refuse relief on the ground of delay alone. I think there are matters on both sides. I do not think the point was taken before the judge who granted leave and I do not think it would be right now on that ground alone to refuse relief, although I express my disquiet at the time which it took to get these proceedings launched. E

In 1984, the plaintiff company and a subsidiary commenced an action against the first and second defendants alleging, inter alia, breach of copyright and obtained an Anton Piller order in respect of copies and originals of the plaintiffs' documents relating to 60 of their house designs. That order having been executed, it appeared to the plaintiffs that only two of their designs had been copied by the defendants and that the defendants had retained no other documents relating to those designs. In 1985, the plaintiffs, suspecting that another of their designs, not covered by the 1984 order, had been substantially copied by the defendants, commenced another action and obtained an Anton Piller order in that action in respect of 105 of their house designs, including all those covered by the 1984 order. On execution of the 1985 order, a number of allegedly infringing drawings were discovered, many of which the plaintiffs claimed should have been disclosed pursuant to the 1984 order or were evidence of breaches of undertakings given in that action. The plaintiffs applied to the court for leave to use the documents obtained on the execution of the 1985 order and the affidavits sworn by the defendants in purported compliance therewith for the purpose of, inter alia, considering and, if so advised, taking proceedings for contempt of court in respect of the 1984 order. The judge refused the application. The Court of Appeal allowed an appeal by the plaintiffs.

G

H

On appeal by the first, second and fourth defendants:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that the implied undertaking on discovery in an action not to use the discovered material for any purpose other than the proper conduct of that action was given to the court and could, in appropriate circumstances, be released or modified by the court, though the importance as a matter of general policy of preserving its integrity was to be emphasised; that no injustice would be done to the defendants if the documents in question were made available for use in the 1984 action for the purposes of proceedings for contempt; and that, accordingly, in the very special circumstances of the case, including the circumstance that it was purely adventitious that there were two actions and that in substance they were a single set of proceedings, the plaintiffs should be released from their implied undertaking (post, pp. 295F–H, 297H–298D, 301H, 303D, 304A, F–G).

A. J. Bekhor & Co. Ltd. v. Bilton [1981] Q.B. 923, C.A. considered.

Per curiam. (i) The proper policing and enforcement of observance of orders made and undertakings given to the court in an action are as much an integral part of the action as any other step taken by a plaintiff in the proper prosecution of his claim. Proceedings for contempt of court are in no way “collateral” to the action in which they are launched (post, pp. 295F–H, 304C–E).

(ii) Section 72 of the Supreme Court Act 1981 has only a peripheral significance in the solution of the present problem. Subsection (4) was probably inserted out of an abundance of caution in order to forestall any possible argument that subsection (3) afforded any protection in cases of contempt of court or perjury whether or not they could be brought under the umbrella of “related offences” (post, pp. 295F–H, 299c, 300H).

APPEALS from the Court of Appeal.

B These were conjoined appeals by the first defendant, David Terrence Marks, and the second and fourth defendants, Wiseoak Homes Ltd. and Wiseoak Residential Ltd., by leave of the House of Lords from the judgment of the Court of Appeal (May, Croom-Johnson and Nourse L.JJ.) [1987] 3 W.L.R. 48 given on 20 February 1987 allowing an appeal by the plaintiffs, Crest Homes Plc., from a decision of Whitford J. Whitford J. had refused the plaintiffs' application for leave to use documents obtained on the execution of an Anton Piller order made in an action brought by them in [1985 against the first, second and fourth] C [defendants and the third] defendant, Barry J. Best, and affidavits sworn by the defendants in purported compliance therewith in the general conduct of an action brought by them in 1984 against the first and second defendants and others and for the purpose of considering and, if so advised, taking proceedings for contempt of court in respect of an Anton Piller order made in the 1984 action.

D The Court of Appeal refused the defendants leave to appeal from their decision, but on 19 March 1987 the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords (Lord Bridge of Harwich, Lord Mackay of Clashfern and Lord Ackner) allowed petitions by the first, second and fourth defendants for leave.

The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Oliver of Aylmerton.

G LORD TEMPLEMAN. My Lords, for the reasons to be given by my noble and learned friend Lord Oliver of Aylmerton I would dismiss this appeal.

H LORD GRIFFITHS. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech to be given by my noble and learned friend Lord Oliver of Aylmerton. I agree with it, and for the reasons he gives I too would dismiss this appeal.

LORD MACKAY OF CLASHFERN. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend Lord Oliver of Aylmerton and for the reasons he gives I too would dismiss this appeal.

LORD OLIVER OF AYLMEYTON. My Lords, the respondents, Crest

Homes Ltd. ("Crest"), are a company carrying on, either themselves or through subsidiary companies, a business of developing and selling land for residential purposes. In the course of that business they have evolved a substantial number of designs and plans of different types of dwelling house and it is not in dispute that they are the owners of the copyright in those designs and plans. On 23 November 1984 Crest, together with its subsidiary company Crest Homes (Westerham) Ltd. ("Westerham"), obtained from Scott J. ex parte an order in the Anton Piller form (Anton Piller KG v. Manufacturing Processes Ltd. [1976] Ch. 55) against the first and second appellants. The first appellant was an employee of Crest and a director of Westerham but had handed in his resignation and left to join the second appellant, a company incorporated in the previous August, as its managing director. The basis of the ex parte application was an allegation that Crest had discovered that a planning application had been made by the second appellant using drawings relating to two of Crest's house designs known as "Carrington" and "Linslade." The order, which followed the usual Anton Piller form, incorporated an undertaking by the plaintiffs to issue and serve a writ and notice of motion and that was done on 26 November 1984. The defendants were the first two appellants and another individual not a party to this appeal. Subsequently further parties were added by amendment. The writ claimed appropriate injunctions restraining infringement of Crest's copyright in the drawings relating to their house designs and misuse of confidential information, an inquiry as to damages and delivery up of infringing material. I will refer to the action thus constituted as "the 1984 action." The order of Scott J. ("the 1984 order") restrained the defendants in the action from parting with possession otherwise than to the plaintiffs' solicitors of an extensive range of documents including "any documents of the plaintiffs or either of them relating to any of their house designs listed on page 2 of exhibit JMC 11" to the affidavit sworn in support of the application and it obliged the first appellant to permit entry to his house for the purpose of searching for, inspecting and removing such documents. The exhibit referred to contained particulars of 60 of Crest's house designs including the Carrington and Linslade designs which had formed the basis of the application. That order was duly executed at the first appellant's house and a number of documents were inspected and removed into the custody of Crest's solicitors. On the first inter partes hearing of the motion before Vinelott J. on 4 December 1984 the matter was adjourned to a date to be fixed on an undertaking substantially in accordance with the injunction granted by Scott J. On 11 December 1984 the first appellant swore an affidavit in which he accepted that the second appellant had made use of drawings relating to the Carrington and Linslade houses and swore that he had no relevant documents in his possession other than those which had been found as a result of the search of his premises on the execution of the order, which documents had been listed in an exhibit to an affidavit of Crest's solicitor. He had previously, pursuant to the order, sworn an affidavit on 30 November 1984 denying that he was in possession of any of the documents or information required by the order. The action thereafter proceeded on the footing that only the Carrington and Linslade designs had been copied and that the first appellant was not in possession of any further documents relating to Crest's designs. On the adjourned hearing of the motion on 17 April 1985 a further undertaking in the terms of the

3 W.L.R.

Crest Homes Plc. v. Marks (H.L.(E.))

Lord Oliver
of Aylmerton

A previous undertaking with certain modifications was given and the motion stood to trial.

As already mentioned, the 1984 order and the undertakings which replaced it related to 60 specified Crest designs. They did not include the design of a house type known as "Versailles." In October 1985, however, Crest discovered that the second appellants were advertising a house which appeared to them to be similar to the Versailles house and, after inspecting the second appellant's planning applications, they concluded that the design was substantially copied from their Versailles design. The relief claimed in the 1984 action was sufficiently wide to cover a claim in respect of such copying and it would, no doubt, have been open to Crest to apply in that action for a further interlocutory injunction specifically to restrain copying of the Versailles design and any other Crest designs not already embraced in the existing undertakings. It seems, however, that they took the view that any infringement in relation to the Versailles design would probably have taken place after the commencement of the 1984 action and would thus constitute a fresh cause of action. They accordingly, on 25 November 1985, commenced a second action against the first and second appellants claiming substantially the same relief as that claimed in the 1984 action and at the same time they obtained and executed a fresh Anton Piller order ("the 1985 order") directed to conducting a search at the second appellant's business premises for documents which included the designs listed in an exhibit to the affidavit in support of the application. This exhibit listed some 105 designs and included (although, it might then have been thought, unnecessarily) the 60 already the subject matter of the existing undertaking. That order was duly executed. No objection was made to the search and numerous drawings were discovered which Crest allege infringe their copyright and which include drawings which Crest allege are copies of designs of some of the 60 types of dwellings specifically made the subject matter of the 1984 order. Crest concluded, therefore, that the existing undertakings had been broken and that the first and second appellants were in breach of the 1984 order. In an affidavit sworn on 17 December 1985 the first appellant admitted that all these documents had been in his possession at the time of the 1984 order but deposed that a representative of Crest's solicitors had consented to his retaining them.

In the light of this history, and if Crest are right in believing that the documents disclosed as a result of the execution of the 1985 order show numerous (and, it must be assumed, deliberate) breaches of the order and undertakings made or given in the 1984 action—and it must be emphasised that this is very much at issue—it is not altogether surprising that they now wish to seek to enforce the order and undertakings by proceedings in the 1984 action for contempt of court. The problem with which they are confronted, however, is that a substantial part of the material which they would require to make use of in prosecuting such an application consists of the documents taken into the possession of their solicitors and the affidavits sworn by or on behalf of the appellants pursuant to the 1985 order.

The purpose of an Anton Piller order is, primarily, the preservation of evidence which might otherwise be removed, destroyed or concealed but it operates, of course, also as an order for discovery in advance of pleadings. It is clearly established and has recently been affirmed in this House that a solicitor who, in the course of discovery in an action, obtains possession of copies of documents belonging to his client's adversary gives an implied undertaking to the court not to use that material nor to allow it to be used for any purpose other than the proper conduct of that action on behalf of his client: see Home Office v. Harman [1983] 1 A.C. 280. It must not be used for any "collateral or ulterior" purpose, to use the words of Jenkins J. in Alterskye v. Scott [1948] 1 All E.R. 469, approved and adopted by Lord Diplock in Harman's case, at p. 302. Thus, for instance, to use a document obtained on discovery in one action as the foundation for a claim in a different and wholly unrelated proceeding would be a clear breach of the implied undertaking: see Riddick v. Thames Board Mills Ltd. [1977] Q.B. 881. It has recently been held by Scott J. in Sybron Corporation v. Barclays Bank Plc. [1985] Ch. 299—and this must, in my judgment, clearly be right—that the implied undertaking applies not merely to the documents discovered themselves but also to information derived from those documents whether it be embodied in a copy or stored in the mind. But the implied undertaking is one which is given to the court ordering discovery and it is clear and is not disputed by the appellants that it can, in appropriate circumstances, be released or modified by the court.

On 24 January 1986, therefore, Crest served notice of motion in the 1985 action on, inter alios, the first and second appellants seeking, so far as might be necessary, orders for the release of the implied undertaking given on the obtaining of the 1985 order to the extent necessary to enable them (a) to use the documents removed into their solicitor's custody pursuant to that order for the conduct of the 1984 action and (b) to use those documents

"for the purpose of considering, and if so advised, preparing, commencing and conducting proceedings in connection with breaches of orders made against and undertakings given by" the first and second appellants in the 1984 action. I say "inter alios" because after the execution of the 1985 order two further defendants were added in the 1985 action, that is to say a Mr. Best, who is not concerned in this appeal, and the third appellant, Wiseoak Residential Ltd., a company which, it appears, is also concerned in the development to which some of the drawings relate.

The motion was heard on 28 February 1986 by Whitford J. who refused the orders sought. In relation to the use of the documents in the general conduct of the 1984 action his ground for refusing an order was that, in so far as they were relevant to that action, they would in any event have to be disclosed on discovery and any deficiency in discovery in that action could be pursued at that stage. That, however, is no longer a live issue, for it was subsequently agreed by the parties at the hearing in the Court of Appeal that, without prejudice to the position as regards proceedings for contempt, no objection would be taken to the use of the documents in the general conduct of the 1984 action. That was obviously sensible because, prior to the hearing of the appeal, the master had given directions that the actions should be listed consecutively and come on for hearing at the same time. As regards the question of the use of the documents for the purposes of proceedings for contempt, Whitford J. rejected Crest's claim on the ground that it was premature until contempt proceedings had been instituted by an appropriate notice of motion. From this decision Crest appealed to the Court of Appeal

3 W.L.R.

Crest Homes Plc. v. Marks (H.L.(E.))

Lord Oliver
of Aylmerton

A which allowed the appeal and made an order on 20 February 1987 that Crest be at liberty to use the documents removed under the 1985 order and three specified affidavits sworn in the 1985 action pursuant to the Anton Piller order for the purposes specified in the notice of motion. That order was subsequently stayed pending the hearing of a petition for leave to appeal to your Lordships' House, which leave was subsequently granted on 19 March 1987.

B In the Court of Appeal the leading judgment was given by Nourse L.J. who, after reviewing the arguments for and against releasing Crest's solicitors from the implied undertaking, was prepared to assume that the arguments against such release ought to prevail were it not for the provisions of section 72 of the Supreme Court Act 1981 which, in his view, was the determinative factor in pointing to the conclusion that the
C appeal should be allowed. My Lords, I have, speaking for myself, found some difficulty in following the reasoning of the Court of Appeal in this respect. I cannot, for my part, regard section 72 as having anything but a peripheral significance in the solution of the problem with which your Lordships are faced. It is a section which was passed in order to meet the difficulty caused by the fact that the Anton Piller order is most frequently made in cases concerned with the infringement of intellectual D property rights. The circumstances in which such infringements take place very frequently involve the commission of a criminal offence or subject the defendant to statutory penalties. They may involve a criminal conspiracy. Where they do, apart from the section, this enables the defendant to claim that the privilege against self-incrimination entitles him to have any order for discovery or production set aside, a claim
E which was upheld in this House in Rank Film Distributors Ltd. v. Video Information Centre [1982] A.C. 380. In order to meet that situation the section deprives the defendant, in proceedings to which it relates, of his right to a claim to be excused from answering questions or complying with an order of the court on the grounds that the answers or compliance might expose him to proceedings of a penal nature and, as a quid pro quo, safeguards his position by providing that no statement made or F answer given shall be admissible as evidence in such proceedings. The section, however, expressly excludes from the proceedings in which such statements are to be inadmissible proceedings for perjury or contempt of court. The side-note to the section is "Withdrawal of privilege against incrimination of self or spouse in certain proceedings" and section 72 is, so far as material, in the following terms:

G "(1) In any proceedings to which this subsection applies a person shall not be excused, by reason that to do so would tend to expose that person . . . to proceedings for a related offence or for the recovery of a related penalty—(a) from answering any question put to that person in the first-mentioned proceedings; or (b) from complying with any order made in those proceedings. (2) Subsection
H (1) applies to the following civil proceedings in the High Court, namely—(a) proceedings for infringement of rights pertaining to any intellectual property or for passing off; (b) proceedings brought to obtain disclosure of information relating to any infringement of such rights or to any passing off; and (c) proceedings brought to prevent any apprehended infringement of such rights or any apprehended passing off. (3) Subject to subsection (4), no statement or admission made by a person—(a) in answering a question put to him in any proceedings to which subsection (1) applies; or (b) in complying with any order made in any such proceedings, shall, in proceedings for any related offence or for the recovery of any related penalty, be admissible in evidence against that person . . . (4) Nothing in subsection (3) shall render any statement or admission made by a person as there mentioned inadmissible in evidence against that person in proceedings for perjury or contempt of court.”

Subsection (5) contains a number of definitions. For present purposes I need only to refer to the definition of “related offence” which is in these terms:

“ ‘related offence,’ in relation to any proceedings to which subsection (1) applies, means—(a) in the case of proceedings within subsection (2)(a) or (b)—(i) any offence committed by or in the course of the infringement or passing off to which those proceedings relate; or (ii) any offence not within sub-paragraph (i) committed in connection with that infringement or passing off, being an offence involving fraud or dishonesty; (b) in the case of proceedings within subsection (2)(c), any offence revealed by the facts on which the plaintiff relies in those proceedings; . . . ”

My Lords, I confess that I have found the section far from easy to construe. This much is clear, that the privilege against self-incrimination is withdrawn only so far as the answer or compliance with the order would expose the defendant to proceedings for a “related offence”—I leave aside penalties which must, I think, clearly refer to statutory penalties and have no relevance in the context of the instant case. Secondly, to be a related offence, the offence must be one which is committed by the very act of infringement complained of or one committed in the course of carrying out that infringement or it must be an offence involving fraud or dishonesty which is committed in connection with the infringement complained of or an offence revealed by the facts on which the plaintiff relies in the proceedings. The difficulty arises in relation to subsection (4). “Offence” hardly seems an appropriate word to describe a civil contempt but the assumption seems to be that the perjury or contempt referred to must be a related offence, for otherwise subsection (3) could not in any event have affected the admissibility of the statement or admission. At the same time, it is not easy to envisage how a contempt of court could be committed in carrying out the very infringement of which complaint is made in the proceedings save where, as is alleged here, the proceedings relate to an infringement constituting a breach of an order in some other proceedings—a circumstance which must be so rare that it can hardly have been in the draftsman’s contemplation. Equally it is not easy to see how it can be “revealed by” the facts on which the plaintiff relies in the proceedings, although one can readily see that the contempt itself, when committed, may be a fact which the plaintiff will seek to rely upon at the trial in support of his claim for quia timet relief. The probability is, as it seems to me, that the subsection was inserted out of an abundance of caution in order to forestall any possible argument that subsection (3) afforded any protection in cases of contempt of court or perjury whether or not they could be brought under the umbrella of “related offences.” But whether that is so or not, in so far as the contempt or perjury is a related offence subsection (1) clearly destroys any claim to privilege on the ground of

3 W.L.R.

Crest Homes Plc. v. Marks (H.L.(E.))

Lord Oliver

A self-incrimination. Equally clearly the admissibility in evidence in proceedings for contempt of statements or admissions remains unaffected by the section. Moreover while subsection (1) destroys any claim to privilege in relation to compliance with the order, whether by making statements or answering questions or by permitting entry, search and removal, subsection (3) is confined to the admissibility of a "statement or admission" and confers no protection in relation to the admissibility in evidence of documents or material removed into custody under the order. Having said that, however, I have not for my part been able to attach to the section the critical importance which appears to have been attached to it by the Court of Appeal as a factor to be taken into account in determining whether the undertaking should be released to the extent sought by Crest. In so far as a possible contempt of court in the 1984 action is an offence related to the infringements complained of in the 1985 action the section effectively precluded any objection being taken to the 1985 order on the ground of possible self-incrimination. Beyond that it did no more than preserve the admissibility in evidence of statements and admissions which, once made, would in any event have been admissible. At highest it can be said only to demonstrate an intention on the part of the legislature that the quid pro quo for the removal of the privilege which might otherwise have prevented the evidence being given should not extend to proceedings for contempt. For my part, therefore, I derive little assistance from this section.

Was, then, the Court of Appeal right in reversing the decision of Whitford J. and making the order of 20 February 1987? The refusal of the leave sought at first instance on the ground of prematurity cannot, I think, have been right for it involved the consequence that no use could be made of the documents without a prior notice of motion in a case where, if Crest were right, no notice of motion could have been prepared without using the documents. Mr. Morritt, however, on behalf of the corporate appellants, has rightly drawn attention to the importance, stressed in Home Office v. Harman [1983] 1 A.C. 280, of preserving the implied undertaking. It should not be relaxed, it is said, as a matter of public policy, for otherwise litigants may be deterred from making full and frank disclosure. Additionally it is submitted that in substance Crest's application is one for discovery in aid of a contemplated motion for contempt which ought not to be permitted and reference is made to the decision of the Court of Appeal in A. J. Bekhor & Co. Ltd. v. Bilton [1981] Q.B. 923. If, it is said, Crest had applied in the 1984 action for discovery of documents in aid of a motion for contempt, the application would have been refused because the court will not order a defendant to discover documents for the purpose of incriminating him. It would not, therefore, it is argued, be right to produce by a relaxation of the undertaking in the 1985 action a result which could not have been produced by an application in the action in which the alleged contempt occurred.

My Lords, I would not wish anything said in your Lordships' House to be thought to detract from the integrity of the implied undertaking given to the court on behalf of a party obtaining an order for discovery. Nevertheless, in the very special circumstances of this case, I find myself unimpressed by the arguments adduced on behalf of the appellants. So far as concerns the effect of a relaxation of the undertaking upon the performance of the obligation to make full and frank disclosure, there are two points. In the first place, that obligation can be of little relevance in relation to the seizure of documents and materials under an Anton Piller order, the whole purpose of which is to gain possession of material evidence without giving the defendant the opportunity of considering whether or not he shall make any disclosure at all. Indeed the justification for the application is the likelihood that, short of immediate and unheralded intervention, relevant material is likely to be spirited away or destroyed. Secondly, so far as concerns free and frank disclosure under the compulsion of that part of the order which requires the defendant to swear an affidavit, the point may have some general validity but in a case where, if Crest are right, the absence of free and frank disclosure on a previous occasion is manifest, an appeal to it has a somewhat hollow ring.

As regards the suggestion that to release the undertaking now would, in effect, be to deprive the appellants of an opportunity which they would otherwise have had, had the application been made in the 1984 action, to resist disclosure and production of the material sought on the ground that discovery was being required in aid of contempt proceedings and would thus involve self-incrimination, this is, in my judgment, misconceived. The 1985 order, if it had been applied for in the 1984 action, could perfectly properly have been made in that action. It is true that in A. J. Bekhor & Co. Ltd. v. Bilton the Court of Appeal held that an order for discovery in aid of a Mareva injunction (Mareva Compania Naviera S.A. v. International Bulkcarriers S.A. [1975] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 509) ought not to be made for the purpose, not of discovering the whereabouts of assets, but of ascertaining whether there had been past breaches of the injunction. But that is a long way removed from the instant case, where the application was directed simply to the preservation of evidence in relation to infringing material not covered by the existing undertakings and it is purely adventitious that it happens (assuming always that Crest are right in what they allege) incidentally to have uncovered evidence of breaches of those undertakings. On the execution of the 1985 order the appellants were advised of their right to seek legal advice before compliance and they availed themselves of it. If, of course, the contempt alleged by Crest was a "related offence," they had no privilege to plead; but if they took the view that any breaches of the undertakings which might have been exposed were not "related offences," it was open to them, if they wished, to seek to discharge the order or to take an objection on the ground of self-incrimination when they came to swear affidavits in compliance with the order. They did not do so and there is no question but that the evidence of which Crest now seek to make use was perfectly properly obtained. It is clearly established that although a contemnor is not a compellable witness in proceedings against him for contempt, if he gives evidence he can be cross-examined upon it in relation to the contempt alleged: Comet Products U.K. Ltd. v. Hawtex Plastics Ltd. [1971] 2 Q.B. 67. I cannot, therefore, for my part, agree that, simply because the application which produced the evidence was made in the 1985 action, the release of the undertaking which is now sought will deprive the appellants of some protection which would have been available to them if it had been made in the action in which it is now sought to move for contempt. The material which, it is claimed, has been uncovered would clearly have been discoverable on general discovery in that action so far as it related to the 60 house types covered by the 1984 order, although it may well be

- A that an application for discovery of that material specifically for the purpose of supporting a motion for contempt would have been unsuccessful. Thus much, if not all, of the material covered by the implied undertaking in the 1985 action would in any event have had to have been made available in the 1984 action although possibly at a later stage. It is said that on general discovery in the 1984 action the appellants would, so far as they were able to demonstrate that any contempt committed was not a "related offence," have been able to resist disclosure by pleading the privilege against self-incrimination. That may be right, although if it is it produces the extraordinary result that a defendant, by putting himself in contempt of court, can successfully resist discovery of relevant documents at any stage of the proceedings. Thus logically a defendant who, in response to an order for verification of his list of documents by affidavit, makes inadequate discovery can thereafter resist any application for discovery of particular documents on the ground that to comply would demonstrate that he had been in breach of the earlier order and thus in contempt. I cannot think that that can be right, but it is unnecessary to decide the point since such an objection, if open at all, would have been equally open on the execution of the 1985 order and was not taken. I can, therefore, in the circumstances of this case, discern no injustice to the appellants if the documents are made available for use in the 1984 action. Should the point arise for decision it may be necessary in relation to the production of relevant documents essential to the conduct of proceedings—I say nothing about interrogatories—to reconsider the extent of the privilege against self-incrimination where it is prayed in aid solely on the ground of liability to a motion for civil contempt in those proceedings.

- E My Lords, although I have, for my part, found the appellants' arguments less than convincing, they can and do fairly say that it is not for them to advance reasons why the implied undertaking should not be released but rather for the respondents to demonstrate cogent and persuasive reasons why it should be released. To that I now turn. Mr. Henderson, on behalf of the respondents, whilst accepting the importance, as a matter of general policy, of preserving the integrity of undertakings given to the court as the price of discovery, submits that there is an equally important countervailing consideration of public policy that orders of the court should be obeyed. I accept that, but if what was in issue here was the revelation of a civil contempt in some wholly unrelated proceeding I would not for my part consider that the importance of ensuring obedience to the court's orders outweighed that of ensuring the continued observance of an undertaking given to the court by the party obtaining discovery. Your Lordships have been referred to a number of reported cases in which application has been made for the use of documents obtained under Anton Piller orders or on general discovery for the purpose of proceedings other than those in which the order was made. Examples were Halcon International Inc. v. Shell Transport and Trading Co. Ltd. [1979] R.P.C. 97 and Sybron Corporation v. Barclays Bank Plc. [1985] Ch. 299. I do not, for my part, think that it would be helpful to review these authorities for they are no more than examples and they illustrate no general principle beyond this, that the court will not release or modify the implied undertaking given on discovery save in special circumstances and where the release or modification will not occasion injustice to the person giving discovery.

As Nourse L.J. observed in the course of his judgment in the instant case, each case must turn on its own individual facts. In the instant case [1987] 3 W.L.R. 48, 58, the determinative point to my mind is that it is purely adventitious that there happened to be two actions. That has been brought about partly by purely technical considerations and partly, as Crest allege, by the appellants' failure to make full and frank disclosure under the 1984 order, and the fact that the parties to the two actions are not identical is quite immaterial. The cause of action is the same in each and the first and second appellants are defendants in both. The remaining defendants could equally well have been joined as defendants in a single set of proceedings. Thus it is a pure technicality that the 1985 order happens to have been made in proceedings other than those in which Crest seek to move to enforce the undertakings. It has been submitted that proceedings for contempt of court are always to be regarded, for the purpose of the implied undertaking on discovery, as "collateral" to the action in which they are launched, so that even if the 1985 order had been made in the 1984 action it would still have been necessary to seek the leave of the court to use the material thus discovered for the purposes of the motion for contempt in that action. My Lords, I find myself quite unable to accept that submission. The proper policing and enforcement or observance of orders made and undertakings given to the court in an action are, in my judgment, as much an integral part of the action as any other step taken by a plaintiff in the proper prosecution of his claim. The normal procedure where the contempt complained of is that of a party to the action is to apply for committal by motion in that action as an incidental step in the action. There is, in my judgment, nothing "collateral" or "alien" about enforcement of the court's order in the action in which discovery is obtained and I do not entertain any doubt at all that documents disclosed on discovery in the action can perfectly properly be used for the purpose of taking such a step without in any way infringing the implied undertaking and without the necessity of obtaining the prior leave of the court.

The evidence in the instant case discloses that there is, to put it no higher, at least a serious question to be investigated as to whether there has not been a deliberate contempt by flouting the court's orders and breaking undertakings freely given to the court in the 1984 action. In substance the 1984 action and the 1985 action are a single set of proceedings—a circumstance emphasised by the order that the two should be heard together—and the fact that, because, for reasons good or bad, Crest's claim has been prosecuted by the issue of two writs instead of one, the court's leave is required for the use of the documents obtained under the 1985 order is the merest technicality. To accede to Crest's application will, in these circumstances, cause no injustice to the appellants nor will it detract from the solemnity and importance of the implied undertaking. Although, therefore, I have not felt able to agree fully with the reasoning of the Court of Appeal so far as it was based upon section 72 of the Act of 1981, I have been left in no doubt that the conclusion at which that court arrived was correct. I would accordingly dismiss the appeal.

Police—Duties—Law enforcement—Chief constable providing officers to attend inside ground at football matches—Whether “special police services” provided “at the request of” football club—Whether police authority entitled to charge for attendances—Police Act 1964 (c. 48), s. 15(1)

Football matches took place at premises in Sheffield belonging to the defendants, a club. Until 1970 the club had made special arrangements for the attendance of police officers at matches for which payments had been made. Thereafter the police had continued to attend at matches both inside and outside the ground but the club formed the view that the chief constable was obliged to arrange for police attendance in order to fulfil his duty to maintain law and order and to protect life and property. Accordingly they refused to make any payments to the police authority. The plaintiff, acting on behalf of the police authority for the district in which the football ground was situated issued a writ against the club claiming £51,669 for the services of police officers inside their ground between August 1982 and November 1983 on the ground that the attendances constituted “special police services” within the meaning of section 15(1) of the Police Act 1964¹ and for which the police authority were entitled to make a charge. The club in their defence denied any liability claiming that the attendances did not constitute “special police services” as the chief constable in arranging for officers to attend inside the ground was doing no more than carrying out his duties. Further the club denied that they had since December 1983 “requested” police services at the ground for the purposes of section 15(1) of the Act and they sought by way of counterclaim a declaration that they were not liable to make any payments for police services unless they requested attendance by officers to fulfill roles other than police duty. Boreham J. found as a fact that at some matches at the club’s ground violence was almost certain unless the police attended in substantial numbers but he concluded that the attendances inside the club’s ground did not constitute “special police services” within the meaning of the statutory provisions and that the services had at all material times been “requested” by the club. He gave judgment in favour of the police authority.

On appeal by the club:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, (1) that in deciding what constituted “special police services” for the purpose of section 15(1) of the Police Act 1964 it was necessary to look at all the circumstances of the individual case; that the court should bear in mind that in exercising his discretion to carry out his public duty to keep the peace and enforce the law a chief constable was entitled to have regard to the resources available to him and the cost of providing them; and that it was relevant to consider whether the services were required on private premises, the nature of the occasion and when they were required; that, accordingly, in the circumstances, the provision of police officers to attend regularly at the club’s football ground throughout the season to guard against the possibility of violence constituted the provision of “special police services” for which a charge could properly be made (post, pp. 315G—317c, 319D—F, 320A—B, D—E).

Glasbrook Brothers Ltd. v. Glamorgan County Council [1925] A.C. 270, H.L.(E.) considered.

(2) That in order for the football matches to take place it was necessary that police officers attended inside the ground to enable the club to meet its responsibilities to the public and that it followed that in such circumstances a request for their attendance by the club was to be implied (post, pp. 317c—F, 320c—D, D—E).

Per Balcombe L.J. Cases involving the policing of political events where public disorder is threatened are not in pari materia and the dismissal of the present appeal does not pose any threat to the political freedoms which the citizen of this country enjoys (post, p. 320c).

APPEAL from Boreham J.

By writ dated 12 December 1983 the plaintiff, Mr. John Charles Harris, acting on behalf of the South Yorkshire Police Authority, claimed against the defendants, Sheffield United Football Club Ltd., £51,669 plus interest of £19,810 for police services at the club's football ground at Bramall Lane, Sheffield. By way of counterclaim dated 8 February 1984 the club sought a declaration that they were not liable for such charges. On 26 March 1986 Boreham J. allowed the claim and dismissed the counterclaim holding that the police authority were entitled to make charge for attending inside the club's ground, the attendances constituting "special police services" for the purposes of section 15(1) of the Police Act 1964.

By a notice dated 23 April 1986 the club appealed on the grounds that the judge was wrong in deciding (1) that the court had to view the services of police officers at home fixtures as a whole and not break them down into their constituent parts; (2) that the chief constable could decide which request to carry out; that duty could only be answered if the services were paid for; (3) that the chief constable could take steps to prevent an event if it would be productive of disorder, other than under the provisions of section 10 of the Safety of Sports Grounds Act

- A 1975; (4) that the chief constable was entitled to say if there was a threat to law and order on private land "my resources in men and money are limited, I cannot afford to provide the service [of police officers] unless [the owners of the land] pay for them;" (5) that the law and order protection given to the club was more extensive than that given to an ordinary citizen; (6) that (a) refusing entry to those who tried to enter the ground without paying and (b) prohibiting spectators encroaching on parts of the ground which their entry fee did not entitle them to enter was outside the duty of the chief constable; (7) that police services at the ground had to be viewed as a whole taking into account services other than the maintenance of law and order, and were not severable, even when since at least January 1984 the club had not requested the chief constable to do other than his duty, as defined by the judge;
- B (8) that if services provided by the chief constable were of a kind which was similar to those which he provided in pursuance of his public duty such services could be special police services; (9) that the club had created a special need for protection; (10) that the protection to which the police at the request of the club were committed in advance each week, was against possible future breaches of the peace; (11) that there was at home fixtures, except in some cases, nearly a possibility of a breach of the peace; (12) that the police were expected and further were requested by the club since at least about January 1984 to do other than their duty, and (13) that after about December 1983 or at all the club had made any request for special police services.

Cur. adv. vult.

19 March. The following judgments were handed down.

- F NEILL L.J. This is an appeal from the order of Boreham J. dated 26 March 1986. It raises a question as to the responsibility for the cost of providing for the attendance of police officers inside the ground of the Sheffield United Football Club at Bramall Lane in Sheffield on the occasions when league or other important football matches are played at the ground. We have been told that the answer to this question is of some general interest both to police authorities and to other leading football clubs.

- G It is the case for the South Yorkshire police authority, within whose area the Bramall Lane ground lies, that the attendance of police officers on these occasions constitutes the provision of "special police services" within the meaning of section 15(1) of the Police Act 1964, and that as the provision of these services has been expressly or impliedly requested
- H by the club, the police authority is entitled to make charges therefor. It is the case for the club on the other hand that as the chief constable of Sheffield has at all material times been of the opinion that the attendance of police officers on these occasions has been necessary for the maintenance of law and order and to protect life and property, the club is not liable to make any payment; the police have been merely carrying out their public duty. It is further argued on behalf of the club that even if it is held that "special police services" were provided at the club's request before 26 October 1983, after that date the club has made no request for the provision of any police services beyond those which the police are required to provide in pursuance of their duty to the public.

In the action which was instituted by the police authority the sum of £51,699.54 was claimed as the aggregate of charges for the services of police officers at the club's ground on various dates between 14 August 1982 and 13 November 1983. The club disputed liability on the grounds which I have indicated and by way of counterclaim sought a declaration that it was not liable to make any payment to the police authority save where the club requested the attendance of officers to "fulfill roles other than the police duty." Before the judge the counterclaim also included, inter alia, a claim to recover certain sums paid to the authority before August 1982, but this matter is no longer pursued and I need say no more about it.

The action was tried by Boreham J. at Sheffield in February 1986 and in a reserved judgment delivered on 26 March 1986 the judge upheld the claim by the police authority and dismissed the counterclaim. The club has appealed to this court.

I shall come a little later to examine the events which have given rise to the present litigation but I think it is convenient to start by setting the case in its historical perspective and by identifying those matters which are common ground. The claim by the police authority is a claim in contract. It is conceded on behalf of the police authority, however, that if the officers attended merely in order to enable the chief constable to carry out his duty to maintain law and order no charge could or can be made to the club because any "agreement" to pay would not be supported by consideration.

It is conceded by the club on the other hand that if the attendance of the officers amounted to the provision of "special police services" then, subject to the subsidiary argument as to whether these services were requested after 26 October 1983, the charges are recoverable in accordance with section 15(1) of the Act of 1964. I turn at once therefore to section 15(1) which provides:

"The chief officer of police of any police force may provide, at the request of any person, special police services at any premises or in any locality in the police area for which the force is maintained, subject to the payment to the police authority of charges on such scales as may be determined by that authority."

The words "special police services" are not defined in the Act, but it is clear that the section provides statutory authority for a long-established practice whereby police officers have been made available to carry out functions at private premises in return for payment to the relevant police authority. The existence of the practice before 1964 has not been challenged, but nevertheless, as the nature of the services provided in this case is at the core of the dispute, it may be helpful to refer to some of the relevant passages in the authorities and documents to which our attention was drawn. It is sufficient to start with the Police Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. 27, c. 45). This Act was passed to make provision for, inter alia, the pensions and allowances to be paid to police constables in England and Wales. By section 16 it was provided that every police force should have a pension fund, and by section 16(1)(e) it was further provided that there should be carried to that fund

Neill L.J.

A “such proportion of any sum received on account of constables whose services have been lent in consideration of payment as the police authority may consider to be a fair contribution to the pension fund in respect of those constables . . .”

B Viscount Cave L.C., referred to this provision in the Act of 1890 in Glasbrook Brothers Ltd. v. Glamorgan County Council [1925] A.C. 270, where the legality of the payment for police services was challenged. He said, at p. 280:

C “I find it difficult to believe that if the legislature had considered the practice of lending constables for special duty, which in the year 1890 was of daily occurrence, to be against public policy, it would have provided for the application of payments received in consideration of such lending to pension purposes; and it appears to me that this statutory recognition of the practice in question affords a strong argument in favour of its legality.”

A little earlier in his speech Viscount Cave L.C. referred to the practice of “lending” the services of police constables in these terms, at p. 278:

D “Instances are the lending of constables on the occasions of large gatherings in and outside private premises, as on the occasions of weddings, athletic or boxing contests or race meetings, and the provision of constables at large railway stations.”

E The practice was also noticed without disapproval by Scrutton L.J. in the same case in the Court of Appeal [1924] 1 K.B. 879, where he said, at pp. 890–891:

F “There is no doubt that for many years police authorities have furnished for payment, at the request of individual citizens, policemen to perform duties in the nature of maintaining order or preventing crime. Instances are where valuable property is temporarily and temptingly exposed to mixed assemblies, as at weddings, to guard the presents, or sales or bazaars; or where assemblies are likely to produce disorder, as at races, or football meetings, or to regulate traffic to private festivities, such as dances. It would take very clear authority to persuade me this is illegal.”

G It is also clear from the decision in the Glasbrook case that the provision of protection in the context of an industrial dispute may in certain circumstances constitute the provision of special police services for which a charge can be made. Moreover it is to be observed that in Glamorgan Coal Co. Ltd. v. Glamorganshire Standing Joint Committee (1916) 114 L.T. 717, 718 (not reported on this point in [1916] 2 K.B. 206) Phillimore L.J. stated in the context of a coal strike in South Wales, where a colliery company had asked for 24 policemen on special duty, that the request meant “that they would have to pay the usual charge for police sent on special request for private protection . . .”

H Further information as to the existence and understanding of the practice is to be found in the report of the Shortt Committee which was set up in June 1923 following the events at the first Cup Final held at Wembley Stadium on 28 April 1923 (the Report of the Departmental Committee on Crowds (1924) (Cmd. 2058)). In their report the committee considered the existing arrangements for the control of crowds in and around sports grounds. In paragraph 20 of the report they turned to deal with the provision of police for duty inside grounds. The paragraph included these passages:

"At present the number of police to be provided on any particular occasion is settled by consultation between the ground authorities and the Chief Officer of Police, and the former are charged for the services of the police at rates fixed by the police authority. It is evident that the number of police to be supplied cannot be determined by any mathematical formula according to the size of the ground or the number of spectators which it will accommodate; nor is it possible to say with certainty in advance that any particular number of police will or will not be adequate to deal with all emergencies that may arise. The most that can be done is to form an estimate based on previous experience and on the best information that is available. . . . The evidence which we have received indicates that in practice any dispute as to the number of police to be employed at private cost is of the rarest occurrence; . . . It is true that the duty of preserving law and order is one for which the local police authority and the Chief Officer of Police are primarily responsible, and it is arguable that persons who cause the assembling of large crowds in an area under their control may reasonably be expected to pay the whole cost of any police whom the responsible authority consider may be required to ensure the preservation of order in that area.

"We are agreed that the opinion of the chief officer must ultimately prevail and that the management of a ground which disregards his advice must incur heavy responsibility, but we feel that the present system should be allowed to continue, by which the spirit of co-operation between the parties concerned is encouraged. . . . Yet if it should prove that the ground authorities persistently fail to secure provision of an adequate police contingent inside the ground, then there should be no question that the chief constable should have power to require the provision of such additional police as he thinks necessary, subject to proposals set out in the following paragraph."

In the following paragraph the committee suggested that as the employment of the police was not solely for private advantage but also served a useful public purpose the rates to be fixed should be at something less than the full cost of the men concerned.

It is against this background that one comes to examine the facts and the submissions in the instant case. It is accepted on behalf of the club, at any rate for the purpose of the present appeal, that the arrangements which were made between the club and the police authority before the 1939-45 war, and indeed until about 1970, for the attendance of police officers inside the ground at Bramall Lane amounted to arrangements for the provision of special police services. It is further accepted that these arrangements were made at the request of the club and that the police authority was entitled to make a charge for attendance of the police officers; before 1964 the charge could be justified as being in accordance with the decision in Glasbrook Brothers Ltd. v. Glamorgan County Council [1925] A.C. 270. Between 1964 and about 1970 the charge could be justified as being made in accordance with section 15(1) of the Police Act 1964. Since about 1970, however, and certainly in the last ten years, the position, it is said, has changed in a fundamental

A respect. It is true, submitted Mr. Griffiths, that until the end of October 1983, the club continued to request the attendance of police officers at the ground, or at any rate must be taken to have made such requests, but in recent years these requests did not give rise to any legal liability to pay for the attendance, because the chief constable was obliged to B arrange for the attendance of these officers in any event so that he could fulfil his duties to maintain law and order and to protect life and property. Accordingly there was no consideration for any offer or promise by the club, whether express or implied, to pay for the attendance.

Placed in the forefront of Mr. Griffiths' argument were statements of principle on this matter to be found in the speeches in the House of Lords in Glasbrook Brothers Ltd. v. Glamorgan County Council
C [1925] A.C. 270. In that case a question arose as to the right of a police authority to make a charge for billeting a number of police officers on colliery premises on the occasion of a strike. The House ruled by a majority that a charge could be made if the amount of protection requested by the agent of the colliery owners exceeded that which the senior police officer reasonably considered to be necessary in the circumstances. But there are clear statements in the D speeches to the effect that if the scale of protection was no more than that which the police thought to be necessary no charge could properly be made. Viscount Cave L.C. put the matter as follows, at p. 277:

“No doubt there is an absolute and unconditional obligation binding the police authorities to take all steps which appear to them to be necessary for keeping the peace, for preventing crime, or for E protecting property from criminal injury; and the public, who pay for this protection through the rates and taxes, cannot lawfully be called upon to make a further payment for that which is their right.”

Later in his speech he applied this statement of principle to the facts, at
p. 281:

F “If in the judgment of the police authorities, formed reasonably and in good faith, the garrison was necessary for the protection of life and property, then they were not entitled to make a charge for it, for that would be to exact a payment for the performance of a duty which they clearly owed to the appellants and their servants; but if they thought the garrison a superfluity and only acceded to [the G owners' agent's] request with a view to meeting his wishes, then in my opinion they were entitled to treat the garrison duty as special duty and to charge for it.”

And Lord Blanesburgh (whose dissent on the facts does not affect the question of principle) said, at p. 306, that the “absolute duty” of the police “to afford protection to life and property was only, I think, H limited by the extent of their available resources and by the urgency of competing claims upon their services.”

Armed with these statements as to the duty of the police, Mr.
Griffiths directed our attention to the facts and to certain passages in the evidence. It is common ground that until about 1970 the normal number of police officers attending a match at Bramall Lane was 20, though a few more were needed when the ground was full to capacity. In those days, as the judge recorded in his judgment, the main concern of the police was to ensure that spectators were able to watch in safety and comfort and that both entry to and egress from the ground was smooth and unobstructed. In addition there were other subsidiary duties such as supervision of the takings at the turnstiles and ensuring that there was no entry on to the pitch. In the 1970's and 1980's, however, the position changed. The crowds have decreased so that instead of gates sometimes in excess of 40,000 the average gate is about 12,000. But at the same time the behaviour of the crowds has deteriorated with the supporters of some clubs being particularly unruly, aggressive and disruptive. As a result (a) the number of officers required for duty inside the ground has increased to a figure varying between about 30 and 80 or more; and (b) the emphasis of the policing has changed so that, although other duties such as crowd management and the enforcement of the club's ground regulations are still carried out, the main function of the police inside the grounds has become the maintenance of law and order.

The club itself has taken steps to deal with the changed situation. The advice of an experienced engineer has been taken and as a result a number of safety measures have been introduced including adequate crush barriers and the careful siting and construction of gangways. In addition high and substantial fencing has been erected around three sides of the ground to contain the standing spectators. The judge drew attention to these measures in his judgment and paid tribute to the fact that as a result Bramall Lane is one of the safest of soccer grounds. Furthermore for some years the club has employed a number of part-time stewards to assist in crowd management, the securing of exits and the enforcement of the club's ground regulations.

Mr. Griffiths accepted that the club itself had a duty to safeguard the safety of those who came to Bramall Lane, either as players or spectators, as well as to the club's own staff. Mr. Griffiths also accepted that while on the club's premises the police officers contributed, as they had done in the past, to crowd management and safety and to the enforcement of the club's ground regulations. But, said Mr. Griffiths, such matters as the enforcement of the club's ground regulations did not provide the main reason for the presence of the police. It was common ground, he emphasised, that the presence of the police was necessary to maintain law and order and to protect life and property; indeed it was unthinkable that a league match could take place without the presence of the police and it was quite plain that the chief constable would take such steps as he could to prevent a match taking place if the club declined to request a police presence.

In order to demonstrate the importance which the chief constable himself attached to the presence of the police, Mr. Griffiths drew our attention to passages in the judgment where the judge dealt with the arrangements which were made between the club and the police. The judge referred to the five clubs (including the club and Sheffield Wednesday) within the police authority's area, and continued:

"In July or August of each year the senior police officer responsible for the policing operations meets the chairmen and secretaries of each of the five clubs. Together they review the policing arrangements made during the previous season, discuss problems which have arisen and consider the policing requirements for the forthcoming season. When the season begins the divisional commander in whose area a particular ground is situated discusses with the club the

A number of uniformed officers required for each home game. Those numbers depend in part on the expected size of the crowd and in part on the number and reputation of the visitors' supporters. . . . At the beginning of each week an operation order is compiled by the police and circulated within the force and to the club. Such an order is before the court. It contains detailed instructions for policing each particular part of the ground, crowd control and for the enforcement of the club's ground regulations. . . . The manpower required for these operations is, as I have indicated, considerable. It cannot be provided by officers who would normally be on duty at the relevant times, without adversely affecting normal policing requirements elsewhere in the authority's area. It is, therefore, provided by extending the shifts of those involved and by calling on officers who would otherwise have been on rest day. This involves the payment of substantial overtime."

A little earlier in his judgment the judge described the steps taken by the police to maintain law and order by keeping the supporters of the rival clubs segregated at all times. He described the operation in these terms:

D "To achieve this the police have mounted a combined operation at all home matches, between the officers on duty outside the ground and those on duty inside. First, the club's supporters are admitted through particular turnstiles to terracing at the end of the ground known as the Kop. Secondly the visiting supporters are met at the railway station or their coach park and escorted to turnstiles at the opposite (Bramall Lane) end of the ground. At the turnstiles they are relieved of alcohol and containers, such as bottles; those already under the influence of alcohol are refused admittance. The remainder are then admitted to the Bramall Lane terraces and there overseen by uniformed officers. Their duty is to prevent or deter provocative, disruptive or violent behaviour. . . . The final phase of the operation comes at the end of the game when the visiting supporters are held on the terraces while the home supporters disperse. They are then escorted by the police officers outside the ground back to the railway station or to their coach parks."

From this description of the police operations it is apparent, submitted Mr. Griffiths, that by providing for the attendance of a substantial number of police officers the chief constable was carrying out his public duty to maintain law and order. The operation was planned as a whole and it was impossible to make a satisfactory distinction between the duties which the officers carried out outside the ground and those which they carried out within it. The nature of their main function was the same—the maintenance of law and order and the protection of life and property. Moreover, it was instructive to observe that the police placed the matches in three categories and that a category B match (which by definition was less likely to lead to violence than a category A match) was defined as being "a match . . . where serious public disorder can be anticipated."

It will be apparent from this summary of the submissions made on behalf of the club that if the words used by Viscount Cave L.C. in the Glasbrook case [1924] A.C. 270 were applied as though they were the words of a statute the case for the club would be very strong if not overwhelming. Thus it is not in dispute that at all material times since about 1970 the chief constable has been of the opinion that the attendance of police officers at Bramall Lane on the occasion of league and cup matches has been necessary for the maintenance of law and order and the protection of life and property. In the Glasbrook case, however, the House of Lords was considering a very different situation from that before the court in the present case. The question before the House was whether a charge could be made where the precautions taken were more extensive than those which the police authorities considered to be necessary. But the emergency which required the presence, if not of a garrison of police officers, of at least a number of officers to watch the situation with other officers held in reserve, arose in the context of an industrial dispute and not because the colliery company had voluntarily chosen to invite a large number of people to their premises to watch a football match or other spectacle.

I come therefore to the arguments advanced on behalf of the police authority. It was argued on behalf of the police authority that the claim for payment could be justified on a number of grounds. First it was said that in the Glasbrook case itself it was recognised both in the Court of Appeal and in the House of Lords that payments were permissible if special arrangements were made for police officers to attend at such events as weddings, race meetings, and sporting contests. At Bramall Lane the police officers were in effect still carrying out the role which they had always carried out of crowd control and the maintenance of law and order, albeit that the task was more demanding than it was 50 or even 20 years ago. Secondly it was pointed out that though the chief constable was under a general duty to enforce the law, the duty did not and could not extend to providing every citizen with complete protection at all times and in all circumstances. Thirdly it was argued that the disposition of the police force was a matter for the chief constable and that provided he acted reasonably the courts would not interfere with his decisions. Finally, it was submitted that in any event the chief constable was entitled, and indeed bound, to take account of the resources, both financial and in terms of manpower, which were available to him. If he decided, acting reasonably, that he could not provide adequate protection without calling on officers who would otherwise be off duty and would therefore have to be paid overtime if they were used, he was entitled to insist, in a situation such as the present, that the protection would have to be provided in the form of "special police services" and not otherwise.

In support of these arguments Mr. Bentley drew our attention to a number of authorities in which consideration has been given to the question as to how far the courts can interfere with the discretion of a chief constable to dispose of his resources as he thinks best. It is sufficient to refer to some of the relevant passages. In Reg. v. Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, Ex parte Blackburn [1968] 2 Q.B. 118 Lord Denning M.R. said, at p. 136:

"I hold it to be the duty of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, as it is of every chief constable, to enforce the law of the land. He must take steps so to post his men that crimes may be detected; and that honest citizens may go about their affairs in peace. He must decide whether or no suspected persons are to be prosecuted; and, if need be, bring the prosecution or see that it is brought. But in all these things he is not the servant of anyone,

3 W.L.R.

Harris v. Sheffield United (C.A.)

Neill L.J.

A save of the law itself. No Minister of the Crown can tell him that he must, or must not, keep observation on this place or that; or that he must, or must not, prosecute this man or that one. Nor can any police authority tell him so. The responsibility for law enforcement lies on him. He is answerable to the law and to the law alone. . . .
B Although the chief officers of police are answerable to the law, there are many fields in which they have a discretion with which the law will not interfere. For instance, it is for the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, or the chief constable, as the case may be, to decide in any particular case whether inquiries should be pursued, or whether an arrest should be made, or a prosecution brought. It must be for him to decide on the disposition of his force and the concentration of his resources on any particular crime or area. No C court can or should give him direction on such a matter. He can also make policy decisions and give effect to them, as, for instance, was often done when prosecutions were not brought for attempted suicide."

Some years later in Reg. v. Chief Constable of Devon and Cornwall, Ex parte Central Electricity Generating Board [1982] Q.B. 458 Lord D Denning M.R. repeated part of this judgment, at p. 472, where he introduced the relevant passage with the words:

"It is of the first importance that the police should decide on their own responsibility what action should be taken in any particular situation."

E And to the same effect were the words of Roskill L.J. in Reg. v.
Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, Ex parte Blackburn (No. 3) [1973] Q.B. 241, where he said, at p. 262:

"It is no part of the duty of this court to presume to tell the respondent how to conduct the affairs of the Metropolitan Police, nor how to deploy his all too limited resources at a time of ever-increasing crime, especially of crimes of violence in London."

F I return to the facts of the present case. I see the force of the argument that the court must be very slow before it interferes in any way with a decision of a chief constable about the disposition of his forces. The question posed in the instant case, however, is not whether the chief constable ought to have sent officers to Bramall Lane or as to the number of officers which were necessary; that the presence of G officers was necessary is not in dispute. The question is whether, having regard to his general duty to enforce the law, the provision of these officers can properly be considered as the provision of special police services for which the police authority was entitled to make a charge. In answering this question I do not propose to attempt to lay down any general rules as to what are or are not "special police services," because H in my judgment it is necessary to look at all the circumstances of the individual case. I would, however, venture to suggest that the following matters require to be taken into account (1) Are the police officers required to attend on private premises or in a public place? Though in Glasbrook Brothers Ltd. v. Glamorgan County Council [1925] A.C. 270 the fact that the garrison was to be stationed on private premises was not treated as conclusive, the fact that the police will not as a general rule have access to private premises suggests that prima facie their presence on private premises would constitute special police services. (2) A Has some violence or other emergency already occurred or is it immediately imminent? I can at present see no basis for an argument that the attendance of police officers to deal with an outbreak of violence which has actually occurred or is immediately imminent could constitute the provision of special police services, even though officers who would otherwise be off duty had to be deployed. (3) What is the nature of the event or occasion at which the officers are required to attend? It is to be noted that in Wathen v. Sandys (1811) 2 Camp. 640, B which was referred to in the course of argument in the Glasbrook case in the Court of Appeal [1924] 1 K.B. 879, 882, the sheriff was not entitled to charge the candidates for the provision of constables at the polling booth because he was under a duty to procure the peace of the county. But a distinction can be drawn between public events such as elections which perhaps lie at one end of a spectrum, and private events such as weddings which lie at the other end. At various points in the middle may lie events such as football matches to which the public are invited and which large numbers of the public are likely to attend. It may also be relevant to inquire whether the event or occasion forms part of a series or whether it is a single occasion or event. Someone who stages events which require the regular attendance of police officers will be placing an exceptional strain on the resources of the police, particularly if the events take place at weekends or on public holidays. D

 (4) Can the provision of the necessary amount of police protection be met from the resources available to the chief constable without the assistance of officers who would otherwise be engaged either in other duties or would be off duty? It was argued on behalf of the club that though it was relevant to take account of the total number of men available it was not permissible to take into consideration the fact that the use of "off-duty" officers might increase the payment of overtime. I am unable to accept this argument. The chief constable when deciding how to deploy his forces is subject not only to the constraints imposed by the number of men available, but also to financial constraints. The payment of overtime on particular occasions may mean that on other occasions reductions have to be made in the ordinary services provided by the police or sacrifices have to be made in the provision of equipment. E

Bearing these considerations in mind I return to the present case.
 The club has responsibilities which are owed not only to its employees and the spectators who attend but also to the football authorities to take all reasonable steps to ensure that the game takes place in conditions which do not occasion danger to any person or property. The attendance of the police is necessary to assist the club in the fulfilment of this duty. G
 The matches take place regularly and usually at weekends during about eight months of the year. Though the holding of the matches is of some public importance because of the widespread support in the local community both for the game and the club, the club is not under any legal duty to hold the matches. The charges which the police authority seek to make, and have made, relate solely to the officers on duty inside the ground and not to those in the street or other public places outside. H

There is clear evidence that the chief constable would be unable to provide the necessary amount of protection for Bramall Lane and also to discharge his other responsibilities without making extensive use of officers who would otherwise have been off duty. Substantial sums by way of overtime have therefore to be paid. The arrangements for the

A attendance of the officers are made to guard against the possibility, and for some matches the probability, of violence; the officers are not sent to deal with an existing emergency, nor can it be said that any outbreak of violence is immediately imminent.

B In my judgment, looking at all these factors I am driven to the conclusion that the provision of police officers to attend regularly at Bramall Lane throughout the football season does constitute the provision of special police services. Nor in my opinion is it to the point that the club has stated that they do not expect the police to carry out any duties other than to maintain law and order. The resources of the police are finite. In my view if the club wishes on a regular basis to make an exceptional claim on police services to deal with potential violence on its premises, then however well intentioned and public spirited it may be in assembling the crowd at Bramall Lane, the services which it receives are "special police services" within the meaning of section 15(1) of the Police Act 1964.

C The question then remains: are these services "requested" by the club within the meaning of section 15(1)? It was very strongly argued on behalf of the club that after 26 October 1983 the club made no relevant request for such services other than requests made on a without prejudice basis. In my view this part of the club's argument, unlike the argument on the meaning of "special police services," lacks any real substance. If the club is to hold matches at Bramall Lane it is necessary for police officers to attend inside the ground. Their presence is necessary to enable the club to meet its responsibilities to the players, the staff and the spectators as well as to comply with the rules imposed by the football authorities. It is not necessary to examine what steps could be taken, and by whom, to stop a match taking place if the club authorities declined to allow the police to attend. But there is no likelihood that the club authorities, who have acted with a great sense of responsibility throughout, would take such a course. It may be that the request for the police services can only be implied from all the circumstances and that it is made without enthusiasm. But if the police attend in order to enable the match to take place then, in the circumstances existing in this case, I consider that a request is to be implied.

E I would only add this. One can feel considerable sympathy for the club authorities who are faced with falling gates and a grave escalation of costs to meet violence which they deplore and do their best to prevent. One can only hope that some accommodation can be reached perhaps on a national scale to meet a threat to the finances of the club and other clubs in a similar situation. But I am satisfied that as a matter of law the judge reached the right conclusion.

G I would dismiss the appeal.

H BALCOMBE L.J. The principal issue on this appeal is whether police services provided by the South Yorkshire Police Authority at the ground of the Sheffield United Football Club on the occasions of the club's home fixtures are "special police services" within section 15(1) of the Police Act 1964 so that, if these services are provided at the club's request, the police authority may charge for their provision. The judge held that they were special services. The club has appealed.

The club's argument has the attraction of simplicity. It is common ground that it is the duty of all constables, including chief constables, to enforce the law and in particular to prevent breaches of the peace. In the course of his judgment the judge said: "It is accepted that at some fixtures violence was almost certain if the police were not present in substantial numbers—that was well known to the club and to the police." So, Mr. Griffiths submitted, it follows that by their presence at the club's ground the police were merely fulfilling their primary function of preserving public order: that is part of their ordinary duty and cannot therefore be "special police services." As I said, the argument has the attraction of simplicity; nevertheless in my judgment it is wrong.

The argument depends to a very great extent on the decision of, and the speeches in, the House of Lords in Glasbrook Brothers Ltd. v. Glamorgan County Council [1925] A.C. 270. It is therefore necessary to consider carefully what that case decided. On the occasion of a strike a colliery manager applied for police protection for his colliery and insisted that it could only be efficiently protected by billeting a police force on the colliery premises. The police superintendent was prepared to provide what in his opinion was adequate protection by means of a mobile force, but refused to billet police officers at the colliery except on the terms of the manager agreeing to pay for the force so provided at a special rate. The House of Lords held by a majority (Viscount Cave L.C., Viscount Finlay and Lord Shaw of Dumfermline; Lord Carson and Lord Blanesburgh dissenting) that there was nothing illegal in the agreement, nor was it void for want of consideration. It will at once be observed that the facts of the Glasbrook case are a very long way from the facts of the present case; in particular there was no suggestion there, as there is here, that the person requiring police protection had, for his own private purposes, organised an occasion which could only take place safely if special security measures were taken, and which it was his own duty to provide. It is against that background of fact that the quotations from the speeches in the Glasbrook case on which Mr. Griffiths relies have to be set; in particular the passage from the speech of Viscount Cave L.C., where he said, at p. 277:

"there is an absolute and unconditional obligation binding the police authorities to take all steps which appear to them to be necessary for keeping the peace . . . ; and the public, who pay for this protection through the rates and taxes, cannot lawfully be called upon to make a further payment for that which is their right."

However, the House of Lords decided in that case that what the colliery manager wanted by way of policing went beyond what the police were under a public duty to provide; therefore it was a "special" service for which payment could be required. It is the same question which has to be decided, on different facts, in the present case. It is, however, interesting to note that during the course of the Glasbrook case there were several references to policing of the kind which is in issue in the present case as being an example of the kind of "special" service for which payment could be required. Thus Viscount Cave L.C. said, at p. 278:

"Instances are the lending of constables on the occasions of large gatherings in and outside private premises, as on the occasions of weddings, athletic or boxing contests or race meetings, and the provision of constables at large railway stations."

3 W.L.R.

Harris v. Sheffield United (C.A.)

Balcombe L.J.

- A In the Glasbrook case in the Court of Appeal [1924] 1 K.B. 879 Scrutton L.J. gave examples of services provided by the police for payment at p. 891: "Instances are . . . where assemblies are likely to produce disorder, as at races, or football meetings . . ." (my emphasis). Mr. Griffiths attempted to explain away these references by submitting that, whatever may have been the position in the past, today it is a sad fact of life that football hooliganism is virtually certain to provoke disorder, so that the police must attend football matches in exercise of their public duty to keep the peace. I do not find that a convincing explanation, particularly against the background of the Report of the Departmental Committee on Crowds (1924) (Cmd. 2088) ("the Shortt Report") which at paragraph 21 on p. 14 makes clear what was then considered to be the function of the police inside a football or other sports ground:
- C "The presence of the police at a largely attended football match or similar event is in itself desirable as the most effective means of preventing disorder and of dealing with it promptly should it arise. Their employment is, in fact, not solely for private advantage but serves also a useful public purpose."
- D Accordingly I do not accept Mr. Griffiths' submission that the decision in the Glasbrook case is determinant of the decision in the present case. The true rule, in my judgment, is as follows. In deciding how to exercise his public duty of enforcing the law, and of keeping the peace, a chief constable has a discretion, which he must exercise even-handedly. Provided he acts within his discretion, the courts will not interfere: see,
- E e.g., Reg. v. Oxford, Ex parte Levey, The Times, 1 November 1986. In exercising that discretion a chief constable must clearly have regard to the resources available to him, and I reject as wholly unrealistic Mr. Griffiths' submission that in estimating those resources he must only consider the manpower available, whether from his own force or from another force under section 14 of the Police Act 1964, without regard to the cost of providing those resources, whether by way of payment of
- F overtime to his own men or by payment to the other police authority under section 14(4). As Scrutton L.J. said in the Glasbrook case [1924] 1 K.B. 879, 891:
- "Obviously the police authorities cannot be expected to, and cannot, protect every citizen completely against possible, even anticipated, crime. The cost would be prohibitive . . ."
- G See also China Navigation Co. Ltd. v. Attorney-General [1932] 2 K.B. 197, per Scrutton L.J. at pp. 212–213. In the present case there was evidence of the very considerable sum which had to be paid by way of overtime for the provision of police within the club's ground, and this was in addition to the considerable cost of policing outside the ground on the occasion of home fixtures. In answering the question whether
- H the provision of police within the club's ground was a special service the judge said:
- "The numbers considered necessary to carry out these services could only be provided by calling on officers who, at the material times, would otherwise have been off duty. The scope and extent of those services and their impact on the chief constable's manpower resources put them beyond what the club, in the circumstances, was entitled to have provided in pursuance of the chief constable's public duty. He was entitled to provide those services because he was able to do so without depriving other people of police protection. In other words, the services provided were within his powers; they were not within the scope of his public duty. I am satisfied that they were special services as I understand that expression to have been used in the Glasbrook case and within the meaning of section 15(1) of the Police Act 1964. It follows that he was entitled to provide them on condition that they were paid for."

In my judgment that is a correct statement of the legal position which cannot be faulted.

In the course of his argument Mr. Griffiths submitted that this appeal raises grave constitutional issues in that the same arguments which were successful before the judge—and in my view rightly so—could be used to support an argument that the policing of political events where there were threats of disorder could be "special services" for which payment could be required. I do not accept that the cases are in pari materia and I do not consider that a dismissal of this appeal poses any threat to the political freedoms which the citizen of this country enjoys.

On the other issue which arises on this appeal—whether the club after 26 October 1983 requested police services at its ground—I agree with the judgment of Neill L.J. and do not wish to add anything.

I would dismiss this appeal.

KERR L.J. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed for the reasons stated in the judgments of Neill and Balcombe L.JJ. and there is nothing which I could usefully add.

*Appeal dismissed with costs.
Leave to appeal.*

Crime—Self-defence—Homicide—Mistake of fact induced by voluntary intoxication—Whether available for self-defence

C

The appellant, who was intoxicated, killed a man and stated to the police, "If I had not hit him I would be dead myself." He was tried on a count charging murder. The jury were directed that, if the appellant mistakenly believed he was under attack, he was entitled to defend himself but was not entitled to go beyond what was reasonable. He was convicted of manslaughter.

On appeal against conviction, on the question whether the direction should have included the possibility of mistake as to the severity of an attack:—

D

Held, dismissing the appeal, that so far as self-defence was concerned, reliance could not be placed on a mistake of fact induced by voluntary intoxication; and that, accordingly, the appeal failed (post, pp. 324H, 326D).

Reg. v. Majewski [1977] A.C. 443, H.L.(E.) and Reg. v. Williams (Gladstone) (1983) 78 Cr.App.R. 276, C.A. considered.

Per curiam. A sober man who mistakenly believes he is in danger of immediate death at the hands of an attacker is entitled to be acquitted of both murder and manslaughter if his reaction in killing his supposed assailant was a reasonable one (post, p. 325A–B).

APPEAL against conviction.

H

The appellant, Patrick Gerald O'Grady, at the Central Criminal Court, before Judge Underhill Q.C. and a jury was tried on a count charging murder. After a five-day trial he was convicted on 19 September 1986 of manslaughter and was sentenced to seven years' imprisonment. He appealed against conviction on the grounds, inter alia, (a) that, in directing the jury about a mistaken belief as to the severity of an attack, the judge erred in that he ought to have said further that a man who mistakenly believed he was being attacked or who mistakenly believed an attack to be more severe than in fact it was, was entitled to use such force as was reasonable to defend himself from an attack of the severity of which he believed it to be; (b) that, alternatively, the verdict was unsafe or unsatisfactory because the direction was unclear and ambiguous, in that the jury might have taken it to mean that the appellant was entitled to use only such force as was required by the actual circumstances; (c) that the judge failed to remind the jury that a defendant was not required to judge to a nicety the amount of necessary force and that they should give weight to the view he formed albeit in drink; and (d) that, in all the circumstances, the verdict was unsafe and unsatisfactory. An appeal against sentence does not call for report.

The facts are stated in the judgment.

James Wadsworth Q.C. and Peter Spink (assigned by the Registrar of Criminal Appeals) for the appellant.

Cur. adv. vult.

11 June. LORD LANE C.J. read the following judgment of the court. On 19 September 1986 at the Central Criminal Court this appellant having been charged with murder was convicted by the jury of manslaughter and was sentenced to seven years' imprisonment. He now appeals against conviction and sentence by leave of the single judge, McCullough J.

The appellant was addicted to drinking large quantities of alcohol, as were the friends and acquaintances with whom he consorted, one of whom was McCloskey, the deceased man. On Thursday, 26 September 1985, the appellant, McCloskey and another man called Brennan spent the day drinking. The appellant had drunk huge quantities of cider (some 8 flagons), and he and Brennan and McCloskey repaired to the appellant's flat.

Early on Friday morning Brennan woke up to see that the appellant was covered in blood. "We"—meaning McCloskey and himself—"had a fight," said the appellant, "and I felt him and he was cold." The appellant went to the police station saying he wished to report a murder. He was medically examined. He had a number of cuts and bruises to the head, hands and legs which were consistent with (a) fighting and (b) grasping broken glass.

A post mortem on McCloskey revealed extensive serious wounds to the face—no less than 20 in number—of varying degrees of severity, as well as injuries to the hands and a fractured rib. The wounds to the hands were probably defence injuries. There was severe bruising to the head, brain, neck and chest. There was a fracture of the spine at the level of the fifth cervical vertebra, probably caused by the head being forced backwards. There was a fractured rib. The blows to the body had been delivered by both sharp and blunt objects. He had bled to death from the wounds inflicted on and around the face.

There was no doubt but that both the appellant and McCloskey were very drunk at the material time. The only evidence of what had led to the injuries of necessity came from the appellant himself. He and McCloskey were friends, there was no animosity between them. After their drinking bout the two fell asleep. The material part of the appellant's account was as follows:

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. O'Grady (C.A.)

A "I was awakened by a bang on the head and I jumped up and put my hand to my head and the blood was running down. I am not sure if it was one bang I got or more. I saw Eddie [McCloskey] standing up . . . he had a piece of glass in one hand . . . I made for him to stop him hitting me again. I picked up a piece of glass and I hit him. We were both standing up facing each other . . . We struggled . . . He was getting the better of me, trying to knock me over. I hit him to stop him hitting me again."

B

He went on to describe how the two of them had fought; how he thought that Eddie was getting the better of him, how he thought he had only hit Eddie a few times; how the fight eventually subsided. He described how he had then cooked a chop for Eddie who did not seem to want it. The appellant then sat down and fell asleep. His evidence continued as follows:

C

"Then I woke up and found that Eddie had gone from where he had been. I was scared at that. I was scared he would get out of the flat and go and get men [to help him]. I jumped up with the intention of leaving the place. I went to the toilet on the way to the front door and found Eddie kneeling by the toilet, his hands over the bowl. I called him and he gave no answer. I took hold of him and found he was cold. I moved him on to the floor and I thought to myself: 'He is dead'."

D

The appellant described how he reported Eddie's condition to some friends and then went to Peckham police station. He said, "I did not want to kill him. I wanted him alive, not dead. I had no enmity to him. If I had not hit him I would be dead myself."

E

The judge gave an impeccable direction on the ingredients of murder and upon the way in which intoxication may affect proof of intent to kill or to do serious bodily harm. Likewise impeccable was his direction on provocation, including the correct observation that, when considering whether a reasonable man would have been caused to lose his self-control, questions of drink are irrelevant.

F

Finally he gave the classic direction on self-defence. He made no mention of the possibility that the appellant might by reason of intoxication have been mistaken as to the threat posed to him by McCloskey's action. This was no doubt because no one had taken the point.

G

Counsel for the prosecution towards the close of the judge's directions saw fit to invite the judge to remedy what he plainly regarded as this lacuna in the charge to the jury. Counsel for the appellant wisely held his peace. The judge then gave this further direction:

H

"It might be a view that you might take—I know not—that this defendant thought he was under attack from the other man mistakenly and made a mistake in thinking that he was under attack because of the drink that was in him. If he made such a mistake in drink he would nevertheless be entitled to defend himself even though he mistakenly believed that he was under attack. He would be entitled in those circumstances to defend himself. But if in taking defensive measures, then he went beyond what is reasonable either because of his mind being affected by drink or for any other reason, then the defence of self-defence would not avail him because, as I told you earlier on, you are entitled to defend yourself if it is necessary to do so, but the defensive measures that you take must be reasonable ones and not go beyond what is reasonable."

The grounds of appeal advanced by Mr. Wadsworth are as follows. (1) Whilst the judge was correct to refer to mistake induced by drink in connection with self defence, he was wrong to limit the reference to mistake as to the existence of an attack; he should have included the possibility of mistake as to the severity of an attack which was the most likely possibility on the facts. (2) By leaving the matter to the jury as he did, the judge in effect divorced the reasonableness of the appellant's reaction from the appellant's state of mind at the time. (3) The judge failed when giving his further direction to the jury to remind them that a defendant is never required to judge to a nicety the amount of force which is necessary and that they should give great weight to the view formed by the appellant at the time, even though that view might have been affected by alcohol.

As to the first two grounds, these require an examination of the law as to intoxication in relation to mistake. Counsel have referred us to a number of authorities. It is not necessary for us to refer to all of these. In three of them the jury were invited to take the defendant's drunkenness into account when deciding whether he genuinely apprehended an assault upon himself. Reg. v. Giamberini (1858) 1 F. & F. 90; Marshall's Case (1830) 1 Lew. 76; and Reg. v. Warhup [1960] Crim L.R. 770. However the reports of these cases leave a great deal to be desired and as far as we can discover there is no case directly in point which is binding upon us.

As McCullough J., when granting leave, pointed out helpfully in his observations for the benefit of the court:

"Given that a man who mistakenly believes he is under attack is entitled to use reasonable force to defend himself, it would seem to follow that, if he is under attack and mistakenly believes the attack to be more serious than it is, he is entitled to use reasonable force to defend himself against an attack of the severity he believed it to have. If one allows a mistaken belief induced by drink to bring this principle into operation, an act of gross negligence (viewed objectively) may become lawful even though it results in the death of the innocent victim. The drunken man would be guilty of neither murder nor manslaughter."

How should the jury be invited to approach the problem? One starts with the decision of this court in Reg. v. Williams (Gladstone) [1983] 78 Cr. App. R. 276, namely, that where the defendant might have been labouring under a mistake as to the facts he must be judged according to that mistaken view, whether the mistake was reasonable or not. It is then for the jury to decide whether the defendant's reaction to the threat, real or imaginary, was a reasonable one. The court was not in that case considering what the situation might be where the mistake was due to voluntary intoxication by alcohol or some other drug.

We have come to the conclusion that where the jury are satisfied that the defendant was mistaken in his belief that any force or the force which he in fact used was necessary to defend himself and are further satisfied that the mistake was caused by voluntarily induced intoxication, the defence must fail. We do not consider that any distinction should be drawn on this aspect of the matter between offences involving what is

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. O'Grady (C.A.)

A called specific intent, such as murder, and offences of so called basic intent, such as manslaughter. Quite apart from the problem of directing a jury in a case such as the present where manslaughter is an alternative verdict to murder, the question of mistake can and ought to be considered separately from the question of intent. A sober man who mistakenly believes he is in danger of immediate death at the hands of B an attacker is entitled to be acquitted of both murder and manslaughter if his reaction in killing his supposed assailant was a reasonable one.
What his intent may have been seems to us to be irrelevant to the problem of self-defence or no. Secondly, we respectfully adopt the reasoning of McCullough J. already set out.

This brings us to the question of public order. There are two competing interests. On the one hand the interest of the defendant who C has only acted according to what he believed to be necessary to protect himself, and on the other hand that of the public in general and the victim in particular who, probably through no fault of his own, has been injured or perhaps killed because of the defendant's drunken mistake.
Reason recoils from the conclusion that in such circumstances a defendant is entitled to leave the Court without a stain on his character.

D We find support for that view in the decision of the House of Lords in Reg. v. Majewski [1977] A.C. 443, and in particular in the speeches of Lord Simon of Glaisdale and Lord Edmund-Davies. We cite a passage from the speech of Lord Simon of Glaisdale, at p. 476:

“(1) One of the prime purposes of the criminal law, with its penal sanctions, is the protection from certain proscribed conduct of persons who are pursuing their lawful lives. Unprovoked violence E has, from time immemorial, been a significant part of such proscribed conduct. To accede to the argument on behalf of the appellant would leave the citizen legally unprotected from unprovoked violence where such violence was the consequence of drink or drugs having obliterated the capacity of the perpetrator to know what he was doing or what were its consequences. (2) Though the problem
F of violent conduct by intoxicated persons is not new to society, it has been rendered more acute and menacing by the more widespread use of hallucinatory drugs. For example, in Reg. v. Lipman [1970] 1 Q.B. 152, the accused committed his act of mortal violence under the hallucination (induced by drugs) that he was wrestling with serpents. He was convicted of manslaughter. But, on the logic of the appellant's argument, he was innocent of any crime.”

G Lord Edmund-Davies said, at p. 492:

“The criticism by the academics of the law presently administered in this country is of a two-fold nature: (1) It is illogical and therefore inconsistent with legal principle to treat a person who of his own volition has taken drink or drugs any differently from a man suffering from some bodily or mental disorder of the kind earlier H mentioned or whose beverage had, without his connivance, been 'laced' with intoxicants; (2) it is unethical to convict a man of a crime requiring a guilty state of mind when ex hypothesi, he lacked it.”

Lord Edmund-Davies then demonstrated the fallacy of those criticisms.

Finally we draw attention to the decision of this court in Reg. v. Lipman [1970] 1 Q.B. 152 itself. The defence in that case was put on the grounds that the defendant, because of the hallucinatory drug which he had taken, had not formed the necessary intent to found a conviction for murder, thus resulting in his conviction for manslaughter. If the appellant's contentions here are correct, Lipman could successfully have escaped conviction altogether by raising the issue that he believed he was defending himself legitimately from an attack by serpents. It is significant that no one seems to have considered that possibility.

The third and final ground of appeal has in effect already disappeared, because if the judge's additional direction was unnecessary, so was any repetition of the passage from the speech of Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest in Palmer v. The Queen [1971] A.C. 814, 832:

"If there has been [an] attack so that defence is reasonably necessary it will be recognised that a person defending himself cannot weigh to a nicety the exact measure of his necessary defensive action. If a jury thought that in a moment of unexpected anguish a person attacked had only done what he honestly and instinctively thought was necessary that would be most potent evidence that only reasonable defensive action had been taken."

Indeed those words are scarcely apt to describe the actions of a man labouring under the effect of a drunken mistake. They accordingly add some marginal support to the views which we have expressed.

We have therefore come to the conclusion that a defendant is not entitled to rely, so far as self-defence is concerned, upon a mistake of fact which has been induced by voluntary intoxication.

As already indicated, the judge's addendum to his summing up, which he made at the suggestion of prosecuting counsel, was unnecessary and erred in favour of the appellant.

The appeal against conviction is accordingly dismissed.

[His Lordship stated the considerations relating to the appeal against sentence and continued:] The appeal against sentence is likewise dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

REGINA v. ROBERTSON

REGINA v. GOLDER

B

1987 May 18, 19;
June 11

Lord Lane C.J., Boreham and McCowan JJ.

Crime—Evidence—Conviction as evidence—Commission of offence by another relevant issue at trial of accused—Whether “issue” limited to essential ingredient of offence charged—Whether extending to evidential issue—Whether person having pleaded or been found guilty but not sentenced, “convicted”—“Conviction”—Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (c. 60) ss. 74(1), 78(1)

C

R. was tried on a count of conspiracy with two other men to commit burglaries of a company's warehouses and shops. The two other men pleaded not guilty to conspiracy but guilty to 16 relevant counts of burglary with which R. was not charged, and they were sentenced. At the trial of R., which was delayed for some weeks, the prosecution sought leave which was granted under section 74 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984,¹ to adduce evidence of the two men's convictions on the 16 counts. R. was convicted.

D

G. was tried on a count of robbery and evidence was admitted of pleas of guilty to the offence by two co-defendants, who had not been sentenced. G. was convicted.

E

On appeal by R. against conviction on the grounds that the judge erred in admitting the evidence in that there was no “issue” within section 74(1), for ex concessis the burglaries had been committed, that section 74 applied only where a defendant had had no part in the offences of which the third party was convicted, and that the evidence should have been excluded as being unfair within section 78(1); and on appeal by G. against conviction on the ground that the evidence was wrongly admitted since the two men had not been “convicted” within section 74(1):—

F

Held, dismissing the appeals, (1) that, in relation to a trial, the term “issue” in section 74(1) was apt to cover not only the restricted meaning of an issue which was an essential ingredient of the offence charged but also the extended meaning of an evidential issue arising during the course of the proceedings; that section 74(1) did not limit “issue” to the restricted meaning and did not apply only to proof of conviction of offences in which the defendant on trial played no part; and that, since R.'s name did not appear in any of the 16 counts to which pleas had been entered, even if the two men had given evidence in accordance with their pleas, counsel for R. would have been unlikely to cross-examine them or, if he did cross-examine, would have been unlikely to achieve anything except disaster for R. so that the admission of the evidence was not unfair within the meaning of section 78(1); that, accordingly, the evidence was correctly admitted and the verdict being neither unsafe nor unsatisfactory, R.'s appeal failed (post, pp. 333H—334A, B, H, 335H—336A).

G

(2) That whether or not a defendant was sentenced was irrelevant to the issue whether he had committed the offence; so that "convicted" in section 74(1) was to be construed as a finding of guilt or a formal plea of guilty and not as meaning the final disposal of the case; and, accordingly, the convictions G.'s co-defendants being relevant to the charge against G., his appeal failed (post, pp. 337G-H, 338c). Dicta of Lord Reid in S. (An Infant) v. Recorder of Manchester [1971] A.C. 481, 489, H.L.(E.) applied. B

Per curiam. Section 74 should be sparingly used. Occasionally evidence may be technically admissible but its effect is likely to be so slight that it will be wiser not to adduce it, particularly where there is any danger of contravening section 78. Where the evidence is admitted, the judge should be careful to explain to the jury the effect of the evidence and its limitations (post, p. 335A-B) C

REG. V. ROBERTSON

The appellant, Malcolm Robertson, on 17 February 1986 in the Crown Court at Snaresbrook before Judge Owen Stable Q.C. and a jury, was convicted after a five-day trial on a count of conspiracy with Barry Poole and Albert William Long, to commit burglary. He was sentenced to three years' imprisonment. He appealed against conviction on the grounds that the judge (1) erred in law in admitting evidence of pleas of guilty by Poole and Long to substantive counts of burglary; (2) unfairly and adversely commented on the appellant's failure to call Poole and Long as witnesses; and (3) wrongly directed the jury that the appellant was alleging that all the police officers were committing perjury, whereas the allegation was that, of the four interviewing officers, two invented evidence and the others were mistaken. The facts are stated in the judgment. G

D 11 June. LORD LANE C.J. read the following judgment of the court. These two cases raise similar points upon the construction of certain sections of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, and we propose therefore as a matter of convenience to deal with them together.

REG. V. ROBERTSON

E On 17 February 1986 in the Crown Court at Snaresbrook before Judge Owen Stable Q.C. and a jury, the appellant, Malcolm Robertson, was convicted of conspiracy to commit burglary. He was sentenced to three years' imprisonment. Now by leave of the single judge he appeals against that conviction.

F The original indictment had contained five counts. Counts 1 and 2 charged the appellant together with Barry James Poole and Albert William Long with conspiring together and with others unknown to commit burglary at premises belonging to Comet Plc. The remaining counts concerned Poole and Long only.

G Before arraignment, and by consent, the indictment was amended by adding counts 6 to 20, each count charging burglary at premises belonging to Comet Plc. in various parts of London and south east England. Eight of these counts charged Poole alone, two charged Long alone and five charged Poole and Long jointly. Poole pleaded not guilty to conspiracy but guilty to all 14 counts of burglary. Long pleaded not guilty to conspiracy but guilty to all nine counts of burglary—six of the counts being joint charges with Poole: a total therefore of 17 burglaries, 16 of them at Comet premises. These pleas were accepted and on 8 H January Poole was sentenced to 2½ years' imprisonment, Long to 2 years' imprisonment.

The trial of the appellant on the two conspiracy counts commenced on 6 January, but, for reasons which do not concern us, the jury were discharged. Prior to his retrial on 11 February, three further counts were added to the indictment charging the appellant with burglary (count 21) and handling a stolen video (counts 22 and 23). During the course of the retrial, and by consent, the indictment was further amended by consolidating the two conspiracy counts to allege one conspiracy with Poole, Long and others between 1 January 1984 and 20 June 1985. A

The Crown's case was that between January 1984 and 20 June 1985 82 burglaries were committed at premises belonging to Comet in London and south east England. Goods to the value of £245,000 were stolen. This was not in dispute. The pleas of Poole and Long related to 16 of these burglaries and to goods to the value of £44,000. Their last offence was committed at Stevenage on 20 June 1985, when six video recorders to the value of £2,700 were stolen. They were observed by nearby residents, their car number was taken, and they were arrested with the stolen goods within a very short time. B

The appellant was arrested at his home on 25 June. The Crown's case against the appellant was (1) that there was a conspiracy between Poole and Long in the terms of the indictment, namely, "on days between 1 January 1984 and 20 June 1985 to enter showrooms and warehouses belonging to Comet Plc. as trespassers and to steal therein video cassette recorders and television sets." The admissibility of the evidence adduced by the Crown on this aspect of their case is disputed; (2) that the appellant was, for at least part of the time, a member of that conspiracy. C

The Crown relied upon (a) admissions alleged to have been made on three occasions by the appellant: first at his home when arrested, secondly at the police station and thirdly at a formal interview when contemporaneous notes were made of the questions and answers. The appellant was given the opportunity to check and sign the notes. He said he would think about it. He never signed them. In evidence the appellant denied making any admissions. His versions of the first two conversations contained nothing in the nature of an admission. As to the formal interview, he agreed that a note had been made, but not from anything he had said. It was an entire fabrication. Police Constable Bricklow not only asked the questions, he also supplied all the answers. Police Constable Simpson recorded them at his colleague's dictation; (b) evidence of the appellant's association with stolen property and with Poole and Long. On 2 May 1984 Police Constable Smith found a damaged video recorder on the ground beneath a broken window of the appellant's first floor flat. It had been stolen on 30 April 1984 from a Comet warehouse at Chingford. Three officers visited the flat, where they found the appellant and Poole and where they said they saw a video lead hanging from a socket in the television set. The appellant denied that there was such a lead and asserted that the video recorder had no connection with him or his flat. The recorder was the subject of counts 22 and 23. D

The Crown also relied upon an incident on 13 May 1985 when a car driven by Poole stopped when approached by the appellant and Long. According to Police Constable Bricklow, Poole passed to the appellant a paper on which the word "Comet" was printed. The appellant and Long then entered the car which was driven away by the appellant. The appellant did not deny the incident, but disputed any reference to Comet. His case was that his association with Poole and Long was entirely innocent. E

After a five-day trial the appellant was convicted of the conspiracy. The jury were discharged from returning verdicts on counts 21 to 23. The appellant was sentenced to three years' imprisonment. His F

Reg. v. Robertson (C.A.)

A application for leave to appeal against that sentence was refused by the single judge, and has not been renewed.

B Mr. Tansey on behalf of the appellant submits that the verdict was unsafe and unsatisfactory by reason of, what he submits was, a serious irregularity in the course of the trial, and two more in the course of the summing up. The irregularity in the trial relates to the admissibility of evidence. The Crown sought to prove the existence of the conspiracy between Poole and Long by proving, inter alia, that within the relevant period Poole and Long had committed a number of burglaries at different Comet premises and had stolen television sets and video recorders. The inference was that they must have conspired together. To do this the Crown sought the leave of the judge to adduce evidence of the convictions of Poole and Long of 16 relevant counts of burglary. C Their case was that they were entitled to adduce that evidence by virtue of the provisions of section 74(1) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. The judge heard argument and ruled in favour of the Crown.

Mr. Tansey challenges that ruling on a number of grounds. To put his submissions into perspective, it is necessary to refer to section 74 and the related sections of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984.

Section 74 provides:

D “(1) In any proceedings the fact that a person other than the accused has been convicted of an offence by or before any court in the United Kingdom . . . shall be admissible in evidence for the purpose of proving, where to do so is relevant to any issue in those proceedings, that that person committed that offence, whether or not any other evidence of his having committed that offence is given. (2) In any proceedings in which by virtue of this section a person other than the accused is proved to have been convicted of an offence by or before any court in the United Kingdom . . . he shall be taken to have committed that offence unless the contrary is proved. . . .” E

It is unnecessary to refer to subsections (3) and (4). Section 75 provides:

F “(1) Where evidence that a person has been convicted of an offence is admissible by virtue of section 74 above, then without prejudice to the reception of any other admissible evidence for the purpose of identifying the facts on which the conviction was based—(a) the contents of any document which is admissible as evidence of the conviction; and (b) the contents of the information, complaint, G indictment or charge-sheet on which the person in question was convicted, shall be admissible in evidence for that purpose. (2) Where in any proceedings the contents of any document are admissible in evidence by virtue of subsection (1) above, a copy of that document, or of the material part of it, purporting to be certified or otherwise authenticated by or on behalf of the court or authority having custody of that document shall be admissible in H evidence and shall be taken to be a true copy of that document or part unless the contrary is shown. . . .”

Subsections (3) and (4) are irrelevant for present purposes. Finally section 78 provides:

“(1) In any proceedings the court may refuse to allow evidence on which the prosecution proposes to rely to be given if it appears to the court that, having regard to all the circumstances, including the circumstances in which the evidence was obtained, the admission of the evidence would have such an adverse effect on the fairness of the proceedings that the court ought not to admit it. (2) Nothing in this section shall prejudice any rule of law requiring a court to exclude evidence.”

Mr. Tansey's criticism of the judge's ruling may be summarised as follows. (1) Section 74 did not apply for the following reasons: (a) there was no issue that many burglaries had been committed at Comet premises within the relevant period, because that fact was conceded by the appellant; (b) the mischief against which the section was directed did not exist or apply here; (c) the section has a restricted application: it only applies where the defendant on trial has played no part in the offences of which the third party has been convicted—for instance on a charge of handling stolen goods. The conviction of the thief of the same goods may properly be given in evidence. (2) Even if the Crown could bring themselves within the ambit of section 74, the evidence should have been excluded in accordance with section 78(1) because of its adverse effect on the fairness of the proceedings.

In support of his submission that section 74 had no application, Mr. Tansey relies on paragraph 218 of the Criminal Law Revision Committee 11th Report (1972) (Cmnd. 4991) for the background of the law as it was. The relevant part reads:

“There is no doubt that the principle of Hollington v. Hewthorn [1943] K.B. 587 applies to criminal cases, although there is very little authority. For example, in Rex v. Turner (1832) 1 Mood. C.C. 347, 349, ‘many of [the judges] appeared to think’ that in a case of receiving stolen property the conviction of the thief ‘would not have been any evidence of her guilt, which must have been proved by other means.’ This is always taken to be the law. In our opinion it is clearly right that convictions of persons other than the accused should be made admissible in criminal proceedings as evidence of the fact that the person convicted was guilty of the offence charged and that on proof of the conviction that person should be taken to have committed the offence charged unless the contrary is proved. Clause 24 provides accordingly. It seems quite wrong, as well as being inconvenient, that the prosecution should be required to prove again the guilt of the person concerned. The clause will be helpful to the prosecution in various cases where the guilt of the accused depends on another person's having committed an offence. Examples are handling stolen goods, harbouring offenders and the offences under sections 4 and 5 of the Criminal Law Act 1967 of assisting offenders and concealing offences.”

The terms of clause 24 of the committee's draft bill are in all material respects identical to those of section 74.

The matter has already been considered by this court in Reg. v. O'Connor (unreported), 18 November 1986. O'Connor was charged with conspiring with a man named Beck to obtain property by deception. He pleaded not guilty and was tried. Beck pleaded guilty and evidence of that plea was admitted at O'Connor's trial. On appeal it was submitted (1) that section 74 did not permit evidence of Beck's plea to be put before the jury, alternatively (2) that even if the strict wording of section 74(1) did render the evidence admissible, then the judge ought,

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Robertson (C.A.)

A pursuant to section 78, to have excluded it on the ground that it would have such an adverse effect on the fairness of the proceedings. The court held that the disputed evidence ought to have been excluded, but applied the proviso to section 2(1) of the Act of 1968 and dismissed the appeal.

The following is an extract from the judgment in that case:

B “The terms of section 74 clearly were designed, in the judgment of this court, to deal with the situation where it was necessary as a preliminary matter for it to be proved that a person other than the accused had been convicted of an offence. The object, it would seem, of the section is to avoid that matter having to be proved twice where the other person had already pleaded guilty to the offence it was necessary to prove. In effect therefore the object of the section, in our view, was to deal with cases where it was necessary to prove the conviction of another as a condition precedent to the conviction of the defendant of the charge laid against him. The most obvious example would be a case where it is necessary to prove against another that he was guilty of theft before the person before the court could be convicted of handling or harbouring.”

D Mr. Tansey’s case is that this view of the restricted application of section 74(1) is in accordance with the views of the Criminal Law Revision Committee and entirely supports his submission that section 74 had no application to the instant case.

E For the Crown Mr. Patterson contends that the judge’s ruling was correct. His case is that the words of section 74(1) are clear and unambiguous, and should be given their natural meaning; that being so they are wide enough to cover the instant case. Had Parliament intended to restrict the application of the section, they could, and would, have done so in clear terms: for instance, by substituting for the words “where to do so is relevant to any issue in those proceedings” some such expression as “where it is necessary to prove the guilt of another.” Parliament has not chosen to do so.

F The heart of the problem is the correct interpretation of the expression “issue in the proceedings.” Only when that is determined can the court decide what in the particular circumstances is relevant and thus admissible. That is the very question left open in O’Connor’s case. There, in the passage already cited, the court gave its view of the primary object of section 74. It expressly left open the limits or scope of the section in the following terms:

G “We find this a difficult point, and, without deciding the full scope of section 74, for the purposes of this case, it is sufficient to say that if it was appropriate within the section to admit the conviction of Beck in the proceedings, we take the view that it would have resulted in a very unfair state of affairs.”

H Despite the assistance of counsel, the difficulty remains.

We think the time has come to attempt to provide some guidance for courts who have the task of applying section 74. The word “issue” in relation to a trial is apt to cover not only an issue which is an essential ingredient in the offence charged, for instance in a handling case the fact that the goods were stolen (that is the restricted meaning), but also less fundamental issues, for instance evidential issues arising during the course of the proceedings (that is the extended meaning). Section 74 by using the words "any issue in those proceedings" does not seek to limit the word "issue" to the restricted meaning indicated above. Although the Report of the Criminal Law Revision Committee is an indication that the committee may have been regarding the matter at least primarily in the restricted sense, it seems to us that we are not entitled to use that possibility as showing that the words of the section mean other than what they plainly state.

On any view we find no support for Mr. Tansey's submission that the section applies only to proof of conviction of offences in which the defendant on trial played no part. It may well be that the section will be at its most useful in dealing with the type of situation exemplified by the Law Revision Committee, but it is not restricted to that kind of case. Provided that there is an issue before the jury to which the conviction is relevant, the conviction, subject to what we say hereafter, is admissible.

So far as the present case is concerned, there was certainly an issue. Indeed it was probably an issue in the restricted sense, namely, the issue of whether there was a conspiracy between Poole and Long (of which their joint conviction of burglary was the clearest evidence). It was that conspiracy to which the prosecution sought to prove the appellant was a party. It is true that the appellant was prepared to accept that there had been a series of burglaries at Comet's premises during the material times, but that would not preclude the prosecution from relying on section 74 as the words of subsection (1) of that section make clear.

The judge gave his ruling as follows:

"in a conspiracy case where there is only one defendant being tried, but it is alleged that he conspired with two other named persons and others unknown, it is relevant that those named persons committed a number of burglaries which the Crown allege were acts done by those named persons in furtherance of the common design. If the fact of committing those burglaries is relevant, then section 74 . . . facilitates the manner in which their participation in those events may be proved. I think that the evidence of their conviction is relevant to an issue in these proceedings, namely, was there a conspiracy."

That, in our judgment, was a correct approach.

It remains to consider the submissions based on section 78. The complaint here is that by relying on section 74 to prove the convictions of Poole and Long, the prosecution deprived the appellant of the opportunity to cross-examine them. Mr. Tansey points out that this was a prominent feature in the O'Connor case already referred to.

The circumstances there however were quite different. O'Connor and Beck were jointly indicted in one count with having conspired together and with no one else. It followed that Beck's admission of guilt of that very offence might well lead the jury to infer that O'Connor in his turn must have conspired with Beck.

That situation did not exist here. The pleas and consequent convictions of Poole and Long did not on the face of them involve the appellant whose name did not appear in the relevant counts at all. Consequently, even if Poole and Long had given evidence in accordance with their pleas, counsel would have been unlikely to cross-examine them or, if he had, to have achieved anything except disaster for his client.

The judge was, in our view, correct to admit the evidence.

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Robertson (C.A.)

A It only remains to add this. Section 74 is a provision which should be sparingly used. There will be occasions where, although the evidence may be technically admissible, its effect is likely to be so slight that it will be wiser not to adduce it. This is particularly so where there is any danger of a contravention of section 78. There is nothing to be gained by adducing evidence of doubtful value at the risk of having the conviction quashed because the admission of that evidence rendered the conviction unsafe or unsatisfactory. Secondly, where the evidence is admitted, the judge should be careful, as Judge Owen Stable was here, to explain to the jury the effect of the evidence and its limitations.

B There are two further grounds of appeal. The first is that the judge commented unfairly on the appellant's failure to call Poole or Long as witnesses.

C Having referred to the appellant's evidence of a conversation that he had with Poole prior to the final interview with the police, the judge continued:

D "you should consider why the police allowed Robertson to see Poole, and why Poole suggested that Robertson should put his hands up—but, members of the jury, you should bear this in mind: that no one knows better than Poole and Long if Robertson was one of their number concerning 'Comet' burglaries. Both had been dealt with, neither would have anything to lose by giving evidence for Robertson. There is no obligation, of course, on Robertson to call either of them, but had he wished you to hear their evidence they could have been compelled to go into the witness box, and you may think it is surprising neither was called on his behalf if the admissions of Robertson are wicked inventions on the part of corrupt policemen."

E That was a reference to the alleged fabrication of the last interview. Mr. Tansey was unhappy about it and, after the jury had retired, invited the judge to retract it. The judge declined.

F It is submitted that the comment was so unfair as to prejudice the appellant's case, particularly as it was linked to the controversial issue of the final interview. It was particularly unfair, it is said, because neither Poole nor Long could assist as to the genuineness of the record of that interview. If, which is doubtful, the judge was entitled to comment, it should have been done with more circumspection.

G In our view the judge was entitled to comment. There is no doubt that the comment was strong. The judge is entitled to make a comment which in appropriate circumstances may be strong. These were appropriate circumstances.

H The appellant's final point is that the judge wrongly directed the jury that the appellant's case was that all the police officers had lied, whereas in fact the appellant was alleging that only those officers, four in number, who gave evidence related to the damaged video recorder and the video lead attached to the television set in the appellant's flat and the meeting at which the Comet paper was produced, were mistaken.

It is unnecessary to go into detail. We have studied the transcripts of the cross-examination of those four officers. It is sufficient to say that the judge and the jury could be forgiven, as all those in this court may be forgiven, for concluding that the suggestion was made that the officers had invented the video and the Comet paper. There is nothing in this point.

For these reasons we conclude that the verdict is neither unsafe nor unsatisfactory. This appeal is dismissed. A

REG. V. GOLDER

On 17 October 1986 in the Crown Court at St. Albans before Judge Hickman and a jury this appellant was convicted of robbery and sentenced to four years' imprisonment. On further counts he was sentenced to three years' imprisonment to run consecutively, thus making a total of seven years' imprisonment. B

We have refused his application for leave to appeal against sentence. We now give reasons for dismissing, as we have done on 17 May last, his appeal against conviction.

On 20 November 1985 Mr. Reece Wilson, an employee at Harper's Garage, St. Albans, was robbed of £40. The prosecution case was that four men carried out the robbery: the appellant; McConnell who was also convicted by the jury; and two other men, Moran and Eley, both of whom pleaded guilty. The evidence was that two of the four men went into the garage armed with a gun and robbed Mr. Wilson whilst the other two, including this appellant, were waiting in a car nearby to drive all four away. C D

The evidence against the appellant consisted primarily of admissions which he was alleged to have made after his arrest which took place on 4 December 1985. At first he prevaricated. However on 5 December, at a further interview, the contents of which were contemporaneously noted, he made a series of admissions. He admitted that he had discussed the possibility of robbing a garage at St. Albans with three other men when they were outside a public house in Hatfield. He said they were all broke and intended to see if they could get some money out of a garage. He further said that some of the three were involved in another robbery at a garage called Grays shortly before the St. Albans robbery. E

So far as the St. Albans robbery was concerned, he said that he stayed in the car, although he was not the driver, and that he did not see the gun until it was brought back by the men who had committed the robbery. He said the gun was a double-barrelled sawn-off shotgun. He knew the men had the gun with them. He said that he was told that they had only got £18 or £20 from the robbery of which they gave him nothing. He said the offence was "a spur of the moment thing" and that the reason for picking on a garage was possibly because of the events on the previous day at Grays Garage as a result of which the other men perhaps felt more confident. F G

During the course of the trial the prosecution requested, and were given leave, to adduce the following evidence, namely, that Moran and Eley inter alios had pleaded guilty to three counts. One of those was relevant only to the case of a co-accused called Puddifoot and need not be considered further. The other two were as follows: the first charged them with having on 19 November 1985 at Hatfield robbed an attendant at Grays Garage of £284; the second with having on the next day, 20 November, robbed Reece Wilson of £40, that is the same offence as that upon which the appellant was being tried. Their pleas of guilty had been duly recorded by the court, but neither man had been sentenced. H

The application to adduce the evidence was made under section 74 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984.

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Robertson (C.A.)

A The following grounds were advanced before us as to why the judge was wrong, it is said, to admit the evidence. First, because the men had not been "convicted." The argument is that a plea of guilty does not become a conviction within the meaning of section 74 until sentence is passed. Up to that point no conviction exists. Thereafter it subsists until quashed.

B The principal authority cited in support of that proposition was Rex v. Plummer [1902] 2 K.B. 339. It was there decided that where a prisoner had pleaded guilty to an indictment, the court had jurisdiction to allow him, before sentence, to withdraw his plea and plead not guilty. It is argued from that that the mere plea does not amount to a conviction. If it had amounted to a conviction, the court would have had no jurisdiction to allow him to withdraw his plea.

C However as Lord Reid made clear in S. (An Infant) v. Recorder of Manchester [1971] A.C. 481, that is not conclusive. This passage appears in his speech, at p. 489:

D "Several cases have held that magistrates have no power to allow a change of plea during the interval between their acceptance of a plea of guilty and final disposal of the case. They appear to me to have arisen out of a misconception of purely technical matters. Much of the difficulty has arisen from the fact that 'conviction' is commonly used with two different meanings. It often is used to mean final disposal of a case and it is not uncommon for it to be used as meaning a finding of guilt. It is proper to say that a plea cannot be changed after 'conviction' in the former sense. But it does not at all follow that a plea cannot be changed after 'conviction' in the latter sense. It is perfectly true that 'conviction' is used in this latter sense in the Magistrates' Courts Act 1952, and a number of other statutes."

E This dual meaning of the word "conviction" is further illustrated by the judgment of this court in Reg. v. Drew [1985] 1 W.L.R. 914, where many of the authorities are reviewed.

F We respectfully agree with the reasoning of the trial judge on this aspect of the matter. The purpose which lies behind the enactment of section 74 was to enable proof of the commission of an offence by X to be proved by the record without the necessity of calling X to admit the truth of what appears on the record. Therefore, what is important is either that a jury has found X's offence proved, or that X himself has before a court formally admitted that he has committed the offence. G Provided that his plea has not been withdrawn nor the verdict of the jury, where there has been one, has been quashed on appeal, the conviction subsists. Whether or not X has been sentenced is irrelevant on the issue of whether he has committed the offence. Therefore the meaning of "conviction" in this section is the latter of the two referred to by Lord Reid in the passage cited, namely, a finding of guilt or a H formal plea of guilty.

The second ground of appeal is that the convictions of Moran and Eley were not within the meaning of section 74(1), relevant to any issue on the trial of this appellant on the charge of robbing Reece Wilson. As to the first charge to which the two men had pleaded guilty, namely, the robbery of the garage attendant committed on 19 November, there is no doubt that in general proof that other men committed another offence at another time is irrelevant. Likewise it would, generally speaking, be irrelevant that two men other than the defendant had committed the burglary of which the appellant was being tried. This was the subject of the further conviction of Moran and Eley sought to be adduced in evidence.

The prosecution contended that in the particular circumstances of this case those convictions were relevant. The admissions which he had according to the police made to them were contested. It was suggested to the officers that they had fabricated their story and that no such admissions had been made. The prosecution's desire to put the convictions of Moran and Eley in was in order to show that the contents of the alleged confessions by the appellant were in accordance with the facts as they were known and the confessions were therefore more likely to be true.

Secondly, as pointed out during argument at trial, one of the matters which the prosecution had to prove was that there had in fact been a robbery at Harper's Garage on 20 November. It was therefore relevant to prove that two men had admitted committing such a robbery, although there was as it transpired no dispute that the robbery had been committed by someone.

The arguments advanced on behalf of the prosecution and of the appellant are similar to those in Robertson case and we need not repeat them here. Nor need we repeat our reasons for concluding that the judge was correct in his ruling that the evidence was admissible.

For those reasons we dismissed the appeal against conviction.

Appeals dismissed.

A Liberian company with a registered office in Monrovia operated mainly through an English company of ship agents with offices in London. The Liberian company contracted in 1984 for the building of a bulk carrier. About $13.5 million of the total price of $18 million was provided by the petitioner, an English bank, in return for a first secured mortgage on the vessel and the assignment to the petitioner of all the vessel's earnings. The company undertook that for the duration of the facility there would be no change in the ownership and control of the company and that the vessel would be kept fully insured. The vessel was delivered to the company in January 1985 and the company drew on the whole of the facility. In 1986 the company was in financial difficulties and in September defaulted on the interest payment. On 17 November the petitioner declared the whole of the company's indebtedness to be due in accordance with the provisions of the loan agreement. The petitioner recovered judgment for the amount of the debt in January 1987 and on 3 February presented a petition for the winding up of the company. On 5 February the petitioner applied for the appointment of a provisional liquidator.

On the question whether the court had jurisdiction to wind up the company under section 221 of the Insolvency Act 1986¹ notwithstanding that it was an overseas company:—

F

Held, that since the company was unable to pay its debts and its only known asset was substantially less than its liabilities, the condition for the making of a winding up order contained in section 221(5)(b) of the Insolvency Act 1986 was fulfilled; that for the court to make a winding up order against a foreign company it was not necessary to show that the company had assets within the jurisdiction, but a sufficiently close connection with the jurisdiction had to be established; that the facts that the loan agreement had been negotiated, executed and performed in England, the company's directors were resident in England, the company had bank accounts in England, while there was no evidence that the company had carried on business outside England, demonstrated a sufficient connection with the jurisdiction; and that, accordingly, since there was no more appropriate jurisdiction for the winding up of the company and since there was a reasonable possibility of benefit accruing to the creditors from the making of a winding up order, an order would be made and a provisional liquidator appointed (post, pp. 352G–H, 353H, 354G, 355A–B).

PETITION

On 7 January 1987, the petitioner, International Westminster Bank Plc., a subsidiary of National Westminster Bank Plc., obtained final judgment in the Queen's Bench Division Commercial Court against Okeanos Maritime Corporation, a company formed under the laws of Liberia in June 1982 with no principal place of business but operating mainly through its agents, John Samonas & Sons Ltd., 30/33 Minories, London E.C.3. Despite service of the judgment on the company's agents, the company failed to satisfy the judgment, and on 3 February 1987 the petitioner presented a petition in the Chancery Division for the winding up of the company contending that the company was an unregistered company within the meaning of section 226 of the Insolvency Act 1986, that it was unable to pay its debts within the meaning of section 221(5)(b) and that it was just and equitable that the company should be wound up by the court. On 5 February, the petitioner applied ex parte for the appointment of a provisional liquidator. The company opposed the application which was then ordered to be stood over pending the filing of evidence by the company. The matter came back before the court inter partes after an eleven-day adjournment.

The facts are stated in the judgment.

PETER GIBSON J. On 3 February 1987 the petitioner, International Westminster Bank Plc., a subsidiary of National Westminster Bank Plc. ("NatWest"), presented a petition for the winding up of Okeanos Maritime Corporation ("the company"). On 5 February the petitioner, appearing by Mr. Vos, applied for the appointment of a provisional liquidator. That application was made ex parte but short notice was given to the company which the next day appeared by Miss Heilbron to

A oppose the application. As the major question raised by the application related to the jurisdiction of the court which the company challenged, and as the company wished to put in evidence, I acceded to her submission that the application be stood over to enable such evidence to be filed. The matter has come back before me inter partes after an eleven-day adjournment. I am grateful to Mr. Blackburne leading Mr.
Vos for the petitioner and to Miss Heilbron for their helpful arguments
B in what is a very unusual case.

The affidavits filed on both sides reveal a number of matters to be in dispute, but the following appears to be not challenged or is supported by documentary evidence. The Samonas family is a Greek family having at its head Captain John Samonas. His wife is Maritsa Samonas and they have three sons, Christos, Dimitri and Nikolas. The family has been C connected with shipping for many years. An English company, John Samonas & Sons Ltd. ("J.S.S."), which on its headed paper describes itself as "Shipbrokers and Shipagents" was incorporated in 1966. Its present directors are Christos, Dimitri and Nikolas Samonas and one other and their offices are in the City of London. Christos, Dimitri and Nikolas Samonas are all resident in England. Captain John Samonas has sworn two affidavits in which he gives a Greek address, but on 12 D December 1984 a letter from Dimitri Samonas on J.S.S. paper gives the J.S.S. office address as Captain John Samonas's and his wife's address, and Captain John Samonas's name with a London address is given in the current London telephone directory. If he has moved to Greece it is only recently that he has done so.

There are four ships which bear names which show their apparent relationship to each other and to Captain John Samonas as they all include the name "Samjohn." The Samjohn Captain is the vessel relevant E to the present case, being the company's only known asset. The Samonas family, through Liberian or Panamanian companies, owns the other three ships. One other company I must mention is Esperos Shipping Company S.A. ("Esperos"). This is a Panamanian company and a search of the Panamanian Companies' Register shows as its board of F directors Captain John Samonas, Nikolas Samonas and Mrs. Maritsa Samonas. However, another Greek, Mr. Vennis, is its general manager.

The company was incorporated in Liberia on 16 June 1982. Until 15
August 1986 but according to Captain John, Christos, Dimitri and Nikolas Samonas not thereafter, the board of directors of the company consisted of Captain John Samonas (who was also president), Mrs.
G Maritsa Samonas, Christos, Dimitri and Nikolas Samonas. Its share capital consists of 100 bearer shares of no par value. It has a registered office in Monrovia but its byelaws allow it to have an office or offices within or outside Liberia as the board may from time to time appoint or the business of the company may require, and they permit it to hold directors' meetings whenever and wherever the board requires.

The Samonas family has had dealings with NatWest over many years
H and by 1982 the Samonases were held in high regard by NatWest. On 12 May 1982 Dimitri Samonas approached Mr. Haynes, the manager of the shipping section of the corporate financial services department of NatWest, to finance the purchase of a newly built bulk carrier. The Samonases were not willing to provide written guarantees of any sort, apparently because of fears that the revenue might obtain access to such documents with possible fiscal consequences for them. Dimitri Samonas told Mr. Haynes that the Samonases would verbally assure NatWest that they would support the vessel from other fleet income, their three ships all being unencumbered. On 4 June 1982 Mr. Haynes wrote to Captain John Samonas offering a facility of $12.8 million and pointing out that NatWest had been looking for a formal undertaking by the other ship owning companies in his group but in view of the personal assurances that Captain John Samonas and his sons had given him, NatWest was not asking for a formal undertaking. The draft facility letter supplied by NatWest indicated that the loan facility was to be offered to a Liberian company to be formed.

The Samonases then changed their plans, proposing instead to purchase a new vessel, first from a Danish yard, and by April 1983 they had decided that the new vessel would be built in a Japanese yard. They sought finance for that contract from NatWest. On 23 August 1983 the company entered into a contract with a Japanese shipbuilder for the building of a 64,100 ton bulk carrier at a cost of about $18 million. The address of the company for the service of notices was given as care of J.S.S. in London. The contract was signed by Captain John Samonas for the company and the contract included a term that the company should upon execution of the contract cause a letter of guarantee to be issued by Captain John Samonas to the shipbuilder, whereby he personally guaranteed payment of the whole of the purchase price. Only on 30 March 1984 were the terms and the execution of that contract approved by the board of the company and in turn by the shareholders.

Negotiations for the financing through NatWest of nearly $13.5 million of the contract price continued that autumn. NatWest was content to rely simply on the Samonases' verbal assurances as Captain John Samonas was told by letter of 8 December 1983, enclosing the petitioner's draft facility letter. On 15 December 1983 in London the petitioner's offer was accepted by Dimitri Samonas signing the facility letter on behalf of the company. It was thereby agreed that the facility should be evidenced by a loan agreement and secured by a first preferred mortgage on the vessel, together with an assignment to the petitioner of all the earnings of the vessel. It was a term of the facility letter that there should be no change in the ownership and control of the company for the duration of the facility.

On 30 March 1984 there was a board meeting of the company in London. In addition to approving Captain John Samonas's action in signing the shipbuilding agreement the board resolved to borrow nearly $13.5 million on the terms of the loan agreement and to execute the first preferred mortgage and assignment. The same day there was a meeting of shareholders of the company, the minutes showing Captain John Samonas, Dimitri and Nikolas Samonas as present as proxies for the shareholders. The meeting approved the board's resolutions.

Also on 30 March 1984 the loan agreement was executed in London by Captain John Samonas for the company. It provided for a loan of $13,443,872 on which interest was payable at one per cent. above London Interbank Offered Rate. The vessel was to be registered under the Greek flag. The company covenanted to keep the vessel fully insured and maintain current operating accounts with the St. Mary Axe branch of NatWest in London into which all the vessel's earnings were to be paid. The company agreed not to dispose of the vessel and not to permit any change in the ownership and control of the company. Again therefore, what was envisaged was that the Samonases would own and control the company. There was a provision that if, inter alia, the

A company failed to pay interest when it fell due, the petitioner could declare the whole of the indebtedness of the company to be immediately payable. It was provided that notice under the loan agreement should be given to the company care of Esperos in Greece with a copy to J.S.S. in London and legal process could be served on the company at the offices of J.S.S. J.S.S. was required to write a letter accepting its appointment as the agent of the company for service of process and notices.

On 2 October 1984 J.S.S. for the company asked the St. Mary Axe branch to open sterling and dollar accounts in the company's name and on 10 December 1984 Dimitri Samonas wrote to that bank, on J.S.S. paper but signing for the company directly, supplying the name and address of each of the directors of the company and the J.S.S. office was given as that address. Similarly Dimitri and Captain John Samonas wrote to that branch on 25 January 1985 on J.S.S. paper but directly for the company, requesting a transfer of some $85,000 to the petitioner, debiting the company's account. At the end of December 1984 the full loan facility was drawn down and the Samjohn Captain was delivered to the company in early January 1985.

By the first preferred mortgage made on 25 January 1985 in accordance with Greek law the company granted the petitioner a first preferred mortgage on the Samjohn Captain. J.S.S. was appointed the agent for the managers of the company so long as the mortgage was in force. In the event of any default the petitioner had the right to take possession of the vessel without giving notice. Notices were again to be sent to the company care of Esperos with a copy to J.S.S. and, to comply with Greek law, an agent and representative of the company in Greece was appointed, namely the managing director of Esperos. Again, legal process could be served on the company at J.S.S.'s office in London. That deed was executed by the company in London, as was a deed of assignment of the same date, whereby the company assigned all its earnings from the vessel to the petitioner.

In 1986 the company was adversely affected by the slump in the shipping market. The first signs of financial difficulties affecting the company appeared in the late summer of 1986. The company failed to pay its insurance premium of nearly $35,000 due on 25 July 1986. On 15 August, NatWest wrote to Dimitri Samonas about the level of borrowings on the accounts of, inter alia, the company and J.S.S. The company's sterling account was £2,691 overdrawn while the dollar account was $62,214 overdrawn. The company was due to pay $593,584.29 interest on 30 September. Because of the company's difficulties it was agreed that only $250,000 needed to be paid then, but the balance of the interest instalment, together with further interest thereon, had to be paid on or before 14 November. The $250,000 were paid but on 1 October NatWest wrote again to Dimitri Samonas pointing out that, inter alia, the company's account was in overdraft in excess of £26,000 and requesting that no further cheques be drawn.

On 3 October 1986, Dimitri Samonas for J.S.S. wrote to NatWest saying "My principals have had a very happy association with the bank for over 20 years." In the context, that could not mean the company and could only mean the Samonas family. He sought by that and a letter of 14 October the consent of the bank to the company using the earnings from the Samjohn Captain to keep it trading. But no consent was forthcoming and the bank warned that failure to pay the balance of the interest instalment on 14 November would be an act of default. On 22

October Dimitri Samonas wrote pointing out that the debts of the Samjohn Captain amounted to $350,000 and on 24 October he wrote again saying that the vessel was not producing the funds necessary to pay all the various expenses. On 10 November he wrote again saying that he had had an opportunity of consulting with the shareholders of the company. Their own resources had been exhausted. He asked that the overdue interest be capitalised. That was refused. On 13 November Dimitri Samonas wrote that there were no funds to meet the interest payment due on 14 November. There was a default the next day. On 17 November the petitioner declared the whole of the indebtedness to be due. A B

The company had on 4 November through J.S.S. in London negotiated a charterparty whereby the vessel was to be chartered to a Japanese company, Daiichi, to take coal from Newcastle, New South Wales, to Japan and a sum of $210,000 was to be paid initially into the NatWest account of the company. However on 18 November the company in breach of contract directed Daiichi to pay that sum to an account at the Midland Bank in London. The petitioner decided to arrest the Samjohn Captain which was due to arrive at Newcastle on about 19 November. A warrant for her arrest was obtained from a New South Wales Court but through ill luck bad weather delayed the vessel coming into port. On 21 November Daiichi's Australian agents in Newcastle heard of the proposed arrest and informed Daiichi. Daiichi sought and obtained from J.S.S. on 21 November an option to cancel the charter. All the decisions taken in the name of the company in respect of the charterparty were taken after the Samonases had been consulted. That option was exercised on 23 November by Daiichi's London agents telephoning Christos Samonas. In the meantime the Samjohn Captain, no doubt as a consequence of J.S.S. being made aware of the petitioner's intention to arrest the vessel, never put into Newcastle and so avoided arrest. Attempts by the petitioner to communicate with the vessel have failed or at any rate have met with no response. The vessel is not trading but is "semi-laid up" (in the words of Mr. Vennis as reported by Christos Samonas) somewhere—but where has never been revealed—off Indonesia. C D E F

The company failed to pay another insurance premium due in October and the insurers on 24 November visited the offices of J.S.S. and were told of the financial difficulties of the vessel and that the premium could not be paid. The petitioner is having to pay substantial sums to keep the vessel insured. There were without prejudice negotiations between the company and the petitioner in December. Dimitri and Christos Samonas attended two meetings as representatives of the company, but no agreement was reached. G

On 23 December, proceedings were issued by the petitioner in the Commercial Court for the recovery of its debt owed by the company. On 24 December Dimitri Samonas wrote to the petitioner saying that J.S.S. was no longer the agent for the company or the Samjohn Captain; but of course the provisions of the loan agreement and the first preferred mortgage required J.S.S. to remain agents for service of proceedings on the company. On 7 January 1987, no notice of intention to defend having been given by the company, the petitioner recovered judgment in the sum of $14,024,095.47 plus costs. Interest continues to accrue on the debt at over $5,000 per day. H

A In the meantime Esperos commenced proceedings against the company in Greece claiming that it had agreed to become the agent of and to manage in Greece the Samjohn Captain for all the vessel's supplies, wages and essential needs, and that it was owed $840,000 by the company. It claimed that the ship was the only asset of the company and was subject to navigational dangers of every nature, and that the company had the intention of causing Esperos loss and according to information (which and its source were not specified) the company intended secretly to sell the ship. For these reasons Esperos sought a temporary order forbidding the transfer of the legal status of the vessel, which order was granted on 8 December by the Piraeus court.

C The application before me has been supported by evidence put in by the petitioner of the insolvency of the company and of the incurring of huge costs and expenses including the accrual of interest since 14 November 1986. Those costs and expenses are estimated by the petitioner to exceed $800,000 and that sum continues to increase so long as the vessel is not given up.

D The affidavit evidence put in on behalf of the company in relation to the question of jurisdiction consists of affidavits from Captain John, Dimitri, Christos and Nikolas Samonas and a short affidavit from Mr. Flint, a solicitor, who states that he has the care and conduct of this matter on behalf of the company. Alone of the deponents he states that he is duly authorised to make the affidavit, although he does not state who in the company so authorised him. Mr. Flint in his affidavit deposes only to a conversation with Mr. Vennis. The burden of that affidavit evidence can be summarised thus: no member of the Samonas family has ever had any beneficial interest in any share in the company; all the Samonases ceased to be directors at a board meeting in Greece on 15 August 1986 when they all resigned and three Greeks with the surname Lemos were elected; by a management agreement dated 1 January 1985 the company appointed Esperos as manager of the Samjohn Captain and by a further agreement of the same date Esperos appointed J.S.S. as its agent; J.S.S.'s agency for Esperos was terminated on 21 November 1986 by mutual agreement and all documents relating to the vessel were forwarded to Esperos; no member of the Samonas family owns any shares in or exercises any control or influence over Esperos and the management and control of the vessel are and have since 21 November 1986 been fully in the hands of Esperos, and to the best of the Samonases' knowledge there are no assets of the company within the jurisdiction.

G This evidence raises to my mind as many or more questions as or than those which it purports to answer. No affidavit has been supplied by anyone claiming to be a director or officer of the company. Not even Mr. Vennis has put in an affidavit, although he is said to be not only the general manager but also the sole shareholder of Esperos and although on 12 February the company's solicitors said that an affidavit would be sworn by Mr. Vennis, and that despite a general strike in Greece they anticipated being in a position to serve that affidavit the following morning.

H The deponents in their affidavits are noticeably coy about the identity of the shareholders, past and present, of the company, why it has never been explained, and despite being asked by the petitioner's solicitors to provide answers to the question of ownership, no information has been forthcoming. When Dimitri Samonas swore that he did not know by whom the shares in the company were held, in my judgment he was being less than frank, having regard to the fact that on 30 March 1984 at the shareholders' meeting he was a proxy for the shareholders and on 10 November 1986 he had told NatWest by letter that he had been consulting the shareholders of the company. If the Samonases were not the shareholders, why did they allow the negotiations with the bank for the financing of the cost of a bulk carrier to proceed on the basis that they were? The stipulation that the beneficial ownership should not change was pointless unless the Samonases, on whose verbal assurances the bank was asked to rely and did rely, were the owners. Why would Captain John Samonas have given a personal guarantee to pay the full cost of building the ship if he had no beneficial interest in the company which owned the ship? It is not a sufficient explanation to say, as he does, that the shipbuilder required it or that the company would find the money: why should he, and not the shareholders, be content to give such a huge guarantee? A B C

Dimitri Samonas says that the Samonases resigned as directors on 15 August at a time when the company was able to pay and was paying its trade debts as they fell due. Apart from the inconsistency of this with the evidence of the failure to pay the July insurance premium, why did the directors resign then in flagrant breach of the loan agreement, providing as it did that there should be no change in the control of the company? Dimitri Samonas accepts that he continued to be involved in the affairs of the vessel, although he says only as a director of J.S.S. as the London agent for the vessel. How were the new directors chosen? There is no evidence indeed that the new directors agreed to become directors. If they did, why is there no evidence whatsoever of any meeting by them or of any decision or act on their part? D E

There is no evidence as to how and why the agency of J.S.S. was terminated in breach of the company's obligation under the first preferred mortgage apart from the statement that it was by mutual agreement with Esperos. Further, why if the agency of J.S.S. was terminated on 21 November was Christos Samonas accepting on 23 November for the company Daiichi's exercise of the option to terminate the charterparty, and why on 24 November was J.S.S. telling the insurance agents that the insurance premiums would not be paid? Is it really to be believed that Dimitri and Christos Samonas, in negotiating in December for the company as Christos Samonas now deposes, were acting only in their personal capacity at the request of Mr. Vennis instead of acting as they had always done for the company? It was not revealed at the time that they were acting merely in their personal capacity. F G

In relation to Esperos, why if no Samonas owns any share in or exercises control or influence over Esperos are the only directors shown in the Panamanian Companies' Register members of the Samonas family? Captain John and Nikolas Samonas say they are non-executive directors but presumably there must be an executive director. Why, if they own no shares in the company, did they give personal guarantees as security for a guarantee of $5,000 given for Esperos by the Piraeus branch of NatWest? It is suggested by the Samonases that Mr. Vennis is in control of Esperos but against that must be set evidence that in January 1987, when he was asked by that Piraeus branch to provide cash backing for that and another guarantee of £6,000, Mr. Vennis said that he had to speak to London. Why on 5 February 1987, when pressed for H

Peter Gibson J.

A a definite answer, did Mr. Vennis says that the matter was out of his hands and that his "boss" had told him that nothing would be decided?

B There is no evidence to explain or justify the company's flagrant breach of its contractual obligations or of the steps which it has taken to avoid the arrest of the vessel. The inevitable inference, to my mind, is that those in control of the company are deliberately seeking to keep the vessel out of the hands of the petitioner regardless of the insolvency of the company and the harm that is being done to the legitimate interests of the company's creditors. The purpose of all this may be seen from the open offer that has recently been made by the company by its solicitors: it seeks to force the petitioner to accept only $9 million in total extinction of the petitioner's security and the petitioner releasing not only the company but also its present and past directors and officers.

C The conduct of those in control of the company seems to me to be nothing short of disgraceful.

D The company's evidence, as Miss Heilbron was constrained to admit, was not as complete or as satisfactory as it might be. On the third day of this hearing, towards the close of her submissions, she applied for an adjournment for several days to enable further evidence to be put in to deal with the question to what extent the company had carried on business within the jurisdiction. I refused that application. It had been alleged in the petition as well as in the affidavit in support of the application for a provisional liquidator that the company had traded here, and the company has had ample time to complete its evidence. I have been indulgent in allowing evidence to be adduced in the course of this hearing and I must decide this application on the evidence that is now before me.

E The first and major question is whether the court has jurisdiction to wind up the company notwithstanding that it is an overseas company. I start with the statutory provisions for the winding up of unregistered companies, now to be found in Part V of the Insolvency Act 1986. The company is of course such a company. Section 221(1) provides:

F "Subject to the provisions of this Part, any unregistered company may be wound up under this Act; and all the provisions of this Act and the Companies Act about winding up apply to an unregistered company with the exceptions and additions mentioned in the following subsections."

G The provisions about winding up include section 125(1) which (so far as material) provides that the court should not refuse to make a winding up order on the ground only that the company's assets have been mortgaged to an amount equal to or in excess of these assets or that the company has no assets. Section 221(5) provides:

H "The circumstances in which an unregistered company may be wound up are as follows:—(a) if the company is dissolved, or has ceased to carry on business, or is carrying on business only for the purpose of winding up its affairs; (b) if the company is unable to pay its debts; (c) if the court is of opinion that it is just and equitable that the company should be wound up."

The reader of those provisions without the benefit of judicial authority might be forgiven for thinking that the question whether for the purpose of exercising the statutory jurisdiction the court has jurisdiction to wind up an unregistered company falls to be answered by reference to the statutory conditions. In the present case what is asserted by the petitioner and is abundantly clear from the evidence is that the company is unable to pay its debts. Not only is there an unsatisfied judgment debt in excess of $14 million but it is common ground that the only known asset of the company, the vessel, is worth substantially less than that sum. On the company's own evidence of the vessel's value in November 1986, it was worth a mere $7 million. The petitioner puts the value of the Samjohn Captain somewhat higher, but even on the higher value it is clear that there is a substantial shortfall.

However, it is plain from authorities binding on me that the question of jurisdiction is not determined simply by reference to the statutory provisions and that there are what Megarry J. in In re Compania Merabello San Nicholas S.A. [1973] Ch. 75, 86, called the inherent requirements of jurisdiction to make a winding up order in respect of a foreign company which have to be satisfied in addition to the statutory conditions. Megarry J. summarised the essentials of the relevant law relating to the existence of jurisdiction to make a winding up order in what he called normal cases in respect of a foreign company, at pp. 91–92:

“(1) There is no need to establish that the company ever had a place of business here. (2) There is no need to establish that the company ever carried on business here, unless perhaps the petition is based upon the company carrying on or having carried on business. (3) A proper connection with the jurisdiction must be established by sufficient evidence to show (a) that the company has some asset or assets within the jurisdiction, and (b) that there are one or more persons concerned in the proper distribution of the assets over whom the jurisdiction is exercisable. (4) It suffices if the assets of the company within the jurisdiction are of any nature; they need not be ‘commercial’ assets, or assets which indicate that the company formerly carried on business here. (5) The assets need not be assets which will be distributable to creditors by the liquidator in the winding up: it suffices if by the making of the winding up order they will be of benefit to a creditor or creditors in some other way. (6) If it is shown that there is no reasonable possibility of benefit accruing to creditors from making the winding up order, the jurisdiction is excluded.”

When Mr. Blackburne opened the petitioner's case to me he, like Mr. Vos on the ex parte application, put it on the footing that jurisdiction was founded by the presence of assets within the jurisdiction because, he said, there were good claims against at least Dimitri, Christos and Nikolas Samonas that they had been guilty of fraudulent trading or wrongful trading within the meaning of sections 213 and 214 of the Insolvency Act 1986 which, at the suit of the liquidator, would be likely to produce a substantial sum of money by way of contributions to the company's assets. The question whether there are assets within the jurisdiction such as to give the court jurisdiction to wind up must as Miss Heilbron submitted and I accept, be determined as at the moment the petition is presented. But to my mind it is fallacious to reason that there are assets to found the jurisdiction because, if the court has jurisdiction and makes a winding up order, assets will then arise: compare Siskina (Owners of cargo lately laden on board) v. Distos Compania Naviera S.A. [1979] A.C. 210, 257.

Peter Gibson J.

A Seeing the way the judicial wind was blowing, Mr. Blackburne then adroitly changed tack. He submitted that the existence of assets within the jurisdiction was not necessary to found jurisdiction. Whilst that is normally the way that both a sufficient connection with the jurisdiction and a benefit to the creditors are shown, it was not, he said, an essential requirement in every case. What was important, he submitted, was to satisfy the court of a sufficient connection with the jurisdiction. Miss Heilbron's first line of defence was that the presence of assets within the jurisdiction must be shown.

B Before looking at authority let me consider the rationality of that proposition. Take a case, no doubt unusual, where a foreign company is incorporated abroad but thereafter the only jurisdiction with which it has a close connection is this jurisdiction. For example, if the company has been trading here actively, incurring trade debts here, perhaps at a time when there was no prospect of paying in full the debts as they fell due, but then, fearing court proceedings a director causes all the assets of the company to be removed from the jurisdiction. In those circumstances why should not the English court have jurisdiction to wind up the company at the suit of a creditor if satisfied that there is a reasonable possibility of benefit resulting from the winding up? Why should the mere fact that the assets were removed, perhaps to a place which is not known, deprive the court of jurisdiction where there is no other jurisdiction with which the company has a closer connection? I cannot see any logical reason why the court should not have jurisdiction.

D However, Miss Heilbron was able to rely on what was said in Banque des Marchands de Moscou (Koupetschesky) v. Kindersley [1951] Ch. 112. In that case a Russian bank had been dissolved in Russia in 1918. In 1932 Eve J. made an order winding up the company on the basis that the bank's agent had registered the bank here in 1920. As any agency must have terminated with the company's dissolution the basis of Eve J.'s decision could not withstand a challenge. However, in 1949 the bank's liquidator brought an action against English defendants to recover sums alleged to be due to the bank. The defendants took out a summons to dismiss on the basis, in effect, that the bank did not exist and that the winding up order was invalid. Harman J. dismissed the summons on a ground that is not material to the present case but also held that the fact that the company had assets in this country conferred jurisdiction to make the winding up order. The defendants appealed. The Court of Appeal would have differed from Harman J. in respect of the ground on which he dismissed the summons but then went on to consider whether Eve J. had jurisdiction to make the winding up order on a ground other than registration. They considered whether it was a statutory condition for the exercise of jurisdiction to wind up a foreign company that it should have conducted business here and concluded that it was not. They then considered whether there was jurisdiction to wind up the bank which had been dissolved. Sir Raymond Evershed M.R. said, at pp. 125-126:

H "As a matter of general principle, our courts would not assume, and Parliament should not be taken to have intended to confer, jurisdiction over matters which naturally and properly lie within the competence of the courts of other countries. There must be assets here to administer and persons subject, or at least submitting, to the jurisdiction who are concerned or interested in the proper distribution of the assets. . . . The existence of assets here, the presence here of persons claiming as creditors of the bank or said to be indebted to them, seem to constitute at least the indicia of a business in some sense formerly conducted here. Where, therefore, the circumstances exist which, upon the general principle above referred to would make the case appropriate for the exercise by our court of its winding up jurisdiction, it would appear that the question whether the foreign corporation carried on business in this country would generally be academic, unless it is also necessary to show that that business was carried on directly and from some established or specified place or places in this country."

And the court went on to hold that it was not so necessary.

Miss Heilbron fastens on the words "There must be assets here to administer," but such words must be read in their context. Evershed M.R. was speaking in the context of a case where the presence of assets and creditors in this country was sufficient, as the Court of Appeal held, to confer jurisdiction on the English court. If he was attempting to lay down a universal rule then he was going beyond what was necessary for his decision.

C

That appears to be the way Megarry J. in the Merabello case [1973] Ch. 75 viewed what Evershed M.R. said. At the start of the passage at p. 91 which I cited, he referred to the essentials as being those in normal cases. Earlier, at p. 86, he described as the usual essentials the presence of assets and creditors here. Again, he said, at p. 88:

D

"a petitioner who can satisfy section 399 [of the Companies Act 1948, the predecessor of section 221 of the Insolvency Act 1986] must normally go on and show that the company has assets of some sort here, and that there are claimants for those assets over whom there is jurisdiction . . ."

As he put it, it suffices if there are.

Megarry J. was also not prepared to give the words of Evershed M.R. their literal meaning—that there must be assets to administer in the winding up. In the Merabello case the only asset here was a claim which, under the Third Parties (Rights against Insurers) Act 1930 (20 & 21 Geo. 5, c. 25), on a winding up order would vest automatically in the petitioner in that case. That asset would never be administered in the liquidation. I respectfully echo Megarry J.'s words, at p. 91:

F

"Words in a judgment must be construed in relation to the subject matter of the case in question, and not as if they were Acts of Parliament."

G

Miss Heilbron rightly pointed out that the ratio of the decision in the Merabello case, unlike the present case, turned on the existence of an asset of the company within the jurisdiction immediately before the winding up. However, in In re Eloc Electro-Optieck and Communicatie B.V. [1982] Ch. 43 Nourse J. held that the court had jurisdiction to wind up a Dutch company which had no assets within the jurisdiction. In that case the Dutch company had traded in England but never had a place of business here. The petitioners were two employees whom the Dutch company dismissed. They recovered judgment against that company in 1978. The Dutch company ceased operating in 1979. On the hearing of the petition the Dutch company was not represented but in a

H

Peter Gibson J.

A reserved judgment Nourse J. held that the court had jurisdiction to wind it up. He referred to Megarry J.'s summary of the essentials in a normal case and to the fact that the petitioners had applied to the Department of Employment for payment out of the redundancy fund but that under the statutory provisions no payment could be made until the company was wound up. He stated that there was a reasonable possibility of benefit accruing to the petitioner from the making of a winding up order. Nourse J. continued, at p. 48:

“The benefit would consist of assets coming into the hands of the petitioners not from the company but from an outside source which can only be tapped if an order is made. In the light of that consideration and of the facts, first, that the company did carry on business in England and Wales, secondly, that it employed the petitioners in that business, and, thirdly, that the potential source of assets is directly related to that employment, there is, in my judgment, sufficient to found the jurisdiction of the court. To put it another way, it would, in my judgment, be a lamentable state of affairs if the court's jurisdiction was excluded by the mere technicality that the assets, in respect of which the reasonable possibility of benefit accruing to the petitioners derived, belonged not to the company but to an outside source. I think that support for this view is to be found in the fourth and fifth essentials in Megarry J.'s summary [1973] Ch. 75, 92: . . .”—and then he cites those essentials and continues—“That shows, first, that the assets can be of any nature and, secondly, that the consequential benefit accruing to a creditor or creditors need not be channelled through the hands of the liquidator. To my mind that confirms that the ownership of the assets by the company is not a matter of crucial importance. I must again observe that Megarry J.'s summary of the essentials was directed to normal cases.”

And accordingly, he held that this was a case in which the court had jurisdiction to wind up a Dutch company.

To my mind it is clear first that the assets to come into the hands of the petitioners in that case were not assets existing at the moment of presentation of the petition: they were the potential fruits of a claim that could only be made if the company was wound up. Secondly, the assets were never in any sense assets of the company. Nourse J., at pp. 46 and 47, had referred to an argument presented to him by counsel for the petitioners to the effect that there was no overriding requirement that the company should have assets within the jurisdiction and that what was important was the carrying on of business in the country. Nourse J. stated that he found it unnecessary to decide whether that proposition could be made out. But whilst he may not have decided the question whether the mere carrying on of business was enough, if I may say so with the greatest respect, Nourse J. does seem to me to have decided that there is no universal requirement in every case that there should be assets within the jurisdiction to found the jurisdiction to wind up a foreign company. In an abnormal case like the Eloc case, the court has jurisdiction, even though there are no assets here.

As I understand that decision therefore, it does support Mr. Blackburne's proposition that there need be no assets within the jurisdiction provided that there is a sufficient connection with the jurisdiction and provided that there is a reasonable possibility of benefit accruing to the creditors from the winding up. A

Miss Heilbron submitted that the Eloc case was distinguishable on its facts. Of course, the facts were different. The source of the benefit was to come from a third party which had nothing to do with the Dutch company and the benefits would never accrue to the company but directly to the petitioners, but I cannot see why that should make the present case one less suitable for the court's jurisdiction. The benefit in the present case would consist of the contribution to the assets of the company to make up for losses caused by the wrongful or fraudulent trading of the company. Further, a substantial element in the fraudulent and wrongful trading claim would be the amount of interest that has continued to accrue and that is of course directly related to the petitioner's debt. Another factual difference from the Eloc case is that there the petitioners were ex-employees. But the fact that the petitioner here is a creditor relying on a debt incurred by the company under an agreement made here again does not seem to me to be a material difference. In both the Eloc case and the present case it is an important circumstance that there is said to have been the carrying on of business in this country by the company in question. B C

Miss Heilbron then said that the Eloc case was wrongly decided, first because it was inconsistent with Banque des Marchands de Moscou (Koupetschesky) v. Kindersley [1951] Ch. 112. For the reasons which I have already given I do not accept that. She also said that it was wrongly decided because, for the court to have jurisdiction to wind up a foreign company with no assets here, the company has to have been trading here at the time the petition was presented. She relied by analogy on the statutory requirements for service on a foreign corporation in respect of which the ability to serve on that company at a place of business established by that company in this country has been held to be limited by the necessity to show that the company was carrying on business at the time of service. I cannot obtain any assistance from those specific statutory provisions or the authorities thereon, dealing as they do only with service. What Parliament has thought fit to provide in relation to service is likely to be governed by the necessity to bring that which has to be served to the notice of the foreign company. The question of jurisdiction seems to me to involve a wholly different concept, that is to say a sufficient connection with this country. I would add that no authority on jurisdiction has been cited to me to support Miss Heilbron's proposition on this point. D E F

In the circumstances, I am prepared consistently with the Eloc case [1982] Ch. 43 to hold that the presence of assets in this country is not an essential condition for the court to have jurisdiction in relation to the winding up of a foreign company. In my judgment, provided a sufficient connection with the jurisdiction is shown, and there is a reasonable possibility of benefit for the creditors from the winding up, the court has jurisdiction to wind up the foreign company. G H

I turn then to the question whether there is a sufficient connection with the jurisdiction. The following matters seem to me to provide such a connection. First, the company incurred the debt on which the petitioner, an English company, relies under an English loan agreement negotiated and executed here, and requiring performance here. Second, there is clear evidence that the company has carried on business in England. All the directors and officers of the company were resident in

3 W.L.R.

In re A Company (Ch.D.)

Peter Gibson J.

A England at least until August 1986. All the negotiations for the loan from the petitioner were carried on in London, all the loan documents were executed in London, and the only bank accounts of the company that are known were in London. Even as late as 18 November 1986 the company, when in breach of its contractual obligation decided that the Daiichi freight should not be paid into the NatWest account, directed payment to an account with another London bank. Charterparties were negotiated and agreed here. In relation to the Daiichi charterparty, the petitioner's evidence, which is accepted by Dimitri Samonas, is that all the arrangements were made in London and the decisions were taken here by J.S.S. for the company after reference to the Samonases. That shows that even in November management decisions on the company's business were being taken in London. At least two business letters were written directly in the name of the company from J.S.S.'s offices and those offices were the address given to NatWest as the address of the directors of the company. Miss Heilbron submitted that it was not sufficient for a company to trade here through agents but I do not follow this. If what was done was done in the name of and for the company I fail to see why that is not the company carrying on business here through its agents. She also referred me to the requirements that, under the loan agreement and the first preferred mortgage, notices under those documents were to be given to the company care of Esperos. She also relied on the agreements of 1 January 1985 for the Esperos company to be the manager and J.S.S. to be the agent or sub-manager in respect of the Samjohn Captain. But there is no evidence that any act was done by J.S.S. pursuant to that agreement, or that Esperos exercised any control whatever over J.S.S. In all their dealings with NatWest and the petitioner it was never suggested by the Samonases that J.S.S. was merely acting as sub-managers or agents for Esperos as distinct from acting for the company. In my judgment therefore, it can be said, on the evidence before me, that at least until November 1986 the company has been effectively managed from London by the Samonas family and has carried on business here, either directly or through J.S.S. There is, I would stress, no evidence that the company has carried on business outside this country at all. The only business transacted at the one board meeting known to have taken place abroad in August 1986 was merely to accept the directors' resignations and to appoint other directors.

It is also appropriate for the court to consider whether any other jurisdiction is more appropriate for the winding up of this admittedly insolvent company. In my judgment, there is none. Miss Heilbron accepts that Liberia is not a serious rival to this country for the purpose of jurisdiction. The company seems to have had nothing to do with Liberia after its incorporation. But she suggested that Greece might be a more appropriate jurisdiction. I do not accept that. Apart from the fact that the vessel flies a Greek flag and that notices under the loan agreement and first preferred mortgage are required to be sent to the company care of Esperos in Greece I cannot see on what basis Greece would be a more appropriate jurisdiction to wind up the company. In my judgment, for the reasons I have given, the company has a much closer connection with this jurisdiction.

I am therefore satisfied that, on the evidence that has been put before me, the company has a sufficiently close connection with the jurisdiction, and that there is no more appropriate jurisdiction for the winding up of the company which plainly ought to be wound up.

I turn next to the question whether there is a reasonable possibility of benefit accruing to creditors from the making of a winding up order. That such is the appropriate test appears from the Merabello case [1973] Ch. 75 and the Eloc case [1982] Ch. 43. Similarly in In re Allobrogia Steamship Corporation [1978] 3 All E.R. 423 the company there had a claim of the same type as in the Merabello case and that was the asset which founded jurisdiction for the court. Slade J. held that it was not necessary to show that the claim was one which was certain to succeed. It was sufficient to show that the claim had a reasonable possibility of success.

In the present case Mr. Blackburne has submitted that there is a reasonable possibility of the liquidator recovering contributions to the assets of the company from members of the Samonas family under sections 213 and 214 of the Insolvency Act 1986. To my mind it is abundantly clear that those who have been in charge of the company since at least the end of October 1986 have been conducting the affairs of the company in a way that is likely to bring them within the scope of one or both of those sections, and whilst the Act does not state how much can be recovered under those sections, the additional costs and debts incurred at a time when the company should have ceased trading and given up the vessel provide a likely measure of those contributions.

I did not understand Miss Heilbron to contend that sections 213 and 214 could not apply in the present case. She quarrelled about one item in the quantification of the costs and expenses incurred since November 1986, but that is a comparatively minor matter. I recognise that the question whether the liquidator will wish to and will be able to succeed against the Samonas turns on disputed questions of fact in view of the apparent resignation of the Samonas of their directorships and the termination of J.S.S.'s agency. But I bear in mind the wide terms of those sections, for example, that for fraudulent trading under section 213 someone who is knowingly a party to the fraudulent trading of the company may be liable, and similarly for wrongful trading under section 214 shadow directors may be held liable. On the evidence before me I would agree with Mr. Blackburne that there is a reasonable possibility of the liquidator succeeding in proceedings against at least Dimitri and Christos Samonas and they are resident in this country. I think it undesirable to say more on what may well have to be litigated at a later date.

Accordingly I reach the conclusion that on the existing evidence before me there is a reasonable possibility of benefit accruing to the creditors from the winding up of the company. It seems to me therefore that the court has jurisdiction to make a winding up order in relation to the company.

Ought the court to exercise its power to appoint a provisional liquidator at this stage? Mr. Blackburne submitted that I should because the single known asset of the company, the Samjohn Captain, is being kept out at sea and the debts of the company are thereby constantly increasing by over $5,000 per day. Further, he pointed to what was said by Esperos in the Greek proceedings, in particular that the company may be trying to sell the vessel. The provisional liquidator, he submits, will be able to exercise the wide powers now conferred on such an officer under sections 234 to 236 of the Insolvency Act 1986 to obtain information to ascertain the whereabouts of the vessel and who are in

3 W.L.R.

Peter Gibson J.

A control of her, with a view to bringing the vessel back into responsible hands.

This is an unusual application in that the court will normally only be looking to safeguard assets within the jurisdiction that are in jeopardy, but then this is a highly unusual case. Those in control of the company have behaved badly in flouting its contractual obligations in running up costs unnecessarily and in seeking to force the petitioner to accept far less than it is entitled to. In the meantime, the company's debts increase daily. In these special circumstances therefore it seems to me that it is appropriate to appoint a provisional liquidator. The official receiver would normally be appointed but because of the unusual tasks with which the provisional liquidator will be faced in seeking to recover the vessel, the petitioner has requested the appointment of Mr. Houghton, a partner in Touche Ross & Co. The official receiver has indicated his acquiescence in such an appointment. I shall so order.

Order accordingly.

Crime—Homicide—Murder—Jury unable to agree on murder charge—Whether conviction of manslaughter valid without prior acquittal of murder—Criminal Law Act 1967 (c. 58), s. 6(2)

The Criminal Law Act 1967 provides by section 6(2):

“On an indictment for murder a person found not guilty of murder may be found guilty—(a) of manslaughter . . .”

H

The appellant was charged on an indictment containing a single count of murder, in that he had killed the victim by stabbing her with a carving knife. At the trial, the prosecution maintained that notwithstanding the amount of alcohol that the appellant had consumed, he had been able to form the necessary intent to kill or cause grievous bodily harm and was, therefore, guilty of murder, but that, if the jury were not satisfied that he had had the necessary intent, he was guilty of manslaughter. No plea of guilty of manslaughter was tendered on behalf of the appellant. After the jury had indicated that they were having difficulty on the question of intent and the judge had given them a further direction, he subsequently asked the prosecution

Reg. v. Saunders (H.L.(E.))

whether they would accept a verdict of manslaughter, to which they agreed. The judge recalled the jury and directed them that if at least 10 of them were agreed that all the ingredients of manslaughter were made out and the only thing dividing them was whether the necessary intent for murder had been established, he would be prepared to discharge them from returning a verdict on murder and accept a verdict based on manslaughter. The appellant's counsel assented to that direction being given. The jury subsequently returned a unanimous verdict of guilty of manslaughter, and the judge discharged them from giving a verdict on the charge of murder. The appellant appealed against conviction, submitting on the basis of section 6(2) of the Act of 1967, to which attention had not been directed at the trial, that the jury could not validly have returned a verdict of manslaughter because they had not first acquitted him of murder. The Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) dismissed the appeal.

On appeal by the appellant:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that on its true construction section 6(2) of the Criminal Law Act 1967 did not apply to a situation where the jury had never been able to reach a verdict of acquittal of murder because they had been unable to agree on such a verdict; and that, since a judge had a judicial discretion to discharge a jury from giving a verdict if they were unable to agree, he was entitled to discharge them from giving a verdict of murder where they were agreed on a verdict of manslaughter and justice was properly satisfied by such a verdict (post, pp. 357G—358A, 361C—D, 362B—C, H—363A, 365B—C).

Winsor v. The Queen (1866) L.R. 1 Q.B. 289 applied.

Reg. v. Greenwood (1857) 7 Cox C.C. 404 and Rex v. Clifford [1914] Ir. L.T. 28 considered.

Per curiam. (i) It is not necessary, where there is a possibility on a count of murder of a jury returning a verdict of manslaughter, that the indictment should contain two counts, namely murder and manslaughter. Such a course would be contrary to long established practice and undesirable (post, pp. 357G—358A, 364B—D, 365B—C).

(ii) If the appellant's submission had been correct, there would have been no valid conclusion to the trial and it would have been a classic case where a venire de novo could have been granted (post, pp. 357G—358A, 365A—B, B—C).

APPEAL from the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division).

This was an appeal by Keith Saunders by leave of the House of Lords from the judgment of the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) (Lawton L.J., Drake and Hirst JJ.) [1986] 1 W.L.R. 1163 given on 23 May 1986 dismissing the appellant's appeal against his conviction of manslaughter on 9 September 1985 in the Maidstone Crown Court (Otton J. and a jury).

The Court of Appeal refused the appellant leave to appeal from their decision, but on 24 July 1986 the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords (Lord Bridge of Harwich, Lord Brandon of Oakbrook and Lord Ackner) [1986] 1 W.L.R. 1163, 1169 allowed a petition by him for leave.

The facts and the question certified by the Court of Appeal are set out in the opinion of Lord Ackner.

James Townend Q.C. and James Turner for the appellant.

Nicholas Purnell Q.C. and David Radcliffe for the Crown.

G Their Lordships took time for consideration.

16 July. LORD KEITH OF KINKEL. My Lords, I have had the opportunity of reading in draft the speech to be delivered by my noble and learned friend Lord Ackner. I agree with it, and for the reasons he gives I too would answer the certified question as he proposes and dismiss the appeal.

H LORD GRIFFITHS. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend Lord Ackner. I agree with it, and for the reasons that he gives would answer the certified question as he proposes and dismiss the appeal.

LORD MACKAY OF CLASHFERN. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend

Lord Ackner. I agree with it, and for the reasons that he gives would answer the certified question as he proposes and dismiss the appeal. A LORD ACKNER. My Lords, this appeal raises a short and highly technical point of law. The facts, which I shall shortly recite, disclose a case which even the most charitably minded would be obliged to describe as totally without merit.

In September 1985 the appellant stood trial at the Crown Court at Maidstone before Otton J. and a jury on an indictment which contained the single count of murder. The prosecution's case, put quite simply, was that on 29 October 1984 the appellant and Jeanette Lazenby, with whom he had been living, went out for the day. They had both consumed alcohol, a moderate amount on the part of Miss Lazenby, a considerable amount of drink on the part of the appellant. B

In the afternoon they travelled back to the home of Mr. Ayres in Tunbridge Wells where they were living. They went into the kitchen, an argument developed, the appellant at some stage got hold of a carving knife and deliberately stabbed Jeanette Lazenby, thus killing her. The prosecution maintained that, notwithstanding that amount of drink, the appellant was able to and did, in fact, form the necessary intent to kill or cause serious bodily harm and was therefore guilty of murder. The Crown submitted in the alternative, that if the jury were not satisfied that the appellant had the necessary intent, then he was guilty of manslaughter. C

Amongst the many witnesses who gave evidence for the prosecution was Mr. Ayres, who returned to his house in the afternoon, heard an argument going on between the deceased and the appellant and twice remonstrated with them about the noise they were making. Thereafter having heard a particularly loud scream from the kitchen, he rushed in and found Jeanette lying on her back on the floor with a patch of blood on her jumper. The appellant said "what have I done, what have I done?" Mr. Ayres having unsuccessfully tried to resuscitate the girl, the police and the ambulance were called. D

The appellant did not give evidence at the trial, the explanation put forth on his behalf being that he had no recollection of what had happened in the kitchen. A surprising variety of possibilities were suggested for the jury's consideration such as, that the deceased had killed herself either accidentally or intentionally, that she had been killed by some unidentified third party, that the appellant had accidentally committed the act which caused her death, that the appellant had killed her in the course of lawfully defending himself against her, that the appellant had killed her as a result of provocation by her, that the appellant had killed her but had been so drunk at the time as not to have the necessary mens rea for murder, and that the appellant had killed her without the intention of killing her or doing serious bodily harm. A pathologist called by the Crown gave evidence that the fatal stab wound, having regard both to its direction and to the force with which it must have been delivered, could not have been self-inflicted. The only possible third party was Mr. Ayres and it was not suggested that he had attacked the deceased. As regards self defence and provocation, the accused in his statements to the police had made no suggestion of any facts which could raise these defences. E

The jury retired at 12.49 p.m. on the fourth day of the trial. At 3.50 p.m. the judge gave the jury a majority direction. Shortly after 4 p.m. F G H

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Saunders (H.L.(E.))

Lord Ackner

A the judge received a note from the jury which read: "The jury is split between murder and manslaughter at present and would welcome further guidance on the distinctions between them." This note was discussed in the absence of the jury by the judge with counsel, since the note did not indicate the basis upon which the jury were considering manslaughter. At 4.15 p.m. with the concurrence of counsel, the judge asked the foreman of the jury: "Is the matter which is troubling you a distinction between murder and manslaughter on the question of the intent in relation to the effect of drink?" Having received an affirmative answer the judge then gave the jury an appropriate further direction stating, inter alia:

C "ask yourselves the question whether you feel sure that at the time he attacked Jeanette Lazenby he had the requisite intent to kill or cause serious bodily harm, but before you can convict you must be satisfied so that you feel sure not merely that Keith Saunders was capable of forming the intent, but also that he did in fact, may I repeat in fact, form that intent. If you are sure he did have the intention to kill or to cause serious injury, then he is guilty of murder; but if you think he might not have had the necessary intent, but you are satisfied he caused the death by a deliberate and unjustified act, then he is not guilty of murder but guilty of manslaughter."

E Sometime after 5 p.m. the judge was concerned that the jury had still failed to reach a verdict. He indicated to counsel that he proposed to recall them, to emphasise the desirability of their reaching a verdict, but that if after retiring once again they should indicate that there was no prospect of reaching a verdict, then he would discharge them and order a retrial. Mr. Townend for the appellant, pointed out that in view of their answer to the judge's question, they could well have agreed at least on a verdict of manslaughter. The judge then inquired whether the prosecution would be prepared to accept a verdict of manslaughter. Mr. Purnell for the prosecution, informed the judge that no such plea had been tendered by Mr. Townend, since he was not in a position on his instructions to offer such a plea, but that if it had been offered, he would have accepted it, in the light of the evidence on alcohol. He considered that it was not in the interests of justice that there should be another week's trial and accordingly he was prepared to accept a verdict of manslaughter.

G After some further discussion the judge suggested recalling the jury and directing them in the following terms:

H "If at least 10 of you are agreed that all the ingredients of manslaughter are made out, and the only thing which is dividing you is whether the necessary intent for murder has been established, then provided at least 10 of you are agreed on that, I am prepared to discharge you from returning a verdict on murder and I am prepared to accept a verdict based on manslaughter."

Mr. Townend assented to the judge taking this course. Accordingly the jury were recalled into court at 5.47 p.m. and the judge gave the direction to which I have referred. At 6 p.m. the jury returned and in answer to the question put by the clerk of the court as to whether "In respect of the offence of murder, have at least 10 of your number agreed on your verdict?" the answer was "No." The clerk then asked

"In respect of the offence of manslaughter, have at least 10 of your number agreed on your verdict?" to which the answer was "yes" and that verdict was a unanimous one of guilty of manslaughter. The jury was subsequently discharged from giving a verdict on the charge of murder.

Thereafter the judge, having heard medical evidence called by the Crown as to the appellant's personality and his previous record of violence, sentenced him to life imprisonment.

Since the trial took place Mr. Townend's attention was drawn to section 6(2) of the Criminal Law Act 1967 which is in these terms:

"On an indictment for murder a person found not guilty of murder may be found guilty—(a) of manslaughter, or of causing grievous bodily harm with intent to do so; or (b) of any offence of which he may be found guilty under an enactment specifically so providing, or under section 4(2) of this Act; or (c) of an attempt to commit murder, or of an attempt to commit any other offence of which he might be found guilty; but may not be found guilty of any offence not included above."

He accordingly appealed to the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) and submitted that the jury could not have validly returned a verdict of manslaughter, because they had not first acquitted the appellant of murder. This would mean that the trial had ended without a valid verdict. In the Court of Appeal Mr. Townend accepted that a trial which ends without a valid verdict is no trial at all and accordingly on the authority of Reg. v. Rose (Newton) [1982] A.C. 822 the court was entitled to order a retrial on a venire de novo. I share the Court of Appeal's difficulty in appreciating how success in the Court of Appeal would have advanced the interest of the appellant, who would then be in jeopardy on a retrial of being convicted of murder. Moreover, I entirely agree with the Court of Appeal that it would be disregarding the public interest if a retrial were not ordered. The Court of Appeal, however, dismissed the appeal but certified the following point of law as being of general public interest:

"If on an indictment charging murder a jury cannot agree that murder has been proved and are discharged from returning a verdict on the charge of murder but they are agreed that all the elements of manslaughter have been proved, can they validly return a verdict of manslaughter having regard to the provisions of section 6(2) of the Criminal Law Act 1967?"

Your Lordships subsequently gave the appellant leave to appeal to your Lordships' House.

Mr. Townend's submission is a simple one. Where an accused is tried on an indictment containing a single count of murder, section 6(2) makes it a condition precedent to a valid conviction of manslaughter that the accused has first been acquitted of murder. Mr. Townend, while recognising that it is the long established practice not to include in an indictment for murder a count of manslaughter, submits that section 6(2) makes this desirable whenever there is a possibility of the jury returning a verdict of manslaughter. Where such a possibility is not recognised, then the remedy, on the jury announcing a failure to agree on the offence of murder, is for the judge at that very late stage to allow the indictment to be amended to add a count of manslaughter.

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Saunders (H.L.(E.))

Lord Ackner

A Mr. Purnell's submission is equally simple. The Act, as its long title records, was essentially to amend the law

"by abolishing the division of crimes into felonies and misdemeanours and to amend and simplify the law in respect of matters arising from or related to that division or the abolition of it . . ."

B Section 6(2) of the Act did not take away the powers of the common law that existed before the Act. The section provided specifically for a particular situation, namely where the jury had acquitted of murder. It made it clear that such an acquittal did not necessarily bring the trial to an end. Where the judge had properly directed the jury to consider an available lesser offence, then for the trial to be fully concluded, the jury had to bring in a verdict on the lesser offence. If they failed to agree then they would have to be discharged and a new trial could then properly be ordered limited to the lesser offence. The section was thus giving effect to the Privy Council decision of Director of Public Prosecutions v. Nasralla [1967] 2 A.C. 238.

C In my judgment section 6(2) was not concerned with and had no application to a situation in which the jury had never been able to reach a verdict of acquittal of murder because they could not agree on such a verdict. That position was provided for by the common law which has not been abrogated by the statute.

D The crime of murder has always been in a special category. As long ago as Reg. v. Salisbury (1553) 1 Pl. 97 juries have been entitled to return verdicts of manslaughter on indictments charging murder:

E "when he was arraigned for killing a man upon malice prepense, the substance of the matter was, whether he killed him or not, and the malice prepense is but matter of form or the circumstance of killing. And although the malice prepense makes the fact more odious, and for this cause the offender shall lose divers advantages, which he should otherwise have, as sanctuary, clergy, and the like, yet it is nothing more than the manner of the fact, and not the substance of the fact, for the substance of the fact is the killing him, and then when the substance of the fact and the manner of the fact are put in issue together, if the jurors find the substance and not the manner, yet judgment shall be given according to the substance" (per Bromley C.J., at p. 101).

F That decision was followed in Mackalley's Case (1611) 9 Co. Rep. 61b. In East's Pleas of the Crown (1803 ed.), vol. I, p. 371, it is stated:

G "Upon every indictment for petit treason or murder, the jury may negative the higher offence, and find their verdict for any lesser species of homicide; . . . So in appeals, the defendant in an appeal of murder may be found guilty of manslaughter only; . . ."

H In Deacon's Digest of the Criminal Law (1831), vol. I, p. 458, it is stated:

"So, if A be charged with the murder of B—that is, with feloniously killing B of malice prepense—and all but the fact of malice prepense be proved, A may clearly be convicted of manslaughter; . . ."

It was not until Newton's Case (1849) 13 Q.B. 716 that it was decided that the judge, in the proper exercise of his judicial discretion, could discharge a jury before they had reached a verdict. In Winsor v.

The Queen (1866) L.R. 1 Q.B. 289, 303 Cockburn C.J. stated in terms that, A

“after the jury have retired to consider their verdict, and have remained in deliberation a full and sufficient time, if they are not agreed, and there is no reasonable expectation of their coming to a unanimous decision, it is within the province of a judge presiding on a criminal trial, in the exercise of his discretion, to discharge the jury.” B

The case is historically an interesting one since it shows in some detail the use and misuse of juries which had been made in the past. Given that the judge has the judicial discretion to discharge a jury from giving a verdict, there would appear to be no good reason either in law or in common sense why on a charge of murder the trial judge should not, in the judicial exercise of his discretion, discharge the jury from giving a verdict of murder where they are agreed on a verdict of manslaughter and the judge considers that justice is properly satisfied by such a verdict. C

The industry of counsel has discovered no case which clearly so decides. Mr. Purnell has, however, drawn our attention to two cases which certainly have the appearance of having proceeded on that basis. D
In Reg. v. Greenwood (1857) 7 Cox C.C. 404 the prisoner was indicted for murder and rape on a child under 10. Wightman J. told the jury that the malice which constitutes murder was, in this case, implied. He directed the jury that if they were of the opinion that the prisoner had connection with the girl and she died from its effect, then that act being, under the circumstances of the case a felony in point of law, this would, of itself, be such malice as would justify them in finding him guilty of murder. After retirement the jury informed the court that they were satisfied that the prisoner had had connection with the girl and that her death resulted therefrom, but were not agreed as to finding him guilty of murder. Wightman J. informed them that under those circumstances it was open to them to find the prisoner guilty of manslaughter and that they might ignore the doctrine of constructive malice if they thought fit. E
The jury found a verdict of manslaughter. Whether or not the jury were expressly discharged from entering a verdict on the offence of murder is not clear. F

In Rex v. Clifford [1914] Ir. L.T. 28 the prisoner, on being arraigned for the murder of his wife, pleaded not guilty of murder, but guilty of manslaughter. Upon Crown counsel informing the judge that this plea was not acceptable on the ground “that the case was one proper to be investigated by a jury on the capital charge,” it was ordered that the trial should proceed. The following day counsel for the defence unsuccessfully sought to plead autrefois convict, which plea was rejected. The trial of the prisoner on the indictment for murder was then proceeded with. The jury failed to agree. An application was then made for judgment upon the prisoner’s plea of “guilty of manslaughter” and he was sentenced after Cherry L.C.J. had discharged the jury. G H

In a trial on an indictment for murder, where manslaughter is a possible verdict, the jury’s task is first to consider whether or not they are satisfied that the accused is guilty of murder. It is only when they have made the positive determination that the accused is not guilty of murder that they should then proceed to consider the lesser offence of manslaughter. However, there is no legal principle which prevents this

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Saunders (H.L.(E.))

Lord Ackner

A impediment to considering the lesser offence being removed by judicial intervention, namely by discharging the jury from the obligation of returning a verdict on the major offence, if the justice of the case so requires. This appeal provides a very good example. This was a case, where as previously stated, the prosecution would have accepted a plea to manslaughter, if Mr. Townend's instructions had permitted his offering that plea. Before the judge took the course that he suggested, he invited B the views of the prosecution and the defence. The course he proposed had their joint support. He concluded that it would be a just determination of the trial to accept a verdict of guilty on the alternative offence of manslaughter, avoiding as it would the burden of a retrial with all the anxiety which this would entail. I shall perhaps add that if, having invited the prosecution's submissions, these proved hostile to the C course contemplated by the judge, he in the proper exercise of his judicial discretion would be fully entitled, having considered those submissions, to adhere to the course he proposed. In such circumstances there could be no question of the prosecution re-indicting the accused for murder. To attempt to do so would clearly be an abuse of the process of the court and the indictment would be stayed: see Connelly v.
Director of Public Prosecutions [1964] A.C. 1254.

D Mr. Townend accepts that a judge has the inherent power to discharge a jury from giving a verdict on a particular charge. He further agrees that before so discharging the jury, the judge must give the prosecution an opportunity to make submissions as to whether that is the proper course to adopt. He submits, however, that the judge in this case by discharging the jury from giving a verdict on the charge of E murder, gave them a total discharge of their obligations, there being one and only one count in the indictment. This submission, in my judgment, overlooks that in this indictment there were comprised two offences, the greater i.e. murder, and the unstated lesser alternative i.e. manslaughter, all comprised in one count: see Director of Public Prosecutions v.
Nasralla [1967] 2 A.C. 238, 248g.

F Mr. Townend placed much reliance on Reg. v. Collison (1980) 71
Cr.App.R. 249, a decision of the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division).
The facts are set out succinctly in the headnote. The appellant was charged on an indictment containing only one count—wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm contrary to section 18 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861. At the end of the summing up the jury were directed that they must return a verdict either of guilty of wounding G with intent or of unlawful wounding (contrary to section 20 of the Act of 1861) or of not guilty. They returned to court after retiring stating that they were not unanimous that it was wounding with intent. They were then given the requisite direction on majority verdicts but the requisite majority was not achieved. After legal argument the judge granted an application by the prosecution to amend the indictment by adding a second count of unlawful wounding contrary to section 20 of the Act of H 1861. The appellant was convicted of unlawful wounding and appealed on the ground, inter alia, that the jurisdiction to order an amendment of the indictment only arose if it appeared to the court that the indictment in its unamended form was defective and he submitted that the indictment in the present case was not, at the time that the amendment was allowed, defective. At the conclusion of the judgment of the court, delivered by Thompson J., appears the statement, at p. 255:

"We can see nothing wrong or improper in what the judge did by allowing the amendment. It may be that the difficulty that had arisen could have been otherwise overcome. However that may be, it was right that he should take steps to permit the jury to deliver the verdict upon which their deliberations had led them to agree."

A

It seems quite clear that the Court of Appeal, while deciding that the action taken by the judges was not open to a valid attack, was careful to avoid the suggestion that his difficulty could not have been otherwise overcome. Reg. v. Collison is not an authority for the proposition contended for by Mr. Townend that where there is a possibility on a count of murder of a jury returning a verdict of manslaughter, the indictment should contain two counts. Not only would this be contrary to long established practice, but I wholly agree with the observation of Lawton L.J. when giving the judgment of the court in the instant appeal that this would tend to confuse the jury. Moreover, such a course would not deal with the case, which is not uncommon, in which the possibility of a verdict of manslaughter only becomes apparent during the course of the trial. There is the further important point that there are cases in which the prosecution, on the basis of the evidence which they propose to present, consider that the only true verdict is that of murder. To include a separate count of manslaughter could well lead to the suggestion by the defence that since the prosecution have charged manslaughter, manslaughter must on the facts be an acceptable alternative.

I have already made mention of the fact that before the Court of Appeal Mr. Townend accepted that a trial which ends without a valid verdict is no trial at all and that accordingly on the authority of Reg. v. Rose (Newton) [1982] A.C. 822 the Court of Appeal was entitled to order a retrial on a venire de novo. His junior has, however, submitted, with his leader's tacit approval, that Reg. v. Rose is not an authority for that proposition. In the course of his speech, with which Lord Scarman, Lord Roskill, Lord Bridge of Harwich and Lord Brandon of Oakbrook concurred, Lord Diplock stated, at p. 833, that the court could grant a venire de novo if there had been an irregularity of procedure which had resulted in there having been no trial that had been validly commenced. He continued: "It could do so if the trial had come to an end without a properly constituted jury ever having returned a valid verdict." Mr. Turner accepted that if the submissions made by his leader were correct, then the verdict returned by the jury was not a lawful verdict. He, however, submitted that the observations of Lord Diplock were obiter and should not be followed. I am quite unable to accept either submission. What I have quoted was part of the ratio decidendi. In stating the basis upon which a venire de novo can be granted, Lord Diplock was approving Rex v. Hancock (1931) 23 Cr.App.R. 16 where the accused, having been put in charge of the jury, changed his original plea of "not guilty" to one of "guilty" during the course of the hearing and the judge discharged the jury without obtaining a verdict of guilty from them. He further approved the decision in Reg. v. Yeadon (1861) Leigh & C. 81 where the jury brought in two successive verdicts inconsistent with one another as a result of the chairman of quarter sessions unlawfully refusing to accept the first. These, said Lord Diplock, at p. 832, are examples of cases in which the jury has been discharged without arriving at a lawful verdict, and in consequence of this there has

- A been neither a conviction nor an acquittal of the defendant. Mr. Turner was obliged to submit that either Rex v. Hancock and Reg. v. Yeadon were wrongly decided, alternatively that although an equivocal verdict may be neither a conviction nor an acquittal, an unlawful verdict (which some might say is worse) cannot be so treated. The short answer is that if the appellant's main submission is correct, then there was no valid conclusion to the trial and it would be a classic case where a writ of venire de novo could be granted.

Extradition—Treaty—Construction—“Evidence . . . presented within two months”—English evidence being adduced by requesting state—Whether requirement that evidence be legally admissible—Extradition Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 52), s. 10—Anglo-Belgian Extradition Treaty 1901 (S.R. & O. 1902 No. 208), art. V

In 1985 a riot occurred involving English football supporters at the Heysel Stadium in Brussels before the start of the European Cup Final, in which 39 people died and over 600 were injured. On 5 June 1986, after police investigation in Belgium and in England with a view to identifying those persons who had been actively involved in the riot, warrants were issued in Belgium for the arrest of the first 26 respondents, all United Kingdom nationals, charging them with, inter alia, manslaughter of one of those killed in the riot. On 3 July 1986 requisitions for their surrender pursuant to section 7 of the Extradition Act 1870 and article II of the Extradition Treaty dated 29 October 1901¹ between the United Kingdom and Belgium, accompanied by the warrants of arrest and the duly authenticated sworn evidence taken in Belgium, were received at the Foreign Office. The Secretary of State's order to proceed was delivered to the Chief Metropolitan Magistrate at Bow Street Magistrates' Court. The Director of Public Prosecutions, on behalf of the Government of Belgium, furnished to the magistrate, in addition to the Belgian evidence, written statements under section 102 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980 in respect of the 75 English witnesses on whose evidence he was proposing to rely. On 8 September 1986 the magistrates issued warrants for the arrest of the first 26 respondents. At the hearing of the committal proceedings, which began on 3 February 1987, it was submitted, inter alia, that the statements tendered under section 102 of the Act of 1980 had not been "presented" within the two months' time limit laid down by article V of the Treaty in that they had not been tendered in evidence without objection or, in the case of objection, with oral evidence to substantiate the contents of the statements given by the makers; and that, accordingly, there was insufficient evidence against the first 26 respondents. The magistrate rejected that submission and made orders for committal under section 10 of the Extradition Act 1870. On appeal, the Divisional Court held that when the two months' time limit had expired none of the English evidence had been presented in accordance with article V and accordingly issued writs of habeas corpus discharging the first 26 respondents.

On appeal by the Government of Belgium:—

Held, allowing the appeal, that the purpose of the time limit in article V of the Treaty was to ensure that a person was not held in custody in the requested state until such time as the requesting state had sufficient evidence to justify a committal; that where England was the requested state and the necessary evidence was that of witnesses in England, it was not necessary that the evidence produced within the two-month time limit was in a legally admissible form and there had been sufficient compliance with the time limit by the production to the magistrate of statements complying with section 102 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980 albeit none of those statements had been tendered in evidence either without objection or substantiated by oral evidence (post, pp. 384B–C, 389E–F, 390C–E, 392G–393A, A–D).

Held, further, that on the presumption that it was for the magistrate and not the Secretary of State to be satisfied that the crime of manslaughter was punishable in Belgium, the duly authenticated Belgian warrant showed that the offence for which extradition was requested was within the description of manslaughter and the duly authenticated deposition of the principal deputy public prosecutor which accompanied the

A requisition for surrender stated that the offence was contrary to the Belgian Penal Code; and that, therefore, there had been sufficient evidence before the magistrate and within the time limit that the extraditable offence of manslaughter still remained an offence in Belgium (post, pp. 390H—391C, 393A—D).

APPLICATIONS for writs of habeas corpus.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Watkins L.J.

Michael Morland Q.C. and Timothy R. A. King for the applicants Mark Woods, Gary Alan Rutter and Gary Evans.

Michael Morland Q.C. and Michael John Kennedy for the applicants John Davies and Gary Cooper.

Michael Morland Q.C. and Anna Worrall for the applicant Michael John Barnes.

Michael Morland Q.C. and David Harris for the applicant Andre Sambor.

Michael Morland Q.C. and David Geey for the applicant Stanley James Conroy.

Michael Morland Q.C. and John Greaves for the applicant Barry Frank Rickman.

Benet Hytner Q.C. and David M. Sumner for the applicant James William Wallace.

Benet Hytner Q.C. and Eric Goldrein for the applicants Graham Anthony Reavey, Keith Eugene Reed and Alan Woodray.

Benet Hytner Q.C. and Jacqueline Wall for the applicants Terence Michael Wilson, Paul Anthony Albert Howard, Anthony Hogan and Stephen McDonald.

John Kay Q.C. and Christopher J. Cornwall for the applicants Gary Thomas Haynes, Kevin Barry Hughes and David Edward Duncan.

John Kay Q.C. and David A. Turner for the applicants Timothy Williams and Ronald O'Brien.

John Kay Q.C. and Richard J. Bennett for the applicant Paul Leslie Wright.

John H. B. Saunders for the applicants Ronald Francis Jepson and David Louis Giles.

Reg. v. Govr. of Ashford, Ex p. Postlethwaite (D.C.)

A

Cur. adv. vult.

B

13 April. WATKINS L.J. read the judgment of the court. We have considered the applications for writs of habeas corpus of Mark Charles Woods and 25 other Englishmen whose homes, although in the main in and around Liverpool and Manchester, are as far apart as Southampton in the south and Kendal in the north, Ipswich in the east and Bristol in the west. Their ages range from 19 to 34 years. Very few of them have criminal records, some are unemployed. All are on bail awaiting trial for the offence of manslaughter, the trial to take place, if they are extradited to that country, in Belgium.

C

If the provisions of the Extradition Acts, commencing with that of 1870, the Treaty, as later amended, between us and His Majesty the King of the Belgians concluded in 1901 and applied by Order in Council in 1902 and rules of evidence applying to committal proceedings have been complied with, all these applicants will no doubt be extradited to Belgium to stand trial.

D

The question we have to consider is whether the relevant ones of those provisions have been complied with. If one or more of them have not been the consequence which we shall be driven to will be deeply regrettable and serious having regard to the horrifying circumstances from which the extradition proceedings have sprung. If those proceedings are flawed in the ways suggested on behalf of the applicants it is a misfortune which, in our view, with more careful observance of legal requirements, prudently allowing in that regard for expressions of alternative or differing constructions of one or more provisions of Act and Treaty, could easily have been avoided. This we regret to have to say is an approach to the preparation of proceedings, those of actual committal especially, which has been absent in a number of extradition matters which have come to the notice of this court in applications for habeas corpus in recent times.

E

The crime of manslaughter committed by a British subject abroad can be prosecuted in this country. Thus a trial on indictment could have taken place here of all the applicants in which event extradition proceedings would not have been necessary and the difficulties, if such there are, in the way of the Director of Public Prosecutions defeating these applications for writs of habeas corpus avoided. But the decision was to hold the trial in Belgium, which necessitated the making of a request, which was in fact made, by the Belgium Government for extradition. Even so, the foremost, if not all, of those difficulties would have been avoided if the evidence emerging from this country (the English evidence) had been taken to Belgium and given to an examining magistrate there and so, properly authenticated, formed part of the evidence accompanying the request for extradition. That simple procedure was not adopted. Instead the request was accompanied only by the evidence, so far as we are concerned, emanating from Belgium (the Belgian evidence).

G

H

It was in Belgium that the event, one of the most awful and tragic to attend a sporting occasion, with which the evidence was concerned took place. It unfolded before the eyes of untold millions of people watching it on television and, of course, of those attending the European Cup Championship soccer match between Juventus of Italy and Liverpool of England at the Heysel Stadium in Brussels on 29 May 1985.

Precautions had been taken by Belgian Police and officials responsible for control of spectators to keep separate supporters of the two teams. The adequacy of those precautions do not affect us, the utter collapse of them does. The majority of the English supporters were accommodated on terraces in blocks called X and Y, while the Italians were placed in an adjacent block called Z. A wire netting fence and a line or two of police officers separated the rival supporters.

A short while before the match was due to begin the English supporters, many of them undoubtedly the worse for drink, became extremely boisterous, noisy and restive. Suddenly they went on the rampage. They smashed down the wire netting fence, broke through the police ranks and advanced menacingly upon the Italians. They and the police retreated before what had become a riotous mob bent on attacking them. Three times the English launched attacks, hurling all manner of missiles upon their desperately frightened victims who had no ready avenue of escape. Under the crush of people who were in a state of panic a retaining wall collapsed. Hundreds of men, women and children were injured as they were trampled upon. No fewer than 39 of them were killed, 34 of whom were Italians and one a 10-year-old boy. All of them were asphyxiated.

More particularly, the cause of death of one Italian, Mr. Mario Ronchi, was stated to be:

“Attributable to asphyxia resulting from mechanical compression of the thoracic cage. A further result of this was cerebral anoxia. The contused lesions on the frontal regions of the limbs were most likely the result of dragging and trampling and did not contribute directly to the cause of death.”

The late Mr. Ronchi has been made a representative victim in the sense that every applicant is charged with having unlawfully killed him.

Police forces here and in Belgium, with the aid of a video film of what is properly called a riot, have succeeded in identifying all the applicants as some of those who were participants. Every one of them has been interviewed by Merseyside Police. Contemporaneous notes of those interviews, many of which resulted in admissions of riotous conduct, formed the English evidence. The Belgian evidence consisted, inter alia, of video film, photographs and identification of the applicants from films and photographs. There is some Italian evidence too, which need not further be mentioned now. If the English evidence was admissible in the committal proceedings then, subject to what we say about it later in this judgment, it is potentially strongly indicative of the commission of unlawful conduct causative of death committed by most, if not all, of the applicants.

The committal proceedings conducted by the very experienced Chief Metropolitan Magistrate at Highbury Corner Magistrates' Court, took place on 3 March 1987. His expressed reasons for rulings he made leading to committing each applicant for extradition require to be set out in full: see post, pp. 381E—382D.

Mr. Morland, on behalf of the applicants Woods, Rutter, Barnes, Evans, Davies, Sambor, Conroy, Cooper and Rickman, contends that the chief magistrate acted unlawfully in two respects, namely: (a) as this was an “exceptional accusation case” the magistrate was required to hear evidence of Belgian law as to whether or not the conduct alleged against each applicant constituted the crime of “homicide commis sans

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Govr. of Ashford, Ex p. Postlethwaite (D.C.)

A premeditation ou guet-apens" punishable according to law in force in Belgium with regard to extradition. This the magistrate failed to do.
B (b) The magistrate failed to set at liberty each of these applicants because sufficient evidence had not been presented within two months of his arrest. These applicants were arrested on or before 12 September 1986 and therefore the crucial date is 12 November 1986.

B These dates must be regarded in the light of our observations on the relevant part of the treaty which appear later in this judgment.

C Mr. Hytner, on behalf of Wilson, Howard, McDonald, Reavey, Woodray, Wallace, Reed and Hogan, adopts Mr. Morland's contentions, and further contends that in finding E (see post, p. 381H) the magistrate reversed the burden of proof. He went on to contend that it is clear upon the magistrate's own findings some unlawful conduct occurred after the death of Mario Ronchi. He submits that proof that an applicant entered the stadium and joined the affray after the death of Mario Ronchi could not possibly lead in England to a conviction of manslaughter. Since this is so, a vital link in the chain of proof must be the time of death in relation to the time of the unlawful act or acts alleged against each applicant.

D He went on to say that, since in every case the onus of proof is upon the prosecution to prove its case, unless there is some evidence that an applicant participated in the disturbances causing the retreat of the spectators in Z block prior to the death of Mario Ronchi, such an applicant should be set at liberty. Whilst he says it is conceded that there may be circumstances in which it would be safe to infer from participation at a particular time that such participation must have begun earlier, the disturbances in the stadium did not and could not have given rise to such an inference.

F He singles out for special submission Wallace and Reed. As to Wallace, his submission is that the evidence discloses that upon Wallace entering the terraces, which was after the disturbances had already begun, he was attacked by a Belgian police officer who dragged him by the scarf around his neck and hit him over the head with a baton. Other police officers did likewise. He had not provoked this attack in any way, and all he did thereafter was to retaliate and chase those officers. That chase by him of the officers was wholly independent, so it is contended, of the riot which was going on in which he played no role.

G As to Reed, the contention was that if the English evidence was admissible there is no evidence of participation by Reed prior to the death of Mario Ronchi.

Mr. Kay, on behalf of Duncan, Haynes, Hughes, Williams, O'Brien and Wright, adopts Mr. Morland's contentions. So do counsel for Jepson, Giles and Postlethwaite respectively.

H These grounds upon which the applications are founded we now proceed to examine, although not necessarily in the order in which they were advanced.

The submission that no sufficient evidence for the extradition of an applicant was presented within a certain period of his arrest and that therefore he was entitled to his liberty requires a consideration both of the Extradition Act 1870 and of the extradition treaty recited in the Order in Council 1902 No. 208 which made the Act of 1870 applicable to Belgium. There were subsequent conventions and exchanges of notes which were recited in further Orders in Council, that is to say 1907 S.R.

& O. No. 544, 1911 S.R. & O. No. 793, 1924 S.R. & O. No. 574 and 1975 S.I. No. 1034.

When the Act of 1870 is applied to a foreign state by an Order in Council then the application is subject to "the limitations, restrictions, conditions, exceptions and qualifications, if any, contained in the Order": section 5 of the Act of 1870. This subsection will include a subsection to the provisions of a treaty embodied in the Order in Council.

The provisions of the Act of 1870 are familiar. Under section 8, as it here applies, a requisition can be made to a Secretary of State by a diplomatic representative of Belgium for the surrender of a fugitive criminal who is in the United Kingdom. Upon receipt of that requisition a Secretary of State may require a "police magistrate" to issue a warrant for the apprehension of the fugitive. Upon apprehension the fugitive is brought before the magistrate: section 9. The function of the magistrate is to determine whether the evidence presented against the fugitive is such that it would justify his committal for trial in England if the offence with respect to which the requisition was made had been committed in England: section 10. The word "evidence" in section 10 means evidence admissible under the English rules of evidence subject only to the statutory exception contained in section 14 of the Act of 1870 which relates to foreign depositions. This section states:

"Depositions or statements on oath, taken in a foreign state, and copies of such original depositions or statements, and foreign certificates of or judicial documents stating the fact of conviction, may, if duly authenticated, be received in evidence in proceedings under this Act."

This principle is well established: for a recent formulation see Reg. v. Governor of Pentonville Prison, Ex parte Voets [1986] 1 W.L.R. 470, and the judgment of Lloyd L.J., at p. 472g.

The applicants in the present case were arrested on various days between 8 and 12 September 1986. The arrests were made on the authority of warrants issued in response to a requirement of the Secretary of State for the Home Department. There is, however, another procedure for arrest which was not employed in this case. It is the procedure by way of provisional warrant. It is a procedure which Lord Diplock has described as being that of "precautionary arrest:" Reg. v. Governor of Pentonville Prison, Ex parte Sotiriadis [1975] A.C. 1, 25c. It is a procedure which is authorised by section 8(2) of the Act of 1870. The reason why the word "provisional" is commonly employed has been explained by Lord Diplock, at p. 25:

"This kind of warrant is provisional in two respects. It must be reported to the Secretary of State who may order it to be cancelled and the person apprehended on it to be discharged. Secondly, when a person apprehended on a provisional warrant is brought before a metropolitan magistrate, the magistrate is required by the last paragraph of section 8 to discharge the prisoner unless '... within such reasonable time as, with reference to the circumstances of the case, he may fix, ...' he receives from the Secretary of State an order signifying that a requisition has been made for the surrender of the prisoner. Under this paragraph the magistrate is bound to fix a date by which the order must be received although, no doubt, he has power also to extend it from time to time if he considers that the circumstances justify his doing so."

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Govr. of Ashford, Ex p. Postlethwaite (D.C.)

A The treaty recited in the Order in Council of 1902 is drawn in the English and French languages. Article I provides:

B "It is agreed that His Britannic Majesty and His Majesty the King of the Belgians shall, on requisition made in their name by their respective diplomatic agents, deliver up to each other reciprocally, under the circumstances and conditions stated in the present Treaty, any persons who, being accused or convicted, as principals or accessories, of any of the crimes hereinafter specified, committed within the territories of the requiring party, shall be found within the territories of the other party:— . . . 3. Manslaughter . . . [Homicide commis sans premeditation ou guet-apens.] . . . Provided that the surrender shall be made only when, in the case of a person accused, the commission of the crime shall be so established as that the laws of the country where the fugitive or person accused shall be found would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial if the crime had been there committed, and in the case of a person alleged to have been convicted, on such evidence as, according to the laws of the country where he is found, would prove that he had been convicted. In no case can the surrender be made unless the crime shall be punishable according to the laws in force in both countries with regard to extradition. In no case, nor on any consideration whatever, shall the High Contracting Parties be bound to surrender their own subjects, whether by birth or naturalization."

C The French words attendant upon the word "manslaughter" are, translated into English, "homicide without premeditation or felonious intent."

E Article II provides:

"In the dominions of His Britannic Majesty, other than the Colonies or foreign possessions of His Majesty, the manner of proceeding shall be as follows:—

F "1. In the case of a person accused—The requisition for the surrender shall be made to His Britannic Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs by the Minister or other diplomatic agent of His Majesty the King of the Belgians, accompanied by a warrant of arrest or other equivalent judicial document issued by a judge or magistrate duly authorised to take cognizance of the acts charged against the accused in Belgium, together with duly authenticated depositions or statements taken on oath or upon solemn affirmation before such judge or magistrate, clearly setting forth the said acts, and containing a description of the person claimed, and any particulars which may serve to identify him. The said Secretary of State shall transmit such documents to His Britannic Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Home Department, who shall then, by order under his hand and seal, signify to some police magistrate in London that such requisition has been made, and require him, if there be due cause, to issue his warrant for the apprehension of the fugitive. On the receipt of such order from the Secretary of State, and on the production of such evidence as would, in the opinion of the magistrate, justify the issue of the warrant if the crime had been committed in the United Kingdom, he shall issue his warrant accordingly. When the fugitive shall have been apprehended, he shall be brought before a competent magistrate. If the evidence to be then produced shall be such as to justify, according to the law of England, the committal for trial of the prisoner, if the crime of which he is accused had been committed in England, the magistrate shall commit him to prison to await the warrant of the Secretary of State for his surrender, sending immediately to the Secretary of State a certificate of the committal and a report upon the case. . . .”

Article III deals with the manner of proceeding in Belgium and we need not recite it. Article IV deals with and amends the provisional warrant procedure. It provides:

“A fugitive criminal may, however, be apprehended under a warrant signed by any police magistrate, justice of the peace, or other competent authority in either country, on such information or complaint, and such evidence, or after such proceedings as would, in the opinion of the person issuing the warrant justify the issue of a warrant if the crime had been committed or the prisoner convicted in that part of the dominions of the two contracting parties in which he exercises jurisdiction: Provided, however, that, in the United Kingdom, the accused shall, in such case, be sent as speedily as possible before a competent magistrate. He shall be discharged, as well in the United Kingdom as in Belgium, if within [two months] a requisition shall not have been made for his surrender by the diplomatic agent of the requiring state in the manner directed by articles II and III of this Treaty . . .”

The reference to “two months” was substituted for a reference to “fourteen days” by S.R. & O. 1907 No. 544 which recited a supplementary convention of 29 October 1901. The periods are and were, a quantification of the “reasonable time” referred to in the final paragraph of section 8 of the Act. Article V provides:

“If within two months, counting from the date of arrest, sufficient evidence for the extradition shall not have been presented, the person arrested shall be set at liberty. He shall likewise be set at liberty if, within two months of the day on which he was placed at the disposal of the diplomatic agent, he shall not have been sent off to the reclaiming country.”

This court has held that the period referred to in article V runs from the date of an arrest pursuant to a warrant issued in consequence of a Secretary of State’s order following a requisition by the Belgian Government: see In re Bennaim (unreported) 22 February 1985. Although he did not in terms say so, Mr. Michael Sherrard, for the Government of Belgium, invited us to disregard that decision, presumably on the basis that it was per incuriam although wherein lay the ignorance he did not say. His submission was that the first sentence of article V had no application in the case where arrest was pursuant to a warrant issued in consequence of a requisition by the Belgian Government but was confined to arrests under provisional warrants; that is to say, those arrests contemplated by article IV. We find this submission impossible to accept. Had the first sentence of article V been intended to apply only to article IV then we would have expected the High Contracting Parties to have incorporated the sentence in article IV. As it is the sentence is incorporated in an article which (like all succeeding articles) is on its face of general application. Mr. Sherrard does not contest the general

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Govr. of Ashford, Ex p. Postlethwaite (D.C.)

- A application of the second sentence in article V. Moreover, it is to be observed that article II (unlike articles in other treaties) does not require that a requisition should be accompanied by the "evidence." All that is required is a statement of the acts charged against the accused and a description of the person claimed. Whether what is provided is sufficient for the issue of a warrant is a matter for the magistrate but, as Sir George Jessel M.R. observed in Reg. v. Weil (1882) 9 Q.B.D. 701, 706,
- B what is sufficient for a warrant "is very different from the evidence which is required under section 10 to justify the committal of the prisoner." Mr. Sherrard accepted that this was so. In that circumstance it can be sensibly understood that a period should be put upon the presentation of "sufficient evidence for the extradition." What does not seem sensible is that a period should be put upon the production of
- C evidence to support extradition only where the requisition was preceded by an arrest pursuant to a provisional warrant. We can think of no reason why the High Contracting Parties should have agreed such a provision and there is good reason why they should not. An arrest pursuant to a provisional warrant is an event over which the foreign government has no control. Why should a government agree to a starting date over which it has no control? That would not be reasonable.
- D Thus, in Ex parte Sotiriadis [1975] A.C. 1, 18 Lord Wilberforce said:

"it would seem to be contrary to the intention of the treaty, and unworkable, that the two months' period should run from a date which the foreign government may have had no part in selecting and on which the charges relied on by the foreign government had not been established." (See also Lord Diplock, at p. 27b).

- E These observations were made in a case concerning a treaty which had an equivalent to article V of the Belgian Treaty but no equivalent to article IV. They are, however, apposite in the present case. In our judgment "arrest" in article V means arrest pursuant to a warrant issued in consequence of a Secretary of State's order following a requisition by the Belgium Government. We see no reason whatever to doubt the
- F decision of this court in In re Bennaim.

- In the present case the two months' period expired at the latest on 12 November 1986, which was two months after the last of the applicants was arrested. At that date there was available what has been referred to as "the Belgian evidence" and "the English evidence." The English evidence, as we have indicated, consisted entirely of written statements with accompanying exhibits. In substance they were statements by police officers who interviewed applicants and notes of interview in which some participation in the riot was admitted. "The Belgian evidence" was duly authenticated and, subject to hearsay affecting identification, was on 12 November admissible as evidence by reason of section 14 of the Act of 1870. "The English evidence" was on 12 November only contingently admissible. It was not duly authenticated and therefore was not
- G admissible by reason of section 14. It might, however, become admissible
- H if the conditions mentioned in section 102(2) of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980 became satisfied.

Section 102 provides:

"(1) In committal proceedings a written statement by any person shall, if the conditions mentioned in subsection (2) below are satisfied, be admissible as evidence to the like extent as oral evidence to the like effect by that person. (2) The said conditions are— . . . (d) none of the other parties, before the statement is tendered in evidence at the committal proceedings, objects to the statement being so tendered under this section.”

A

As at 12 November that condition was not satisfied as to any part of “the English evidence.” After pursuing an argument which we found difficult to follow, Mr. Sherrard conceded that “the English evidence” was not “evidence” as at 12 November in that it was not on that date admissible evidence.* The concession was, in our judgment, correct. The statements on that date were not admissible.

B

The case presented to the magistrate was based upon both the Belgian and the English evidence. He should not have had regard to “the English evidence.” Mr. Sherrard said that there was a case against at least some of the applicants on the basis of the Belgian evidence alone. However, he very responsibly said that as the chief magistrate was not invited to give his mind to the case of any applicant on that basis alone, the Belgian Government did not wish to argue that basis alone before this court. Accordingly, all applicants enjoy the benefit of our decision in regard to article V. What relief they shall enjoy will later be announced.

C

The submission that there was no evidence, either within or without the two month period, that manslaughter is punishable under the law of Belgium with regard to extradition, is of a technical nature. There was indeed no such evidence, but it is submitted on behalf of the applicants that the second proviso to article I of the Treaty requires such evidence. In our judgment it plainly does. Unless it does we can attribute no meaning to the proviso. Mr. Sherrard submitted that the only purpose of the proviso was to cover a case where a crime listed in article I ceased to be such under the law of either state. That may be the purpose, but it does not remove the plain incumbency of proof that the limiting requirement of the treaty has been satisfied for an analogous case, see Reg. v. Governor of Pentonville Prison, Ex parte Herbage (No. 3), 30 July 1986, The Times, 6 August 1986. The decision of the House of Lords in In re Nielsen [1984] A.C. 606 does not bear upon the point. The treaty in that case (that is to say the treaty with Denmark recited in an Order in Council dated 26 June 1873) contained no equivalent to the proviso to article I, but we would regard the case as authority for the proposition that proof of the satisfaction of the limiting requirement does not open up the question of what is “manslaughter” under the law of Belgium, let alone the question of whether an applicant’s conduct fell within it.

F

G

If satisfaction of the limiting requirement was the only point in the case we would either remit for the simple evidence to be provided or take such evidence (provided it be duly authenticated) ourselves. We have, with the help and consent of counsel, taken such evidence. The requirement is satisfied but the evidence is, for reasons which we have already provided, now too late.

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Govr. of Ashford, Ex p. Postlethwaite (D.C.)

A to the general argument on causation, whilst we fully understand the thrust of it, namely that the prosecution must prove who participated in events which led to death in each case, that participation must pre-date death and departure from the scene before death may avoid conviction for manslaughter, we regard these premises in the circumstances as wholly unrealistic. The scene depicted on the video film was of continuous movement of rioters backwards and forwards on the terraces, using one form of violence or another until there was a mad stampede of frightened, terrified victims into a corner in which there was no room for all of them and from which there was no escape.

B In our judgment, the findings of the magistrate at D, E and H (see post, pp. 381G—382A) are unassailable and entirely appropriate. It is for the court of trial to examine individual participation and its implications as each case is developed by the prosecution in that court. The evidence as a whole, on the supposition that it was admissible in the magistrates' court, in our view entitled the magistrate to find by inference that there was a prima facie case of participation causative of death. We reject the submissions made to the contrary. In any event, they are not crucial to the success or otherwise of these applications which succeed, in our judgment, upon the submissions as to article V upon which all applicants rely.

D With very considerable dismay, therefore, for the reasons we have given we grant the writs.

G 7 May. The Appeal Committee of the House of Lords (Lord Bridge of Harwich, Lord Mackay of Clashfern and Lord Goff of Chieveley) allowed a petition by the Director of Public Prosecutions, on behalf of the Government of Belgium, for leave to appeal.

H The Director of Public Prosecutions, on behalf of the Government of Belgium, appealed against the decision of the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division discharging the first 26 respondents out of the custody of the 27th and 28th respondents, the governors of Pentonville Prison and Ashford Remand Centre, following the making of a committal order against each of the first 26 respondents under section 10 of the Extradition Act 1870 by the Chief Metropolitan Magistrate at the Bow Street Magistrates' Court for them to be surrendered to the Government of Belgium on the grounds of each being accused of the crime of manslaughter.

The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Bridge of Harwich.

Sir Nicholas Lyell Q.C., S.-G., Michael Sherrard Q.C., Robert Rhodes and Daniel Janner for the Director of Public Prosecutions. A

13 July. LORD BRIDGE OF HARWICH. My Lords, the Government of Belgium seek the extradition of the 26 respondents on charges of manslaughter. They were committed to prison by order of the Chief Metropolitan Magistrate ("the magistrate") on 3 March 1987 pursuant to section 10 of the Extradition Act 1870 there to await the warrant of a Secretary of State for their surrender to the Belgian authorities. They applied for writs of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum. These applications were allowed by order of the Divisional Court (Watkins L.J. and Mann J.) on 30 April subject to a stay of execution of the writs pending any appellate proceedings in your Lordships' House. The appeals of the Government of Belgium, pursuant to leave duly granted by the House, now fall for determination. C

The extradition charges arise out of the terrible and tragic events which occurred at the Heysel Stadium in Brussels on 29 May 1985. Liverpool Football Club were to play Juventus of Turin in the final of the European Cup Championship. What happened will be vividly remembered by all who saw television news pictures or read newspaper accounts of it at the time. It is succinctly and graphically described in the judgment of the Divisional Court delivered by Watkins L.J., ante, p. 370A-D: D

"The majority of the English supporters were accommodated on terraces in blocks called X and Y, whilst the Italians were placed in an adjacent block called Z. A wire netting fence and a line or two of police officers separated the rival supporters. A short while before the match was due to begin the English supporters, many of them undoubtedly the worse for drink, became extremely boisterous, noisy and restive. Suddenly they went on the rampage. They smashed down the wire netting fence, broke through the police ranks and advanced menacingly upon the Italians. They and the police retreated before what had become a riotous mob bent on attacking them. Three times the English launched attacks, hurling all manner of missiles upon their desperately frightened victims who had no ready avenue of escape. Under the crush of people who were in a state of panic a retaining wall collapsed. Hundreds of men, women and children were injured as they were trampled upon. No fewer than thirty-nine of them were killed, thirty-four of whom were Italians and one a ten year old boy. All of them were asphyxiated." E F G H

The manslaughter charges of which the respondents stand accused before the appropriate Belgian court relate to one of the Italian victims named Mario Ronchi.

It is hardly surprising that the investigation to identify and assemble necessary evidence to justify the prosecution of any individuals who might be held criminally liable in such a case should have taken a long

A time. It was not until 5 June 1986 that the Belgian court issued warrants for the arrest of the respondents.

B The Order in Council which directs, pursuant to section 2 of the Act of 1870, that the Act shall apply to Belgium is No. 208 of 1902 which embodies the principal extradition treaty concluded between His Britannic Majesty and His Majesty the King of the Belgians on 29 October 1901 ("the Treaty"). Amendments made by later treaties embodied in later Orders in Council are not material for present purposes.

C On 3 July 1986 requisitions for the surrender of the respondents pursuant to section 7 of the Act of 1870 and article II of the Treaty were received at the Foreign Office. They were accompanied, as article II requires that they should be, by warrants issued by the Belgian court together with the Belgian evidence in the form of depositions or statements on oath taken in Belgium and duly authenticated in the manner provided by section 15 of the Act of 1870. As article II requires, the documents were transmitted to the Home Office and on 27 August 1986, still in pursuance of section 7 and article II, the Home Secretary issued his orders to the magistrate signifying that the requisitions had been made and requiring him, if there were due cause, to issue his warrants for the apprehension of the respondents (conventionally and conveniently referred to as the "orders to proceed"). The orders, accompanied by the authenticated warrants, depositions and statements together with necessary translations, were transmitted to Bow Street Magistrates' Court.

E In accordance with the normal practice in extradition matters the Director of Public Prosecutions had the conduct on behalf of the Government of Belgium of the proceedings in England. He was proposing at the committal hearing to rely on the evidence of 75 English witnesses, including 52 police officers who had interviewed the respondents. All these witnesses resided in England. None had testified in Belgium. Following a practice which the Solicitor-General informed your Lordships had been adopted in such cases ever since 1967, when the provisions now found in section 102 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980 were first enacted as section 2 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967, he furnished to the magistrate written statements of all those witnesses which complied with the conditions laid down by section 102(2)(a) and (b) ("the section 102 statements"). It is convenient at this point to interpose in the narrative a citation of the relevant provisions of section 102:

H "(1) In committal proceedings a written statement by any person shall, if the conditions mentioned in subsection (2) below are satisfied, be admissible as evidence to the like extent as oral evidence to the like effect by that person. (2) The said conditions are—(a) the statement purports to be signed by the person who made it; (b) the statement contains a declaration by that person to the effect that it is true to the best of his knowledge and belief and that he made the statement knowing that, if it were tendered in evidence, he would be liable to prosecution if he wilfully stated in it anything which he knew to be false or did not believe to be true; (c) before the statement is tendered in evidence, a copy of the statement is given, by or on behalf of the party proposing to tender it, to each of the other parties to the proceedings; and (d) none of the other parties, before the statement is tendered in evidence at the committal proceedings, objects to the statement being so tendered under this section.” A

Resuming the narrative, the magistrate had the section 102 statements as well as the Belgian evidence before him when he issued warrants pursuant to section 8 of the Act of 1870 for the arrest of all the respondents on 8 September 1986. The warrants were executed on 10 and 12 September. The respondents first appeared before the magistrate on 15 September and were all remanded on bail to 10 November. I should mention at this point that, with certain exceptions, where bail was withdrawn for reasons extraneous to this case, the respondents effectively remained at liberty throughout the ensuing proceedings until their bail was withdrawn by order of the Divisional Court on 30 June 1987, the day on which the argument of the appeal before your Lordships was concluded. B C

Shortly after 15 September 1986 each of the several solicitors acting for one or more of the respondents was served with copies of the relevant documents, sc. the Belgian warrants and evidence and the section 102 statements, affecting his own client or clients. In anticipation of the second remand hearing on 10 November, the D.P.P. wrote to all the defence solicitors on 3 November suggesting that, for the purpose of the effective committal hearings, the respondents should be divided into three groups. On 10 November the respondents were further remanded to 22 December. The defending solicitors required to see and were in due course supplied with copies of all the section 102 statements to enable them to consider the proposed grouping. On 10 November it was made clear that the magistrate's commitments would prevent him from proceeding with the substantive hearing before the New Year. On 22 December the magistrate ordered that the cases against all the respondents be heard together, not in groups. The hearing was ordered to commence on 3 February 1987 and was then estimated to last eight weeks. The respondents were ordered to, and in due course did, notify to the D.P.P. the names of those witnesses who had made section 102 statements whom they required to be called to give oral evidence. In the event it proved possible, with the co-operation of defending counsel, to complete the hearing in half the time estimated and, as already indicated, the magistrate made his orders of committal under section 10 of the Act of 1870 on 3 March 1987. D E F

Subject to any “conditions, exceptions and qualifications” imposed pursuant to section 2 on the operation of the Act of 1870 by the Order in Council which directs that the Act shall apply to Belgium, the proceedings before the magistrate were governed by sections 9 and 10 of the Act of 1870 which provide, so far as presently relevant: G

“9. When a fugitive criminal is brought before . . . the magistrate, the . . . magistrate shall hear the case in the same manner, and have the same jurisdiction and powers, or as near as may be, as if the prisoner were brought before him charged with an indictable offence committed in England. The . . . magistrate shall receive any evidence which may be tendered to show that the crime of which the prisoner is accused or alleged to have been convicted is an offence of a political character or is not an extradition crime. H

“10. In the case of a fugitive criminal accused of an extradition crime, if the foreign warrant authorising the arrest of such criminal

- A is duly authenticated, and such evidence is produced as (subject to the provisions of this Act) would, according to the law of England, justify the committal for trial of the prisoner if the crime of which he is accused had been committed in England, the . . . magistrate shall commit him to prison, but otherwise shall order him to be discharged. . . . If he commits such criminal to prison, he shall commit him . . . , there to await the warrant of a Secretary of State for his surrender, and shall forthwith send to a Secretary of State a certificate of the committal, and such report upon the case as he may think fit."
- B

These sections must be read in the light of the important definitions in section 26:

- C "The term 'extradition crime' means a crime which, if committed in England or within English jurisdiction, would be one of the crimes described in Schedule 1 to this Act: . . .
- "The term 'fugitive criminal' means any person accused or convicted of an extradition crime committed within the jurisdiction of any foreign state who is in or is suspected of being in some part of Her Majesty's dominions; . . ."
- D

Manslaughter is, as one would expect, one of the crimes described in Schedule 1 to the Act of 1870.

- Thus, unless his powers under the Act of 1870 were restricted by the terms of the Treaty embodied in the Order in Council, the only issue for the magistrate to decide was whether, had the Heysel Stadium riot occurred in England, the evidence would have justified committal of the respondents for trial in England on charges of manslaughter. In relation to that issue the magistrate set out his findings of fact and conclusions of law in the following paragraphs:
- E

"A(1) There is no dispute that Mr. Ronchi died of asphyxia as a result of being crushed. (2) There is no dispute that this crushing, and therefore his death, was a consequence of those spectators in Z block retreating to the bottom corner of that section. (3) I do not think there is any dispute that this retreat was caused by the fear engendered from the charges of and the conduct of a number of Liverpool supporters. B. To my mind this conduct and these charges were all part and parcel of one concerted action, the purpose of which was to fight with others (either spectators or police) and/or to drive the spectators from that section. It was this concerted action which aroused the fear and caused the panic which led to the death. C. It follows that anyone involved in any such unlawful act or acts whether charging, throwing missiles or fighting, wherever those acts took place, is responsible for the acts of any others so involved. D. Again it follows, if I am right, that it matters not when Mr. Ronchi died as long as it is established that he died as a result of the unlawful conduct of one or more of those participating in such actions and as I have said this does not appear to be in dispute. E. It is for the court of trial and not this court to decide whether such participation began after death or whether the participants ceased to take part before the panic set in. It is enough for the purposes of committal for there to be evidence that a defendant took part in the riot, affray, threatening behaviour, call it what you will. . . . H. In my view, there is sufficient evidence against all the defendants that they took part in one or more unlawful acts: that is charging, throwing missiles or fighting. These acts were continuous over a period of some 15 minutes and formed part of the concerted action against the Italians. I. The fact that it was said that some of these acts were directed at the police has little relevance as they were capable of causing, and did cause, terror amongst the spectators. This can be seen in some videos where the crowd is seen surging down the terraces towards the field although there is at least a double line of police between them and the Liverpool supporters. J. All the defendants except Duncan identify themselves as being involved. In the case of Duncan, he is identified by Mr. Reston, and even if that were not so, he figures in one incident where he is seen on the video tape with outstanding clarity. K. As far as Hogan is concerned, it could well be that his admissions are qualified, but here again the quality of the photographs and the video is such that I consider that combined with those admissions there is sufficient evidence for him to be committed. L. As far as Howard is concerned, having heard how the prosecution put their case against him and having heard Mr. Goldrein's further submission, I have come to the conclusion that in his case as well, there is sufficient prima facie evidence against him to warrant a committal."

G

H

The evidence on which the magistrate based these findings and conclusions fell into three categories. The Belgian evidence comprised the depositions and statements on oath taken in Belgium which, being duly authenticated as required by section 15 of the Act of 1870, were admissible in evidence pursuant to section 14. The English evidence comprised those section 102 statements tendered and duly received in evidence as admissible under that section in the absence of objection on behalf of any of the respondents under subsection (2)(d) and the oral evidence of the makers of other section 102 statements to which objection was taken under subsection (2)(d) before the statements were tendered in evidence. The Italian evidence comprised statements taken in Italy from Italian witnesses.

The magistrate expressly stated that he set aside the Italian evidence as of no weight and I need, therefore, say no more about it. It is not now disputed that the magistrate could properly conclude that a sufficient prima facie case of manslaughter was made out to justify committal for trial of all the respondents on the basis of the Belgian evidence and the English evidence considered together, nor are any of the magistrate's findings or conclusions reached on that basis now sought to be impugned. Conversely, it is not contended on behalf of the Government of Belgium that the magistrate's orders can be supported on the basis that the Belgian evidence alone justified committal. The magistrate was never asked to consider that question.

The main submission advanced on behalf of the respondents, both before the magistrate and your Lordships, relies upon the provision of article V of the Treaty that:

"If within two months, counting from the date of arrest, sufficient evidence for the extradition shall not have been presented, the person arrested shall be set at liberty."

The submission in outline is that "evidence" in this provision must not only be sufficient in content to justify the extradition sought but must be

A “presented” within the time limit of two months in a form which is legally admissible; hence, when the time limit here expired on 10 or 12 November 1986, none of the English evidence had been duly presented; the evidential material contained in the section 102 statements did not become legally admissible until either the section 102 statements were tendered in evidence without objection or, in the case of objection, oral evidence to substantiate the contents of the statements was given by the makers.

I do not know how far the submission was developed before the magistrate. He felt able to deal with it shortly. After dismissing the Italian evidence, which had not been put before him in any form until January 1987, he continued:

C “Having said that, I think that in fact this deals with the submission because the remainder of the evidence, namely the Belgian evidence, the English evidence with all the photographs, video clips and interviews with the defendants, was before me when I issued the warrants.”

D It was the submission which I have outlined above that found favour with the Divisional Court and by which they felt constrained, with an understandable expression of dismay, to accede to the applications for writs of habeas corpus. Aside from the main issue to which the submission for the respondents gives rise, counsel appearing for the Government of Belgium before the Divisional Court sought to avoid its effect by contending that article V of the Treaty did not apply to any person arrested pursuant to a magistrate’s warrant issued after receipt of an order to proceed under section 7 of the Act of 1870 from the Secretary of State, but only to a person arrested pursuant to a provisional warrant issued before the order to proceed. The Divisional Court rejected this contention and it was not renewed by the Solicitor-General in arguing the appeals before your Lordships. The point, therefore, does not fall for decision. But since it was taken in the appellant’s written case and I had given some attention to it before the oral argument, I ought to say that I see no reason to doubt the correctness of the Divisional Court’s rejection of the point.

In approaching the main issue two important principles are to be borne in mind. The first is expressed in the well known dictum of Lord Russell of Killowen C.J. in In re Arton (No. 2) [1896] 1 Q.B. 509, 517 where he said:

G “In my judgment these treaties ought to receive a liberal interpretation, which means no more than that they should receive their true construction according to their language, object, and intent.”

H I also take the judgment in that case as good authority for the proposition that in the application of the principle the court should not, unless constrained by the language used, interpret any extradition treaty in a way which would “hinder the working and narrow the operation of most salutary international arrangements.” The second principle is that an extradition treaty is “a contract between two sovereign states and has to be construed as such a contract. It would be a mistake to think that it had to be construed as though it were a domestic statute.” Reg. v. Governor of Ashford Remand Centre, Ex parte Beese [1973] 1 W.L.R. 969, 973, per Lord Widgery C.J. In applying this second principle, closely related as it is to the first, it must be remembered that the reciprocal rights and obligations which the high contracting parties confer and accept are intended to serve the purpose of bringing to justice those who are guilty of grave crimes committed in either of the contracting states. To apply to extradition treaties the strict canons appropriate to the construction of domestic legislation would often tend to defeat rather than to serve this purpose.

In the light of these principles one must ask at the outset of the examination of the issue what object in the scheme of the Act of 1870 and the Treaty the time limit of two months from the initial arrest within which the requesting state must present evidence sufficient for the extradition is intended to serve. In general terms the object is clearly to provide a safeguard against persons accused of an extradition crime in the requesting state being held in custody indefinitely in the requested state while the requesting state assembles the evidence necessary to justify a committal. Such evidence will obviously be required to establish the case against the accused to a higher standard than evidence which may justify the issue of a warrant for his arrest. But whilst the attainment of this object implies the assumption of an obligation by the requesting state to use due diligence to present its evidence within the time limit, it would be unreasonable to suppose that the high contracting parties were content to assume any obligation, when in the role of requesting state, with which it would not lie within their own power to comply. Herein lies the question, which to my mind, is crucial to the resolution of the main issue in this appeal. If the criterion for compliance with the time limit is, as the respondents submit, that evidence can only be presented when it is in a form which is legally admissible, how may the requesting state ensure compliance with this obligation?

The answer propounded in the judgment of the Divisional Court to this question is implicit in the criticism levelled at the D.P.P. for his failure to ensure the admissibility of the English evidence by sending the English witnesses to give their evidence to the Belgian court so that it could be authenticated under section 15 of the Act of 1870 and thereby rendered admissible under section 14. My Lords, I do not, with respect, think that this criticism was justified. The D.P.P., in submitting the section 102 statements to the magistrate, was relying on a well established practice which had never previously been questioned. There is, in any event, no legal process available to compel the attendance of English witnesses before the Belgian court. But that apart, and assuming that the D.P.P. ought to have anticipated that the present point might be taken, to require so many witnesses as could be persuaded, or in the case of police officers instructed, to travel to Belgium and give evidence there would have involved a substantial expenditure of public time and money. The voluminous section 102 statements, exceeding 1,500 pages, would have had to be translated or the evidence given through an interpreter in French, the language of the Belgian court. The authenticated depositions or statements on oath in French would then have been the admissible documents and either re-translations into English would have been required or possibly the section 102 statements would have served as the English versions. If the D.P.P. had taken this course I think he might well have been criticised for going to these lengths without good reason or, as would perhaps have been suggested on behalf of the respondents, with the object of denying them the right to cross-examine the English witnesses in the committal proceedings. His

A explanation that this was a necessary technical precaution to avoid falling foul of the time limit in article V of the Treaty would not necessarily have carried conviction.

But all this is beside the more fundamental point as to whether, in seeking to discern the underlying intention of the high contracting parties as to how the time limit imposed by article V of the Treaty was to be complied with in the case of evidence to be given by witnesses present, not in the requesting state, but in the state where the committal proceedings were to take place, we can possibly conclude that they contemplated that such witnesses would travel to the requesting state to give evidence there. Mr. Morland, for the respondents, did not advance any argument to this effect before the Divisional Court and did not feel able, in argument before your Lordships, to support the view that his suggested construction of article V of the Treaty can be supported on this basis. He went so far as to say that the suggested course could be considered improper and an abuse of process. For my part, I think the issue is resolved by a consideration of the reciprocal provisions relating to evidence in articles II and III of the Treaty. Article II embodies the procedure to be followed upon a requisition for the surrender of a fugitive criminal by Great Britain to Belgium. Article III embodies the procedure to be followed upon a requisition for the surrender of a fugitive criminal by Belgium to Great Britain. The opening paragraph setting forth the procedure applicable in the case of a person accused is in identical terms, mutatis mutandis, in both articles:

E “The requisition for the surrender shall be . . . accompanied by a warrant of arrest or other equivalent judicial document issued by a judge or magistrate duly authorised to take cognizance of the acts charged against the accused in Belgium [article II]/Great Britain [article III] together with duly authenticated depositions or statements taken on oath or upon solemn affirmation before such judge or magistrate, clearly setting forth the said acts, and containing a description of the person claimed, and any” other in article III

F “particulars which may serve to identify him.”

We know that duly authenticated depositions or statements taken on oath or upon solemn affirmation before the Belgian judge or magistrate are admissible in the English proceedings without the necessity for Belgian witnesses to travel to England. We may safely infer that duly authenticated depositions or statements taken on oath or upon solemn affirmation before the British judge or magistrate are admissible in evidence in the Belgian proceedings without the necessity for British witnesses to travel to Belgium. Finding thus that the Treaty makes reciprocal provision to avoid the necessity for witnesses present in the state where the extradition crime was committed to travel to the state where the fugitive criminal is found and where the extradition proceedings will take place, it would surely stand the scheme of the Treaty on its head to interpret article V as imposing an obligation with which the requesting state could only safely ensure compliance by procuring that witnesses present in the state where the extradition proceedings will take place and available to give evidence in those proceedings, should travel to the requesting state to give evidence there for the purpose of having it formally authenticated. Moreover, such an interpretation can manifestly do nothing to enhance the substantial justice of the extradition procedure.

Mr. Morland propounds the only other possible answer to the question how the requesting state must act in order to secure compliance with the time limit, if his submission as to the interpretation of article V is right, namely that the proceedings must be heard by the magistrate and all necessary evidence to establish a prima facie case against the accused must be actually adduced before him within two months from the arrest. It is not open to Mr. Morland on authority to contend that the application of the time limit requires that the hearing of the whole case for committal under section 10 must be completed within two months of the arrest. This proposition was rejected in relation to a parallel provision in another extradition treaty by the Divisional Court in Reg. v. Governor of Ashford Remand Centre, Ex parte Beese [1973] 1 W.L.R. 969 and the decision was affirmed by this House [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1426.

It is obvious that if, in order to comply with the time limit, it is necessary that the hearing before the magistrate should proceed so far that sufficient evidence may be adduced by the requesting state to establish a prima facie case, compliance with the time limit will be, to a greater or lesser degree, beyond the control of those responsible for the conduct of the case on behalf of the requesting state and may indeed be rendered impossible by circumstances beyond anybody's control. In the circumstances of the instant case the representative of the D.P.P. present at the first remand hearing on 15 September 1986 should, according to the respondents' submission, have protested at the remand to 10 November, when two months would have already elapsed from the first arrests, and applied that the hearing should commence, if not immediately, within days and continue without interruption until sufficient English evidence had been called to establish a prima facie case against each of the respondents. Even assuming that the magistrate had been able and willing to grant such an application, if the numerous counsel appearing for different respondents had chosen to exercise to the full their right of cross-examination, they could well have ensured the expiry of the time limit before the hearing of the English evidence was complete, whereupon the respondents, or some of them, would have been entitled to be discharged.

Recognising these difficulties in the way of acceptance of his suggested answer to the question how compliance with the time limit is to be achieved in any extradition case, like the present, where a substantial volume of English evidence is relied on, Mr. Morland was in the end driven to submit that these difficulties could properly be overcome by the magistrate curtailing or even deferring cross-examination and by the witnesses being called in chief, if time is running short, simply to confirm on oath or affirmation the contents of their section 102 statements. The prospect of the committal proceedings developing into some kind of race against the clock is wholly unacceptable and, if all that the suggested strict construction of article V achieves is the addition within the time limit of the sanction of an oath or affirmation in open court to the sanction already accepted in a section 102 statement by the maker's acknowledgement in accordance with subsection (2)(b) of his liability to prosecution, it is, here again, difficult to see what the adoption of that construction can possibly contribute to the substantial justice of the extradition procedure.

However, the matter does not stop there. It is submitted for the respondents that we are bound by the authority of this House in Reg. v.

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Govr. of Ashford, Ex p. Postlethwaite (H.L.(E.))

Lord Bridge
of Harwich

A Governor of Pentonville Prison, Ex parte Sotiriadis [1975] A.C. 1 to construe the word "evidence" in article V as meaning nothing less than legally admissible evidence. That case turned on a provision in the treaty with the Federal Republic of Germany that:

"If sufficient evidence for the extradition be not produced within two months from the date of the apprehension of the fugitive, he shall be set at liberty."

B

Nothing turns on any difference in language between that provision and the provision of the Treaty which your Lordships are considering. The word "presented" in article V of the Treaty appears in the French text as "produits." The first question in issue in Ex parte Sotiriadis was whether the "apprehension" from which time runs in the German treaty refers to the arrest of a fugitive on a provisional warrant issued before the Secretary of State's order to proceed under section 7 of the Act of 1870 or to the first remand in custody by the magistrate pursuant to the Secretary of State's order to proceed. The second question was whether "production" refers to production of the evidence by the requesting state to the Foreign Office or to the court at Bow Street. The evidence there consisted entirely of duly authenticated depositions or statements on oath taken in Germany.

C

The Divisional Court had decided both questions in favour of the respondent fugitive. The House decided both against him. Their Lordships held unanimously that "apprehension" referred not to the arrest on a provisional warrant, but to the first remand in custody pursuant to the Secretary of State's order to proceed. We are not concerned with that point. Their Lordships decided by a majority (Lord Wilberforce, Lord Cross of Chelsea and Lord Kilbrandon; Lord Diplock and Lord Simon of Glaisdale dissenting) that "production" meant production by the requesting state to the Foreign Office, not production to the court. I should mention, in parenthesis, that it is not suggested on behalf of the present respondents that the submission of the section 102 statements directly to the magistrate before he issued his warrants was not a sufficient "presentation" if those statements could properly be regarded as "evidence."

Both parties to the instant appeal claim to derive support from the decision in Sotiriadis [1975] A.C. 1. The Solicitor-General draws our attention to passages from the majority speeches. Lord Wilberforce said, at p. 18:

"I do not think that it can have been intended that where, as between governments, the necessary evidence has been delivered within the treaty period, the requesting government is to lose its treaty rights on account of delay in transmission to the requested state's courts, and it does not logically follow from the fact that it is the courts which have to pronounce on the sufficiency of the evidence that the date of production is to be the date of production to the court."

F

Lord Cross of Chelsea said, at pp. 32-33:

"But what is the position if the evidence in question consists of sworn depositions or statements taken in the foreign state which by article XI are made evidence in this country if they are certified and authenticated as therein provided? When are they 'produced' by the foreign state? One view would be that they are not 'produced' until they are laid before the magistrate in open court; but I cannot think that that can be right. Suppose that depositions properly certified and authenticated and accompanied by translations which raise a strong prima facie case against the fugitive have been lodged at Bow Street within the two month period but owing to pressure of business or an epidemic of influenza affecting the magistracy the case cannot be heard until after the two months have expired, how could it be said with any show of reason that the foreign state had failed to produce sufficient evidence within the period specified in the treaty? To say so would be to add insult to injury. But if one goes so far—as I think that one must—as to say that the foreign state produces sufficient evidence within the two months if sworn depositions duly certified and authenticated which the magistrate subsequently finds to be in themselves sufficient to justify committal arrive at Bow Street within the two months, ought one not to go further and say that the lodging of such documents with the Foreign Office within the two months is sufficient even if they are not transmitted to Bow Street until after the expiry of the two months?"

G

These passages seem to lend strong support to the submission of the Solicitor-General that the provision imposing the time limit must be interpreted in such a way that compliance with it by the requesting state cannot be frustrated by circumstances over which the requesting state has no control.

All that Lord Diplock said, in his dissenting opinion on the production point, with which Lord Simon of Glaisdale simply agreed, was this, at p. 28:

"My Lords, on the view which I hold, that the time limit under article XII of the treaty did not start to run until 4 June 1973, it does not affect the outcome of this appeal whether sufficient evidence for the extradition is 'produced' within the meaning of that article (a) when it is delivered by the German Government to the Foreign Office or (b) when it is received at Bow Street magistrates' court or (c) when it is tendered in evidence at the hearing in open court in the presence of the accused. The conclusion at which I have myself arrived on this point is that evidence for the extradition, as distinct from evidence for the arrest, is not produced until it is received at Bow Street magistrates' court though this may be before it is tendered in open court. But as a majority of your Lordships are of opinion that production to the Foreign Office is sufficient no useful purpose would be served by setting out the reasons which lead me to take a different view."

On the face of it the decision in Ex parte Sotiriadis is not directed to the meaning of the word "evidence" in the relevant provision. Nevertheless, there is an indication, at p. 14, that the point was raised in argument by junior counsel for the appellant and counsel for the respondents in the instant appeal submit that the speeches in Sotiriadis proceed on the tacit assumption that evidence means legally admissible evidence. In particular, Mr. Morland points out that translations of the authenticated documents had been delivered to Bow Street within two months of the provisional arrest; it was only the authenticated documents themselves which arrived later. Hence, he submits, it must be taken to have been accepted in Sotiriadis that production of evidence meant

3 W.L.R.

Reg. v. Govr. of Ashford, Ex p. Postlethwaite (H.L.(E.))

Lord Bridge
of Harwich

A production in legally admissible form. He relies, in particular, on the following passage from the speech of Lord Diplock, at p. 29:

B “(3) If the hearing of the cases against the prisoner has not been completed before two months from the date of the rearrest (under (1) above) or of the first remand under (2), the prisoner should be brought before the magistrate on the day on which the two months expires or as soon thereafter as is practicable, for the magistrate to make his finding whether the evidence which has already been produced to him in support of the charges made against the prisoner would be sufficient, in the absence of any further evidence, to justify the prisoner’s committal for trial if the charges had been in respect of indictable offences committed in England. He may take into consideration not only evidence which has been adduced at any previous hearing in open court but also any duly authenticated depositions taken in Germany which had in fact been received at the Foreign Office before the time limit expired although they have not been previously tendered in open court. If he finds this evidence to be insufficient the prisoner must be discharged. If, on the other hand, he finds it to be sufficient he must continue with the hearing until both parties have completed their evidence, and then decide upon the totality of the evidence whether the case for extradition has been made out.”

E My Lords, I accept that the House in Sotiriadis proceeded on the implicit assumption that the “evidence” required to be produced by the relevant provision of the German extradition treaty, in a case where the only evidence relied on by the requesting state consisted of depositions and statements on oath taken in the requesting state, meant such evidence as duly authenticated. For my part, I am not disposed, nor have we been invited, to question this assumption. But I do not accept that it inexorably follows from this that “evidence,” to be presented within the time limit imposed by article V of the Treaty which we have to consider, must then be in legally admissible form. The primary factor which governed the decision of the majority and which emerges from the views expressed in Sotiriadis was that compliance with the time limit should be a matter within the control of the requesting state. If this leads to the conclusion that “evidence” may mean different things according to the category of evidence relied on by the requesting state, so be it. Logically it may be attractive to say that “evidence” must always mean the same thing, viz. legally admissible evidence. But if pragmatically it is necessary to interpret the word more flexibly in order to avoid frustrating the object and intent of the Treaty, I prefer the pragmatic solution.

H We were helpfully supplied by the Solicitor-General with a comprehensive analysis of extradition treaties containing different provisions relating to the time when foreign states seeking extradition are required to furnish the necessary evidence to justify it. I am the more willing to accept that the word “evidence” may be used with a flexible meaning in such treaties in the light of the formula which I find used in the several treaties most recently concluded. I take as a typical example the treaty with Finland concluded in 1975 and embodied in the Finland (Extradition) Order 1976 (S.I. No. 1037 of 1976). This provides by article 8:

“(1) Subject to the provisions of article 19 of this Treaty the request for extradition shall be made through the diplomatic channel. . . .

(3) If the request relates to an accused person, it must . . . be accompanied by a warrant of arrest issued by a judge or other competent authority in the territory of the requesting party and by such evidence as, according to the law of the requested party, would justify his committal for trial if the offence had been committed in the territory of the requested party, including evidence that the person sought is the person to whom the warrant of arrest refers.”

Here, if the word “evidence” means, in relation to Finnish witnesses, duly authenticated depositions or statements on oath taken in Finland in accordance with the assumption implicit in Sotiriadis, it nevertheless cannot possibly mean, in the context, admissible oral evidence where the evidence of English witnesses is to be relied on.

I see no insuperable difficulty in interpreting the word “evidence” in all such treaty provisions as referring to written statements which set forth the relevant evidence which witnesses are able to give of their own knowledge and which are, for the purpose of establishing their authenticity, using that word in an entirely non-technical sense, attested in the form most appropriate to the category of the statements in question. This will mean as a general rule: in the case of statements taken in the requesting state, duly authenticated depositions or statements on oath; in the case of English evidence before 1967, sworn affidavits; in the case of English evidence since 1967, statements made under section 2 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967, now section 102 of the Magistrates’ Courts Act 1980. Any stricter interpretation would indeed, in the language of Lord Russell of Killowen C.J., “hinder the working and narrow the operation of most salutary international arrangements”* and should, on that account, be rejected.

The only other point taken on behalf of the respondents arises under a provision in article I of the Treaty. Article I contains a list of the crimes to which the reciprocal arrangements for extradition apply. Manslaughter is one of the crimes included in this list. But at the end of the list article I contains a provision that:

“In no case can the surrender be made unless the crime shall be punishable according to the laws in force in both countries with regard to extradition.”

It is submitted for the respondents that they are entitled to habeas corpus because the expert evidence of a Belgian lawyer was not “presented” within two months of their arrest in compliance with article V to prove that manslaughter remains “punishable according to the laws in force” in Belgium “with regard to extradition,” although an affidavit to that effect by a Belgian lawyer to fill the supposed lacuna was received with the consent of counsel for the respondents in the Divisional Court proceedings.

My Lords, I cannot forbear to say that this submission is, in my opinion, utterly devoid of merit or substance. Assuming that this was a matter for the magistrate and not for the Secretary of State, which I doubt but will not take time to consider further, an English court is surely entitled to presume that so grave a crime as manslaughter

- A originally included in the list of crimes to which an extradition treaty with a foreign state applies remains punishable and an extradition crime by the law of that foreign state until the contrary is proved. But in any event the duly authenticated Belgian warrant shows that the offence charged, in the English translation, was "premeditated wilful assault and battery leading to death without the intention of so doing," an offence
- B which clearly corresponds to the English offence of manslaughter, and the duly authenticated deposition of a Mr. Andre Vandoren, the Principal Deputy Public Prosecutor, which accompanied the requisition for surrender, states that this offence is contrary to the Belgian Penal Code. If evidence was required, I do not understand why this did not suffice. Where the Government of Belgium, whose good faith is certainly not to be called in question, are seeking extradition for an extradition
- C crime listed in the Treaty, it would, in my opinion, be absurd to hold Mr. Vandoren's deposition to be defective because it contains no express reference to the law "with regard to extradition."

I would accordingly allow the appeals, set aside the orders of the Divisional Court and dismiss the respondents' applications for habeas corpus.

- D LORD TEMPLEMAN. My Lords, an extradition treaty made between the governments of friendly countries enables a country whose laws have been violated within its territory to obtain from abroad the attendance for trial of persons accused of offending against those laws.

- E In 1902 an Extradition Treaty was made between the governments of the United Kingdom and Belgium. The Belgian Treaty became enforceable in this country under and in accordance with the provisions of the Extradition Act 1870 as amended from time to time. Each country agreed to extradite or surrender to the other country persons accused or convicted of committing specified serious crimes within the territory of the other country. The Treaty and the Act of 1870 set forth the procedure to be followed in extradition proceedings and provide
- F safeguards against delay, injustice and oppression.

- By articles II and IV of the Treaty the Belgian authorities may make a requisition to the British Foreign Secretary requiring the surrender of a person accused of committing an extradition crime in Belgium. In the present case a requisition was duly made for the extradition of each of the respondents to stand trial for an extradition offence alleged to have been committed in Belgium and corresponding to the English crime of
- G manslaughter. Each respondent was, in accordance with the Act of 1870, arrested and brought before the Chief Metropolitan Magistrate.

By section 26 of the Extradition Act 1870:

- H "The term 'fugitive criminal' means any person accused or convicted of an extradition crime committed within the jurisdiction of any foreign state who is in or is suspected of being in some part of Her Majesty's dominions; . . ."

By section 9:

"When a fugitive criminal is brought before the police magistrate, the police magistrate shall hear the case in the same manner, and have the same jurisdiction and powers, as near as may be, as if the prisoner were brought before him charged with an indictable offence committed in England."

By article II of the Treaty:

"If the evidence to be then produced shall be such as to justify, according to the law of England, the committal for trial of the prisoner, if the crime of which he is accused had been committed in England, the magistrate shall commit him to prison to await the warrant of the" Home Secretary for his surrender to the Belgian authorities.

By section 14 of the Act of 1870 evidence on the hearing of committal proceedings for extradition may include:

"Depositions or statements on oath, taken in a foreign state, and copies of such original depositions or statements . . . if duly authenticated . . ."

Evidence on committal proceedings for the trial of a prisoner charged with an indictable offence committed in England may by section 102 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980 include a written statement signed by the person who made it and containing a declaration of truthfulness provided, inter alia, that no objection is taken by the accused to the admission of the statement.

By article V of the Treaty:

"If within two months, counting from the date of arrest, sufficient evidence for the extradition shall not have been presented, the person arrested shall be at liberty. . . ."

In the present case evidence was taken in Belgium. The Belgian evidence consisted of statements which appeared to comply with the provisions of section 14 of the Act of 1870. The Belgian evidence was within two months of the arrest of each respondent, sent to and received by the magistrates' court, but awaited consideration and admission by the magistrate upon the hearing of the committal proceedings. Evidence was also taken in England. The English evidence consisted of statements which appeared to comply with the provisions of section 102 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980. The English evidence was within two months of the arrest of each respondent sent to and received by the magistrates' court but awaited consideration and admission by the magistrate upon the hearing of the committal proceedings. When the committal proceedings took place more than two months after the arrest of each respondent, the magistrate considered and admitted the Belgian evidence and the English evidence. It is conceded that the Belgian evidence was rightly admitted but it is argued that the magistrate ought to have rejected the English evidence because it was not finally admitted until two months after the relevant date of arrest. But article V does not require the full committal proceedings to take place within two months of the date of the arrest. The progress of committal proceedings is a matter for the magistrate who, in practice, deals with extradition proceedings with the utmost despatch consistently with the needs of the prosecution and the requirements of the defence. Article V enables the accused to procure his release if within two months of the date of arrest the Belgian authorities have not presented to the court sufficient evidential material to justify extradition. In the present case the requirements of article V were fulfilled by the presentation, within two months of arrest to the court at Bow Street, of the duly authenticated Belgian evidence and the statements of the English witnesses which were

*Vendor and Purchaser—Defective title—Completion notice—Adverse entry in local land charges register—Condition of sale that purchaser deemed to have searched local land charges register—Whether vendor relieved of duty to make full and frank disclosure—Whether purchaser deemed to have notice of entry in register—Law of Property Act 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 20), s. 198(1)*¹

The defendant was the freehold owner of a house let to a protected tenant and the defendant's predecessor in title had applied to the local authority for an improvement grant under the Housing Act 1974. The grant was approved and registered by the local authority in the register of local land charges and that encumbrance could be removed on payment pursuant to the provisions of the Act. At the time the defendant purchased the property, her solicitors knew that the charge had been registered. Subsequently the defendant decided to dispose of the property by sale at auction and it was a condition of the contract that the purchaser was deemed to have made local searches and inquiries and that the property was sold subject to all matters that might be disclosed by a search or inquiries of the relevant local authority. The plaintiff agreed to purchase the property without making a search of the register but when the plaintiff learnt of the charge it refused to complete until the encumbrance was removed from the register. The defendant served notice to complete on 31 December 1985 and, when the plaintiff had obtained the removal of the encumbrance from the register and was willing to complete, demanded payment of interest from 31 December 1985 on the purchase price.

Held, (1) that equity required the defendant, as vendor, to disclose all defects in title of which she was aware and without such disclosure, she could not rely on the conditions of sale that deemed that the purchaser had searched the register and purchased the property subject to any encumbrances shown on the register; and that since the defendant's solicitor had knowledge of the defect in title, the defendant must be taken to have known of the entries on the register and, therefore, had been under a duty to make full and frank disclosure to the plaintiff of the encumbrance and she was not exonerated from that duty by the conditions of sale (post, pp. 399E, 400A–B, C–D).

ORIGINATING SUMMONS

D The plaintiff, Rignall Developments Ltd., entered into a contract dated 3 December 1985 to purchase from the defendant, Gulseren Halil, a house known as 218 Bellenden Road, Peckham, and, when it objected to an adverse entry against the property in the local land charges register, the defendant served on it a notice to complete on 31 December 1985. The plaintiff did not complete on that date but, having arranged for the entry in the local land charges register to be removed, it indicated its willingness to complete but the defendant refused to complete unless the plaintiff paid interest on the purchase price from 31 December 1985.

E By summons dated 30 May 1986, the plaintiff sought against the defendant, inter alia, a declaration that a good title to the property had not been shown in accordance with the contract of sale; a declaration that the defendant was not entitled to give notice to complete on 31 December 1985 being unable at that date to show good title to the property; a declaration that the defendant was not entitled to claim interest on the balance of the purchase price payable under the contract; and that the defendant be ordered to complete the contract on payment of the contractual purchase price of £14,000 within 14 days.

F The facts are stated in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

H 10 March. MILLETT J. read the following judgment. For 60 years, ever since the judgment of Eve J. in In re Forsey and Hollebone's Contract [1927] 2 Ch. 379, a prudent purchaser has searched the register of local land charges before contract, and has not relied exclusively on making his search in the course of the normal process of investigation of title between contract and completion. Recently, however, the time taken by many local authorities, particularly in London, to reply to inquiries and to deal with applications for official searches of the registers kept by them has become a scandal which threatens to impede the proper working of a free market. Where land is sold by auction, it may be impossible for prospective bidders to obtain official searches in the time available. Where residential property is sold by private treaty, delay can cause havoc with the long chain of transactions which may be involved. There is a growing and useful practice for the vendor's solicitor to obtain and supply the purchaser's solicitor with a copy of the entries on the register at the same time as the draft contract. The present case calls for reconsideration of the consequences of the purchaser's failure to search the register or to obtain copies of the entries thereon before contract, and the correctness of the decision in In re Forsey and Hollebone's Contract has been challenged.

The case concerns a freehold dwelling in Peckham known as 218, Bellenden Road ("the property"). At an auction held on 3 December 1985, the plaintiff agreed to purchase the property from the defendant for £16,000 and paid a deposit of £1,600 to the auctioneers as stakeholders. The contract incorporated the National Conditions of Sale (20th ed.) as well as certain general and special conditions. These included general condition 11:

"The purchaser shall be deemed to have made local searches and inquiries and to have knowledge of all matters that would be disclosed thereby and shall purchase subject to such matters."

Special condition 5 provided:

"The property is also sold subject to any matters which might be disclosed by a search and/or inquiries of the relevant local authority either at the date of sale or at the date of completion and (whether or not he has carried out any such search and/or inquiries) the purchaser shall be deemed to buy with full notice and knowledge of all such matters and shall not raise any objection thereon or requisition relating thereto."

The date fixed for completion was 31 December 1985. The plaintiff did not complete on that date because of a subsisting entry on the register of local land charges to which it took objection. The defendant, relying on the conditions which I have read, denied that this was an objection which the plaintiff was entitled to raise, and served notice to complete.

The plaintiff's solicitors eventually obtained the removal of the entry, but not until 14 April 1986. The plaintiff then sought to complete, but the defendant refused to complete unless the plaintiff paid interest on the balance of the purchase price since 31 December 1985 which the plaintiff declined to do. The amount involved was small, and the sensible course would have been for the parties to complete and leave the question of interest to be resolved later. Instead, both sides took up entrenched positions, and the sale has still not been completed. The plaintiff now seeks specific performance on payment of the balance of the purchase price, but without interest; and the defendant seeks to rescind the contract and forfeit the deposit. The case turns on whether the defendant had by 31 December 1985 shown a good title to the property in accordance with the contract, and this depends on whether the plaintiff was entitled to object to the entries on the register notwithstanding the conditions of the contract which I have read.

A At all material times the property was let to a protected tenant and it was sold to the plaintiff subject to the tenancy. In 1978 the freehold owner had applied to the local authority for an improvement grant under the Housing Act 1974. The application was accompanied by a certificate of availability for letting dated 10 November 1978. It was approved on 4 April 1979 and registered in the register of local land charges on 6 April 1979. The date which the local authority in due course certified as the date on which the property first became fit for occupation after the completion of the relevant works ("the certified date") was 2 June 1980. The grant was paid on 15 February 1982.

B The plaintiff had not searched the register of local land charges prior to the auction and was unaware of the entries it contained. They were not disclosed by the defendant. On 11 December 1985 the plaintiff's solicitors applied to the local authority for an official search of the register and on the same day they submitted requisitions on title. One of these asked whether any improvement grant had been obtained in respect of the property. The defendant's solicitors replied, disputing the plaintiff's right to make the inquiry, and claiming that it was barred by the contract. Without prejudice to that contention, however, they disclosed that there was with the deeds a search dated October 1984 which revealed that a certificate of availability for letting had been issued on 10 November 1978 and an improvement grant had been paid on 15 February 1982. Eventually the plaintiff's solicitors received the official certificate of search which confirmed the existence of the relevant entries. They disclosed the dates of the certificates of availability for letting and of the approval and payment of the grant, but not the certified date.

E The proprietorship register at the Land Registry shows that the defendant was registered as proprietor of the property with title absolute on 1 November 1984. It does not disclose whether she was a purchaser for value; but a donee does not normally investigate his donor's title and from the proximity of the dates I infer that the search of the local land charges register, made in October 1984, was made on her behalf at the time of her acquisition of the property, and that she was.

F The significance of the entries on the register cannot be understood without reference to the relevant provisions of the Housing Act 1974. With immaterial passages omitted, they are as follows: section 73:

G "(1) . . . where an application for an improvement grant . . . has been approved by a local authority the provisions of this section shall apply with respect to the occupation, during the period of five years beginning with the certified date (in this section referred to as 'the initial period'), of the dwelling . . . to which the grant relates. . . . (3) For the purposes of this section, the following are 'qualifying persons' in relation to a dwelling, namely,—(a) the applicant for the grant and any person who derives title to the dwelling through or under the applicant, otherwise than by a conveyance for value; . . . (4) In any case where the application for the grant was accompanied by a certificate of availability for letting with respect to the dwelling, it shall be a condition of the grant that, throughout the initial period, (a) the dwelling will be let or available for letting as a residence, and not for a holiday, by a qualifying person . . ."

“(1) The provisions of this section shall apply in any case where, under or by virtue of any provision of this Part of this Act, a condition (in this section referred to as a ‘grant condition’) is imposed as a condition of grant. (2) If and so long as a grant condition remains in force—(a) it shall be binding on any person, . . . who is for the time being the owner of the dwelling to which the grant relates; . . . (3) . . . a grant condition shall be in force throughout the period of five years beginning on the certified date. . . . (5) A grant condition shall be treated as not being registrable by virtue of section 15 of the Land Charges Act 1925 . . . but, as soon as may be after an application for a grant has been approved, any condition of that grant shall be registered in the register of local land charges . . . (6) In this Part of this Act ‘the certified date’ in relation to a dwelling in respect of which an application for a grant has been approved, means the date certified by the local authority by whom the application was approved as the date on which the dwelling first becomes fit for occupation after completion of the relevant works to the satisfaction of the local authority.”

Section 76:

“(1) The provisions of this section shall have effect in the event of a breach of a condition of a grant (in this section referred to as ‘the relevant grant’) at a time when the condition is binding on the owner of the dwelling concerned by virtue of section 75(2) above. (2) Where the relevant grant related to a single dwelling, an amount equal to the amount of the relevant grant, together with compound interest thereon as from the certified date, calculated at the appropriate rate . . . shall, on being demanded by the local authority forthwith become payable to the authority by the owner for the time being of the dwelling . . . (4) Nothing in subsection (2) or, as the case may be, subsection (3) above shall prevent a local authority from determining not to demand any such amount as is referred to in that subsection or from demanding an amount less than that which they are entitled to demand under that subsection. (5) Upon satisfaction of the liability of an owner of a dwelling to make a payment under this section to a local authority in respect of a breach of a condition of grant, the condition shall cease to be in force with respect to that dwelling.”

Section 77(1):

“If, at any time while a condition of grant remains in force, the owner of the dwelling to which the condition relates . . . pays to the local authority by whom the grant was made the like amount as would (on a demand by the local authority) become payable under section 76 above in the event of a breach of that condition, all conditions of the grant shall cease to be in force with respect to that dwelling.”

The definition of “qualifying person” in section 73(3)(a) has the result that a grant is repayable on any sale of the property during the initial period, even though the property continues to be occupied by a protected tenant. The object evidently is to prevent short-term speculators from buying properties, improving them at the expense of the ratepayers,

Millett J.

A and then selling them at a profit which reflects the expenditure of public money. The sale to the defendant in 1984, if, as I infer, she had bought the property, and the present sale to the plaintiff, if within the initial period, would both constitute breaches of a condition of the grant and make the grant repayable. The certified date did not appear on the register, but from the information available to the plaintiff's solicitors in December 1985 it must have seemed probable that there had been a B breach of condition in 1984, and possible that another would occur if completion took place on 31 December. In those circumstances, the plaintiff refused to complete in the absence of confirmation from the local authority that it would not seek to recover the amount of the grant from the plaintiff, or from the defendant that, if required, she would repay it out of the proceeds of sale.

C On 14 April 1986 the local authority's legal department, whose dilatoriness had largely caused the problem, finally notified the plaintiff's solicitors that the initial period had expired in June 1985, that there would not be a breach of grant condition if the plaintiff completed its purchase, and that it had given instructions for the entries on the register of local land charges to be removed. The plaintiff then offered to complete, and the parties adopted the positions I have described.

D The defendant relied upon the express terms of the contract. The property, it was submitted, was not sold free from encumbrances, but subject to the entries on the register of local land charges; and the plaintiff had no right to object to them. The defendant had, therefore, shown a good title to that which she had agreed to sell, and was entitled to serve notice to complete. Moreover, by general condition 11 the E plaintiff was deemed to have searched the register and to have knowledge of the entries thereon.

It is, however, a well-established rule of equity that, if there is a defect in title or encumbrance of which the vendor is aware, the vendor cannot rely upon conditions such as those in the present case unless full and frank disclosure is made of its existence. The leading authority is Nottingham Patent Brick and Tile Co. v. Butler (1885) 15 Q.B.D. 261.
F Wills J. said, at p. 271:

"The fourth condition provides that the property is sold subject to any matter or thing affecting the same, whether disclosed at the time of sale or not. Such a condition, however, does not relieve the vendor from the necessity of disclosing any incumbrance or liability of which he is aware, but simply protects him if it should afterwards turn out that the property is subject to some burden or right in G favour of a third person of which he is unaware . . . It would be nothing short of a direct encouragement to fraud if a vendor were at liberty by a condition of this kind to sell to a purchaser as an absolute and unburdened freehold a property which he knew to be subject to liabilities which would materially reduce its market value . . . In honesty and in law alike he was bound to give the purchaser
H full and fair information what it was that he had for sale, and was inviting him to buy, and, having failed to do so, he cannot insist upon the bargain procured by the suppression of material matters affecting the nature of the subject of sale. I entirely acquit the defendant of anything like intentional misconduct, but in the preparation of the particulars of sale he unfortunately relied upon his solicitor, who, as I cannot help believing, was under the mistaken impression that he could better the position of the vendor by abstaining from making himself acquainted with the contents of the earlier deeds in his possession, and open to his perusal.”

As that case shows, the knowledge of the vendor's solicitor is treated as that of the vendor, and it is no answer for him to say that he has not read the contents of his own conveyancing file. In the present case, therefore, the defendant must be taken to have known of the entries on the register, since a search had been made on her behalf at the time of her purchase and a copy of the entries was with the deeds in her solicitor's possession. To entitle her to rely on the relevant conditions of the contract in these circumstances, it was incumbent on her to disclose the existence and nature of the entries to the plaintiff before contract. Had the information disclosed in the answers to requisitions been included in the particulars of sale, there could have been no objection to conditions precluding all further inquiry and making the sale subject to the entries in question. In the absence of such disclosure the conditions cannot be relied on. It is hardly necessary to add that the equitable principle cannot be circumvented by the inclusion in the contract of a condition deeming the purchaser to have searched the register and to know of its contents. The purchaser's acceptance of such a condition is on the basis that the vendor has made the disclosure required of him.

In answer to this, it was first submitted on behalf of the defendant that the conditions of grant did not create an encumbrance or burden on the property, but only a personal liability upon the owner. But the grant is repayable on demand by the owner for the time being of the property, so that the potential liability binds successive owners of the property affected—which is why it is required to be registered—and in my judgment that is enough. Then it was submitted that the entries on the register were only “bare” entries, without any reality behind them. Unknown to the parties, it was said, the initial period had expired, so that the grant was not repayable and the entries were obsolete. In fact that appears to be incorrect if, as I infer, there had been a breach of grant condition in 1984. As I read the statutory provisions, once there has been a breach of grant condition during the initial period, repayment may be demanded, even after the expiration of that period, from the owner of the property at the date of the demand. But in any case, neither the entries on the register nor the defendant's answers to requisitions disclosed the certified date or showed that the initial period had expired. It was for the defendant to show a good title to the property free from the risk that repayment of the grant might be demanded from the plaintiff, and she failed to do so.

Next it was submitted that the plaintiff could have inspected the register before the auction, that a prudent purchaser would have done so, and that there was no reason for equity to come to the assistance of the imprudent. I cannot accept that submission. In Faruqi v. English Real Estates Ltd. [1979] 1 W.L.R. 963 the equitable principle was applied in a case where the relevant documents were made available for inspection and the vendors had given the purchasers a fair and proper opportunity of seeing what they were buying. But, as Walton J. pointed out, any purchaser reading the conditions of sale would be entitled to assume that, while there were no doubt entries on the register, they were only the usual sort of entries which would not adversely affect the

A value of the property. That observation applies with equal force to the present case.

As to the plaintiff's alleged imprudence, the modern practice of making pre-contract searches dates only from 1927 and is a result of the decision in In re Forsey and Hollebone's Contract [1927] 2 Ch. 379. But even if that is the only safe and prudent course, why should the purchaser's imprudence relieve the vendor of the obligation of candour?

B Finally, and most formidably, reliance was placed on section 198(1) of the Law of Property Act 1925 as amended by the Local Land Charges Act 1975. That deems the registration of any instrument or matter in any local land charges register to constitute:

C "actual notice of such instrument or matter, and of the fact of such registration, to all persons and for all purposes connected with the land affected."

D Equity, it was submitted—and I agree—does not insist on the performance of idle rituals, and does not require a vendor to disclose to a purchaser matters already known to him. For this submission to help the defendant, however, the actual notice of which section 198 speaks, must be equated with knowledge. That is the crucial equation which was made in In re Forsey and Hollebone's Contract.

E In that case, land was sold free from encumbrances. In accordance with normal conveyancing practice, the purchaser's solicitor did not search the local land charges register until after exchange of contracts and shortly before the date fixed for completion. He then discovered that the local authority had resolved to prepare a town planning scheme. The resolution had been registered as a local land charge, but neither the vendor nor the purchaser was aware of its existence at the date of the contract.

F The purchaser applied for a declaration that the vendor had not shown a good title to the property sold in accordance with the contract and for repayment of the deposit. Her application was dismissed by Eve J. and the Court of Appeal on the ground that a resolution to prepare a town planning scheme did not operate to impose a subsisting encumbrance on the land affected. At first instance, however, Eve J. gave a second ground for his decision (upon which the Court of Appeal expressed no opinion) that even if the registered resolution was an encumbrance, it was an encumbrance of which the purchaser must, under section 198, be deemed to have contracted with actual notice, and she was therefore precluded from refusing to complete the contract. In his words, at p.387:

G "[The vendor] has only to point to the section . . . to show that when the contract was entered into vendor and purchaser must alike be deemed to have known of the existence of the incumbrance which the purchaser insists on as a good ground for avoiding the contract." (my emphasis).

H Eve J. thus equated the actual notice attributed to the purchaser by section 198 with knowledge for the purpose of the well-known rule that, in the case of an open contract for the sale of land, a purchaser cannot object to an irremovable encumbrance of which he was aware at the date of the contract. An encumbrance is irremovable if the owner of the land is not entitled as of right to procure its discharge by the payment of money. The rule rests upon implication. A person who knows that a property has some incurable defect or is subject to some irremovable encumbrance, and yet contracts to buy it, must impliedly be taken to have agreed to accept the vendor's title despite the existence of that defect or encumbrance. To this extent the implication in an open contract that the property is sold free from encumbrances is negated. (Normally, the purchaser's knowledge of the state of the title cannot deprive him of the benefit of an express term that the land is sold free from encumbrances. Eve J. attributed this to the parol evidence rule, but it would, I think, be more accurate to attribute it to the obvious impossibility, even if the evidence were received, of implying a term inconsistent with an express term of the contract.) The rule has no application to an encumbrance like that in the present case, which can be removed on payment: see section 77 of the Housing Act 1974. The purchaser's knowledge of such an encumbrance is not inconsistent with the vendor's obligation to make the payment necessary to obtain its discharge on completion: see In re Glog and Miller's Contract (1883) 23 Ch.D. 320. Hence the crucial importance of the contractual provisions on which the defendant relies.

This part of Eve J.'s judgment represents an alternative ground for his decision, and cannot be dismissed as merely obiter. It has stood for nearly 60 years, but not without challenge. It was greeted at the time by conveyancers with consternation and incredulity. Its interpretation of section 198 was described as "startling" and its effect as "revolutionary." It has since been subjected to severe criticism by the editors of Emmett on Title and other eminent conveyancers. It has led to a change in conveyancing practice, which is both inconvenient and time-consuming, and which is unlikely to be adopted by those who buy at auction or who contract before consulting solicitors. For such purchasers, the decision constitutes a potential trap. Even in ordinary sales by private treaty, the need to search the local land charges register before contract rather than at the same time as the other registers, that is to say shortly before completion, is inconvenient and entails a delay which can put the contract at risk. Pre-contract searches of the land charges register—to which section 198 also applied—are, of course, impractical, since registration in that register, unlike the local land charges register, is effected against the name of the estate owner for the time being, and until contract it is not known against what names the search should be made.

These problems, aggravated by the reduction in the statutory period of title from 30 to 20 years, led to the reversal of the relevant part of Eve J.'s decision by section 24 of the Law of Property Act 1969 following the Law Commission Report on Land Charges Affecting Unregistered Land (1969) (Law Com. No. 18). That section, however, does not apply to local land charges, in respect of which pre-contract searches are feasible and had by 1969 become normal practice. In relation to local land charges, therefore, the decision in In re Forsey and Hollebone's Contract [1927] 2 Ch. 379 has not been reversed by statute, but neither has it been confirmed thereby.

In my judgment, the equation of the actual notice referred to in section 198 with the state of mind required for terms to be implied into an open contract is deeply suspect. I find it impossible to reconcile with principle or authority. If a purchaser knows, or even mistakenly believes, that he cannot expect to obtain a title free from encumbrances, and yet enters into a contract of purchase on that basis, the inference is obvious. But the inference depends upon his state of mind, which may be

3 W.L.R.

Rignall Developments Ltd. v. Halil (Ch.D.)

Millett J.

A affected by error, or ignorance, or forgetfulness. Notice, even actual notice, however, has nothing to do with the person's state of mind, and is not affected by such matters. In the absence of knowledge, notice cannot support the necessary inference.

B This is neatly demonstrated by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Ellis v. Rogers (1885) 29 Ch.D. 661. In that case, the purchaser knew before he entered into the contract that the land was subject to restrictive covenants, but he wrongly believed that they had been extinguished when the land had been compulsorily acquired by a railway company. He later discovered that the covenants were still extant and would bind him if he completed. When he refused to complete, the vendor contended that, having known of the existence of the covenants from the outset, the purchaser must be taken to have agreed to accept the title subject to them. The Court of Appeal rejected this contention.

C As Cotton L.J. put it, at p.671:

D "The vendor knew nothing of the covenants. The purchaser knew of them, but thought that they had been discharged, so that both parties were contracting on the footing that a good title was to be made, and as a good title cannot be made, the purchaser is not bound."

E This shows that notice and knowledge are not synonymous. The purchaser had actual notice of the existence of the covenants. Had he completed before discovering his error, he would unquestionably have been bound by them as a purchaser with notice. His ignorance of their continuing subsistence, while negating any inference which might otherwise have been drawn from his knowledge of them, would not avail him against the covenantee, for it would not affect his notice of them.

F There are two further grounds for suspecting Eve J.'s reasoning. First in Ellis v. Rogers, 29 Ch.D. 661, 666, Kay J. pointed out that to force the title on the purchaser it is essential that he should have knowledge, not only of the existence of the encumbrance, but of the vendor's inability to remove it. Section 198 cannot help with this. Unless

G consciously aware of the existence of an encumbrance, a purchaser cannot form any useful opinion on the vendor's ability to remove it.

H Secondly, it is unlikely that the notice attributed to the purchaser by section 198 was intended to have any greater effect than actual notice would have had before 1926; and notice of equities before 1926 had nothing to do with the relationship of vendor and purchaser or with the interpretation and effect of their contract of sale. It was concerned exclusively with the enforcement of third parties' rights. The fundamental rule of equity is that an equitable interest is binding on everyone, except a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. The Land Charges Act 1925 substituted registration for notice, and was likewise concerned exclusively with the protection of third parties' rights. Section 198 of the Law of Property Act 1925 forms an integral part of the machinery of registration. In this context, the natural reading of section 198 is that registration constitutes actual notice to all persons and for all purposes for which such notice is material, that is to say for the purpose of the enforcement of third parties' rights against the land affected.

In the present case, the defendant asks me not merely to apply the decision in In re Forsey and Hollebone's Contract [1927] 2 Ch. 379, but to extend it by applying it in a different though closely related context. There, both vendor and purchaser were equally ignorant of the existence of the local land charge; it constituted an irremovable encumbrance; and the question was whether section 198 had the effect of modifying the vendor's contractual obligation to make a good title. Here, the defendant, through her solicitor, knew of the existence of the entry on the register; she could have procured its removal by repaying the grant if necessary; and the question is whether her failure to disclose what she knew prevents her from relying on the express terms of the contract. I cannot think that a vendor who knew of the existence of a registered charge, and who deliberately deceived the purchaser by telling him that there was no such charge, or that it was not registered, could escape liability for fraud by claiming that by virtue of section 198 the purchaser must be taken to have had actual notice of the truth. Similarly, I am not prepared to hold that a vendor who knows of a registered charge, and who wishes to make the sale subject to it, is exonerated by section 198 from his obligation to make full and frank disclosure of its existence before he can take advantage of an appropriate condition of sale.

It is, therefore, not strictly necessary to reach any conclusion whether the decision in In re Forsey and Hollebone's Contract can be supported where the existence of a registered local land charge is unknown to the vendor at the date of contract (so that it is not unconscionable for him to rely upon a special condition of sale without disclosing it) or where it represents an irremovable defect of title (so that he does not need to rely on any special condition). Such cases can be dealt with as and when they arise. In my judgment, the reasoning of the decision is too unsound to permit of any extension, however logical, to a situation not directly covered by it.

I shall grant a declaration that the defendant failed to show a good title in accordance with the contract before 14 April 1986, that the defendant is not entitled to interest on the balance of the purchase money and I shall grant a decree of specific performance of the contract upon payment by the plaintiff of the balance of the purchase price, less the costs of the plaintiff of obtaining the removal of the relevant entries on the local land charges register.

D F. Ltd. was a company engaged in the specialised business of guaranteeing the completion of films on time and within their budget. The articles of association provided that a director should be remunerated for his services at the rate of £150 per annum, the chairman receiving an additional £100 per annum, but the rate of remuneration could be increased by an ordinary resolution. The directors were also empowered to appoint one or more of their number to be holders of an executive office, and any director appointed to such office was to receive such additional remuneration by way of salary, lump sum, commission or participation in profits as the directors might determine.

E During the course of 1982 the appointed executive directors and companies with which they were associated acquired sufficient shares in F. Ltd. to give them overall voting control. The shares were bought by means of payments made to three of the associated companies in August 1982 of £33,000 each, part of which was then lent to the fourth to discharge a bank loan taken out for the purpose of obtaining cash to buy shares in F. Ltd. and the remainder was used for the purchase of shares by the three associated companies.

F The plaintiffs, who held a minority of shares in F. Ltd., brought an action against F. Ltd., three executive directors and the chairman, a non-executive director, and four companies closely associated with one or other of the three executive directors, claiming that the directors had paid themselves excessive remuneration, that the payments in 1982 to the associated companies were contrary to section 42 of the Companies Act 1981¹ and that certain payments of expenses to directors were excessive. The plaintiffs between them held 11.86 per cent. of the issued shares in F. Ltd.; the defendants between them held 62.54 per cent.; of the remaining shares 2.54 per cent. were held by a company which actively supported the plaintiffs, while 3.22 per cent. were held by persons or companies which, it was common ground, were to be treated as supporting the defendants. W. Ltd., a company not under the control of either the plaintiffs or the defendants, held 19.66 per cent. of the shares in F. Ltd. and was opposed to the continuance of the plaintiffs' action.

H

On a motion by the chairman and F. Ltd. to strike out the plaintiffs' action under R.S.C., Ord. 18, r. 19 or under the inherent jurisdiction as vexatious, frivolous or an abuse of process:—

[1987]

Held, (1) that the defendants' application raised the issue whether the plaintiffs could proceed with their minority shareholders' action and, although that raised difficult questions of law, the defendants, by invoking the procedure under R.S.C., Ord. 18, r. 9 rather than the procedure for determining a preliminary issue of law under R.S.C., Ord. 33, r. 3, had not adopted such an inherently defective procedure that the court should not proceed to determine the issues raised; and that since the effect of the court deciding those issues against the plaintiffs would be determinative of the action, the court would entertain the application and consider whether prima facie the company was entitled to the relief claimed in the action and whether the action was within the exception to the rule in Foss v. Harbottle (post, pp. 418C-D, F-H, 421G-422A, H-423A).

Prudential Assurance Co. Ltd. v. Newman Industries Ltd. (No. 2) [1982] Ch. 204, C.A. and Williams and Humbert Ltd. v. W. & H. Trade Marks (Jersey) Ltd. [1986] A.C. 368, H.L.(E.) considered.

(2) That although excessive remuneration paid to directors might be an abuse of power, where the power to decide remuneration was vested in the board, it could not be ultra vires the company; and that in view of the uncontradicted evidence about the specialised field in which the company operated and the high levels of remuneration obtaining there it was more likely that the plaintiffs would fail than succeed on the issue of quantum; that likewise no prima facie case had been shown that the executive directors' expenses were excessive; and that, prima facie, the payments to associated companies were not ultra vires since payments at the request of an executive director to an outside entity were capable of being payments in respect of services rendered by the executive director, save that there was a prima facie case of irregularity regarding certain payments not fully cured by subsequent adoption of the accounts at the annual general meetings at which those payments should have been disclosed; that since the admitted payments of £33,000 to associated companies had not been shown to be reasonably necessary for the purpose of providing for amounts likely to be incurred by way of directors' remuneration there was a prima facie case of infringement of section 42 of the Companies Act 1981 (post, pp. 436A-F, G, 439F-440C, 441D-442A).

In re George Newman & Co. [1895] 1 Ch. 674, C.A. and Rolled Steel Products (Holdings) Ltd. v. British Steel Corporation [1986] Ch. 246, C.A. applied.

(3) That although a minority shareholder had locus standi to bring an action on behalf of a company to recover property or money transferred or paid away in an ultra vires transaction, he did not have an indefeasible right to prosecute such an action on the company's behalf; that it was proper to have regard to the views of the independent shareholders, and their votes should be disregarded only if the court was satisfied that they would be cast in favour of the defendant directors in order to support them rather than for the benefit of the company, or if there was a substantial risk of that happening; that there was no evidence to suggest that the votes of W. Ltd. would be cast otherwise than for reasons genuinely thought to be for the company's advantage; and that, accordingly, since the majority of the independent shareholders' votes, including those of W. Ltd., would be cast against allowing the action to proceed, the statement of claim should be struck out (post, pp. 445H-446A, 452E-F, 459G-460D, 461B-C, 463G-H).

MOTIONS

By a writ dated 7 February 1985, the plaintiffs, Nora Smith, Lucienne Crane, and the Right Honourable Felim O'Neill, Baron Rathcavan, in a specially endorsed writ claimed various sums of money to be paid by various defendants to the company, Film Finances Ltd., the ninth named defendant, upon whose behalf the plaintiffs claimed to sue, as being minority shareholders of the company. Those claims were based on allegations that the eighth defendant, Brindeel Ltd., an associated company controlled by the company's executive directors, William Alan Croft, Richard Martin Francis Soames and David Alexander Korda (the first to third defendants) had purchased 19,900 shares in the company, with money borrowed from a bank; that Brindeel Ltd. had been acquired by the executive directors on or about 11 June 1982 with a view to the purchase of the 19,900 shares; that each of three other associated companies controlled by the executive directors, Mannergrana Services Ltd., Cushingham Ltd., and Bellwedge Ltd. (the fifth to seventh defendants), had received £33,000 from the company in early August 1982, and had lent £28,000 to Brindeel Ltd. thereafter, and that these sums were used by Brindeel Ltd. to discharge its bank indebtedness. It was alleged that the payments by the company to the associated companies constituted financial assistance for the purchase of its shares within the meaning of section 42(2) of the Companies Act 1981. The writ claimed also a declaration that Brindeel Ltd. held the 19,900 shares on constructive trust for the company absolutely, and an order for the payment by Brindeel Ltd. to the company of £71,640, and for damages for conspiracy. There was also a claim against the majority shareholders and Michael Lewis Carr, the chairman and a non-executive director of the company (the fourth defendant), for interest under section 35A of the Supreme Court Act 1981, or under the court's inherent equitable jurisdiction. Further and other relief and costs were also claimed. E F G H

By a notice of motion dated 24 February 1986 the company applied for an order pursuant to R.S.C., Ord. 18, r. 19 or under the court's inherent jurisdiction, that the action be struck out as being frivolous,

3 W.L.R.

Smith v. Croft (No. 2) (Ch.D.)

- A vexatious or an abuse of process, on the grounds that the plaintiffs were not in fact entitled to bring or to continue the same, and that the plaintiffs do pay the defendants' costs of the action to be taxed. By a further notice of motion, dated 17 March 1986 the fourth defendant sought an order, pursuant to R.S.C., Ord. 18, r. 19 or the court's inherent jurisdiction, that the action be similarly struck out on the grounds that the plaintiffs were not in fact entitled to bring the same, or alternatively that the action was obviously unsustainable against him (the fourth defendant), and that the plaintiffs do pay the defendants' costs of the action to be taxed.
- B

The facts are stated in the ruling of 13 November 1986 and in the judgment of 19 December 1986.

- C Robin Potts Q.C. and Daniel Serota for the plaintiffs.
David Oliver Q.C. for the fourth defendant.
Charles Aldous Q.C. and Caroline Hutton for the company.

- 13 November 1986. KNOX J. I have to give a ruling in relation to two motions that are before me. The first is a motion by the ninth defendant, Film Finances Ltd. ("the company") for an order pursuant to R.S.C., Ord. 18, r. 19, or under the inherent jurisdiction of the court that this action be struck out as being frivolous or vexatious or an abuse of the process of the court on the ground that, the proceedings being purportedly brought by the plaintiffs on behalf of the ninth defendant, the plaintiffs are in fact not entitled to bring or continue the same. There is an application with regard to costs.
- D

- E The other notice of motion is one by the fourth defendant, Michael Lewis Carr, in terms very similar to the first motion, for an order pursuant to R.S.C., Ord. 18, r. 19 or under the inherent jurisdiction, that this action be struck out as being frivolous or vexatious or an abuse of the process of the court on the grounds that the proceedings being purportedly brought by the plaintiffs on behalf of the ninth defendant, the plaintiffs are in fact not entitled to bring or continue the same, and then there is an additional ground: "alternatively that the same is obviously unsustainable against the fourth defendant." I am not concerned, in relation to this ruling, with that second ground in the second notice of motion.
- F

- G The ruling which I have to make falls really into two parts. First, is the procedure, which it will be seen has been adopted by those two defendants, an application under R.S.C., Ord. 18, r. 19 and the inherent jurisdiction, appropriate at all to this type of proceeding? Secondly, if that question is answered in the affirmative, should these two applications be dismissed because the questions raised thereby do not have plain and obvious answers? It is not disputed but that difficult questions of law arise. If the right test to apply is that the applications should be dismissed unless the court is satisfied that the plaintiffs are bound to fail in the action without going in detail into the legal issues raised, then it is not disputed but that that test is not satisfied. It is common ground between the parties, and those familiar with the complications of the rule in Foss v. Harbottle (1843) 2 Hare 461 will not find this a matter of surprise, that difficult questions do arise.
- H

I have not heard full argument from the respondents to the notices of motion, the plaintiffs in the action, on these issues of law, or on the issue of fact which I will mention in a moment. In those circumstances I do not propose to say anything about such preliminary views as I may have formed regarding those issues, whether of law or of fact. The action is one brought by the three plaintiffs, who are minority shareholders in the company, in respect of payments that have been made out of the company's funds and which, for a variety of reasons, the plaintiffs claim were improperly paid, and should be recouped to the company. The action has in fact been before the court already, and was the subject of a decision by Walton J. on 27 January 1986: see Smith v. Croft [1986] 1 W.L.R. 580. By that decision Walton J. discharged some earlier orders that were made by Master Chamberlain. The first of those earlier orders authorised the plaintiffs to bring these proceedings, down to the conclusion of discovery and inspection of documents, on terms that the company should indemnify the plaintiffs against the costs, putting it shortly. The master's later order was ancillary to that earlier one, and authorised the plaintiffs to have periodic taxation, and for a payment to them of the proportion of the costs thereby certified by the taxing master. Those orders were made on the authority of the Court of Appeal's decision in Wallersteiner v. Moir (No. 2) [1975] Q.B. 373.

On 3 July 1986 leave to appeal from Walton J.'s order was granted by a single judge of the Court of Appeal, May L.J., who said:

"I think I had better direct that this appeal [should] not be heard until after the application to strike out,"—which is the application before me—"because if it is struck out then, as I have said, the question does not arise, and this appeal falls naturally by the wayside. To the extent that it is struck out [it] may affect the exercise of the Court of Appeal's discretion if they come to the conclusion that the judge below exercised his discretion wrongly so that they have the opportunity of exercising their own."

It is, therefore, necessary that this application be disposed of, at least unless there is some serious delay for external reasons, before the appeal, which is pending in the Court of Appeal from that decision of Walton J., is heard.

The issues in the action need not be analysed in any detail for the purposes of this application, but it is desirable that I should state briefly what seem to me to be the issues that arise in the application to strike out, assuming of course that it proceeds. There are two issues of law and one of fact. The first issue of law can perhaps be stated in this way. Are actions to recover money paid away ultra vires by a company altogether outside the rule in Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare 461, so that even one shareholder can bring such actions? I interpose to mention that it is not disputed but that actions to restrain threatened ultra vires acts do fall within that category of cases outside the rule in Foss v. Harbottle. But the issue that arises between the parties is how far that state of affairs obtains in relation to past and completed transactions.

The second issue arises if the first is answered in the negative, and it can be stated in this way. Should the views of an independent majority of shareholders, on the question whether the action should proceed, prevail, if all the votes, either controlled or exercised or influenced by those accused of wrongdoing, are excluded from the computation, so that only independent votes are counted? If that question is answered in the affirmative then a question of fact would appear to arise, namely whether the votes of one particular shareholder, Wren Trust Ltd., should be treated as being independent for the purposes of that exercise.

A The procedure which has been sought to be followed by the two defendants who issued notices of motion, is based firmly, and indeed I think exclusively, on what fell from the Court of Appeal in Prudential Assurance Co. Ltd. v. Newman Industries Ltd. (No. 2) [1982] Ch. 204. I do not propose to read the very lengthy headnote in that case, which was also concerned with the rule in Foss v. Harbottle, but which was in B fact concerned with a case where there was quite clearly no voting control. That is different from this case, where equally clearly the defendants in these proceedings do have voting control. Also it was a case where there was no allegation of ultra vires as such, as a principal issue in the action. But the Court of Appeal, after an examination of what the rule in Foss v. Harbottle was about, said, at p. 219:

C “It is commonly said that an exception to the rule in Foss v.
Harbottle arises if the corporation is ‘controlled’ by persons implicated in the fraud complained of, who will not permit the name of the company to be used as plaintiffs in the suit: see Russell
v. Wakefield Waterworks Co. (1875) L.R. 20 Eq. 474, 482. But this proposition leaves two questions at large, first, what is meant by D ‘control,’ which embraces a broad spectrum extending from an overall absolute majority of votes at one end, to a majority of votes at the other end, made up of those likely to be cast by the delinquent himself plus those voting with him as a result of influence or apathy. Secondly, what course is to be taken by the court if, as happened in Foss v. Harbottle, in the East Pant Du case (1864) 2 Hem. & M. 254 and in the instant case, but did not happen in E Atwool v. Merryweather (1867) L.R. 5 Eq. 464n, the court is confronted by a motion on the part of the delinquent or by the company, seeking to strike out the action? For at the time of the application the existence of the fraud is unproved. It is at this point that a dilemma emerges. If, upon such an application, the plaintiff can require the court to assume as a fact every allegation in the statement of claim, as in a true demurrer, the plaintiff will frequently F be able to outmanoeuvre the primary purpose of the rule in Foss v.
Harbottle by alleging fraud and ‘control’ by the fraudster. If on the other hand the plaintiff has to prove fraud and ‘control’ before he can establish his title to prosecute his action, then the action may need to be fought to a conclusion before the court can decide whether or not the plaintiff should be permitted to prosecute it. In G the latter case the purpose of the rule in Foss v. Harbottle disappears. Either the fraud has not been proved, so cadit quaestio; or the fraud has been proved and the delinquent is accountable unless there is a valid decision of the board or a valid decision of the company in general meeting, reached without impropriety or unfairness, to condone the fraud.

H “We think that this brief look at the authorities is sufficient for present purposes. For it so happens that this court cannot properly on this appeal decide the scope of the exception to the rule in Foss
v. Harbottle.”

And then the Court of Appeal goes on to explain the reason why that was so, which is special to that case, and put quite briefly it was that the company decided to adopt the action at the end of the day. Passing over those two paragraphs I pick it up at p. 220:

"It was in the light of these considerations that we declined to hear any argument from Mr. Caplan and Mr. Curry on the topic of Foss v. Harbottle. However desirable it might be in the public interest that we should express our conclusions on Vinelott J.'s analysis of the rule in Foss v. Harbottle and what he saw as the exception to it, it was necessary for us to bear in mind that the rule had ceased to be of the slightest relevance to the case. It would have been a grave injustice to all parties to increase the already horrendous costs of this litigation by allowing time for argument on an interesting but irrelevant point. Such consideration of the law as appears in this judgment is, apart from a few submissions made by Mr. Bartlett, merely a reflection of our own thoughts without the benefit of sustained argument.

"In the result it would be improper for us to express any concluded view on the proper scope of the exception or exceptions to the rule in Foss v. Harbottle. We desire, however, to say two things. First, as we have already said, we have no doubt whatever that Vinelott J. erred in dismissing the summons of 10 May 1979. He ought to have determined as a preliminary issue whether the plaintiffs were entitled to sue on behalf of Newman by bringing a derivative action. It cannot have been right to have subjected the company to a 30-day action (as it was then estimated to be) in order to enable him to decide whether the plaintiffs were entitled in law to subject the company to a 30-day action. Such an approach defeats the whole purpose of the rule in Foss v. Harbottle and sanctions the very mischief that the rule is designed to prevent. By the time a derivative action is concluded, the rule in Foss v. Harbottle can have little, if any, role to play. Either the wrong is proved, thereby establishing conclusively the rights of the company; or the wrong is not proved, so cadit quaesio. In the present case a board, of which all the directors save one were disinterested, with the benefit of the Schroder-Harman report, had reached the conclusion before the start of the action that the prosecution of the action was likely to do more harm than good. That might prove a sound or unsound assessment, but it was the commercial assessment of an apparently independent board. Obviously the board would not have expected at that stage to be as well informed about the affairs of the company as it might be after 36 days of evidence in court and an intense examination of some 60 files of documents. But the board clearly doubted whether there were sufficient reasons for supposing that the company would at the end of the day be in a position to count its blessings; and clearly feared, as counsel said, that it might be killed by kindness. Whether in the events which have happened Newman (more exactly the disinterested body of shareholders) will feel that it has all been well worth while, or must lick its wounds and render no thanks to those who have interfered in its affairs, is not a question which we can answer. But we think it is within the bounds of possibility that if the preliminary issue had been argued, a judge might have reached the considered view that the prosecution of this great action should be left to the decision of the board or of a specially convened meeting of the shareholders, albeit less well informed than a judge after a 72-day action.

"So much for the summons of 10 May. The second observation which we wish to make is merely a comment on Vinelott J.'s

A decision that there is an exception to the rule in Foss v. Harbottle whenever the justice of the case so requires. We are not convinced that this is a practical test, particularly if it involves a full-dress trial before the test is applied. On the other hand we do not think that the right to bring a derivative action should be decided as a preliminary issue upon the hypothesis that all the allegations in the statement of claim of 'fraud' and 'control' are facts, as they would be on the trial of a preliminary point of law. In our view, whatever may be the properly defined boundaries of the exception to the rule, the plaintiff ought at least to be required before proceeding with his action to establish a prima facie case (i) that the company is entitled to the relief claimed, and (ii) that the action falls within the proper boundaries of the exception to the rule in Foss v. Harbottle. On the latter issue it may well be right for the judge trying the preliminary issue to grant a sufficient adjournment to enable a meeting of shareholders to be convened by the board, so that he can reach a conclusion in the light of the conduct of, and proceedings at, that meeting."

D There is there, of course, a reference to the summons of 10 May, and it appears from the report of the decisions at first instance, the first of the two, by Vinelott J., what the nature of that summons was. In the same case, Prudential Assurance Co. Ltd. v. Newman Industries Ltd. [1981] Ch. 229, 233, one finds:

E "In those circumstances"—that is the circumstances that obtained at the beginning of the proceedings—"the second and third defendants took out a summons asking for an order, under R.S.C., Ord. 33, r. 3, that it be determined as a preliminary issue whether as a matter of law the plaintiff was entitled to maintain the action against them. A similar application was made by T.P.G."

F There is therefore, as it seems to me, no doubt but that Mr. Potts is right in submitting that what was before the Court of Appeal was a summons under R.S.C., Ord. 33. There was in fact no appeal on that summons, but it was that summons that they were concerned with in making the references to preliminary issue so far as those proceedings were concerned.

G Mr. Potts further submitted that the fact that the onus of proof is clearly cast, in that passage which I have read from the Court of Appeal, on the plaintiffs of showing a prima facie case on those two matters indicates that it was a reference to the procedure under R.S.C., Ord. 33, r. 3 rather than that under R.S.C., Ord. 18, r. 19 that the Court of Appeal had in mind. R.S.C., Ord. 18, r. 19 reads:

H "(1) The court may at any stage of the proceedings order to be struck out or amended any pleading or the indorsement of any writ in the action, or anything in any pleading or in the indorsement, on the ground that—(a) it discloses no reasonable cause of action . . . or (b) it is scandalous, frivolous or vexatious; or (c) it may prejudice, embarrass or delay the fair trial of the action; or (d) it is otherwise an abuse of the process of the court; and may order the action to be stayed or dismissed or judgment to be entered accordingly, as the case may be. (2) No evidence shall be admissible on an application under paragraph (1)(a)." That is, that it discloses no reasonable cause of action or defence as the case may be.

The whole of R.S.C., Ord. 33 is preceded by the heading "Place and mode of trial" and rule 3, under a heading "Time, etc. of trial of questions or issues," provides:

"The court may order any question or issue arising in a cause or matter, whether of fact or law or partly of fact and partly of law, and whether raised by the pleadings or otherwise, to be tried before, at or after the trial of the cause or matter, and may give directions as to the manner in which the question or issue shall be stated."

Mr. Aldous and Mr. Oliver have submitted to me that the proper procedure in such a case as this, where minority shareholders are seeking to bring an action to recover for the benefit of the company in which they are shareholders sums paid away and the defendants wish to challenge that on the basis that the rule in Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare 461 prevents such a proceeding, is for there to be an application by way of striking out, mainly on the ground that this is the appropriate relief in relation to a challenge to the locus standi of a plaintiff, and that it is the inevitable result if the application succeeds. Secondly they submit that the Court of Appeal has given clearly considered views of the procedure, which they submitted were not intended to refer to Ord. 33, r. 3. In reliance on that, they pointed to the reference to striking out in a passage which I have in fact read in Prudential Assurance Co. Ltd. v. Newman Industries Ltd. (No. 2) [1982] Ch. 204, 219, the actual sentence being:

"Secondly, what course is to be taken by the court if, as happened in Foss v. Harbottle, in the East Pant Du case, 2 Hem. & M., 254 and in the instant case, but did not happen in Atwood v. Merryweather, L.R. 5 Eq. 464n the court is confronted by a motion on the part of the delinquent or by the company, seeking to strike out the action?"

And at that point they submitted that the Court of Appeal was clearly contemplating what must at its lowest be a possible form of procedure. Equally they pointed to an earlier passage which I have not read but which is quite short, which shows the sort of procedure that the Court of Appeal contemplated, at p. 212:

"The assertion by Newman's counsel that the independent board 'was powerless to prevent the Prudential from pursuing the action' may have been based on the supposition that the plaintiffs had on the facts alleged in the statement of claim a personal cause of action for damages against Mr. Bartlett and Mr. Laughton independently of Newman's cause of action for damages. This supposition, if it existed, was erroneous for reasons which we explain later. It would have been open to Newman to have issued its own summons before the trial in order to test the right of the Prudential to pursue a derivative action, and to have supported it with evidence proving the objectiveness of the board's view and explaining the potential injury to Newman which would be caused by the proceedings."

That, they say, indicates the sort of procedure which the Court of Appeal envisaged as a possibility.

There has been a decision of the House of Lords, in connection with the interrelationship between R.S.C., Ord. 33, r. 3 and R.S.C., Ord. 18,

3 W.L.R.

Smith v. Croft (No. 2) (Ch.D.)

Knox J.

A r. 19. The decision is Williams and Humbert Ltd. v. W. & H. Trade Marks (Jersey) Ltd. [1986] A.C. 368, and there is a passage in the speech of Lord Templeman, at p. 435:

B “In Hubbuck & Sons Ltd. v. Wilkinson [1899] 1 Q.B. 86 Sir Nathaniel Lindley M.R. pointed out the distinction between Ord. 18, r. 19 (then Ord. xxv, r. 4), which dealt with striking out and

C Ord. 33, r. 3 (then Ord. xxv, r. 2), which enables a point of law to be set down and argued as a preliminary issue. He said, at p. 91: ‘Two courses are open to a defendant who wishes to raise the question whether, assuming a statement of claim to be proved, it entitles the plaintiff to relief. One method is to raise the question of law as directed by Ord. xxv, r. 2; the other is to apply to strike out the statement of claim under Ord. xxv, r. 4. The first method is

D appropriate to cases requiring argument and careful consideration. The second and more summary procedure is only appropriate to cases which are plain and obvious, so that any master or judge can say at once that the statement of claim as it stands is insufficient, even if proved, to entitle the plaintiff to what he asks.’ The observations of Lindley M.R. directed to striking out a statement of claim apply equally to applications to strike out a defence or part of a defence. There has been recently a difference of judicial approach to the construction of Ord. 18, r. 19. In McKay v. Essex Area Health Authority [1982] Q.B. 1166, the majority of the Court of Appeal (Stephenson and Ackner L.JJ.) cited with approval the observations of Sir Gordon Willmer in Drummond-Jackson v. British Medical Association [1970] 1 W.L.R. 688, 700 where he said:

E ‘The question whether a point is plain and obvious does not depend upon the length of time it takes to argue. Rather the question is whether, when the point has been argued, it has become plain and obvious that there can be but one result.’ On the other hand, Griffiths L.J. dissented on the point in McKay v. Essex Area Health Authority [1982] Q.B. 1166 and said, at p. 1191: ‘If on an application to strike out as disclosing no cause of action a judge realises that he cannot brush aside the argument, and can only decide the question after a prolonged and serious legal argument, he should refuse to embark upon that argument and should dismiss the application unless there is a real benefit to the parties in determining the point at that stage. For example, where striking out the cause of action will put an end to the litigation a judge may well be disposed to embark on a substantial hearing because of the possibility of finally disposing of the action. But even in such a case the judge must be on his guard that the facts as they emerge at the trial may not make it easier to resolve the legal question.’ My Lords, if an application to strike out involves a prolonged and serious argument the judge should, as a general rule, decline to proceed with the argument unless he not only harbours doubts about the soundness of the pleading but, in addition, is satisfied that striking out will obviate the necessity for a trial or will substantially reduce the burden of preparing for trial or the burden of the trial itself. In the present case, the general rule would seem to require a refusal by the judge to embark on the problems of international law involved in the present appeal, leaving those problems to be solved at the trial if they become material. If at the trial the appellants were cleared of any impropriety in their management of the affairs of the Rumasa group, then the problems of international law would not arise. Moreover, even if those problems did arise I do not believe that the length of time, namely seven days, occupied by the judge in deciding to strike out the pleadings would have been added to the time required to decide other issues. But there are special circumstances which, in my view, made it right for the judge to proceed and to make the order which he made. If the appellants' pleadings and particulars had not been struck out, the appellants would have proceeded to demand discovery before trial and to lead evidence at the trial, harassing to the plaintiffs and embarrassing to the court and designed to support the allegations and insinuations of oppression and bad faith on the part of the Spanish authorities which appear in the amended defences and particulars. These allegations are irrelevant to the trade marks action and the banks' action and are inadmissible as a matter of law and comity and were rightly disposed of at the first opportunity."

G

H

In my judgment it appears from what fell from Lord Templeman in that case, that even in the type of case where the issue in the preliminary application is one of the issues in the action, there may be circumstances which overall justify the use of Ord. 18, r. 19 where equally Ord. 33, r. 3 might serve. It depends in my judgment on the particular facts of the particular case.

A further point which was relied upon by Mr. Aldous and Mr. Oliver was that the parties were in this case armed and prepared both with leading counsel and a multitude of books to argue the issues which were clear to them some time before the proceedings came before me, and that it was only at the last moment that an objection to the form of procedure was made. I do not regard that as a determinant factor in any sense since either the point is a good one or it is not, and the lateness with which it was in fact taken does not impinge on that. On the other hand, it is capable of being relevant that the issues were sufficiently defined for the parties to prepare themselves, and that the matter was organised for trial by earlier applications on the notices of motion when the time of trial was estimated without doubts being raised as to the propriety of the procedure.

I am satisfied that the statements which I have read in the Court of Appeal as to the procedure to be adopted in these matters, although plainly obiter as was in fact conceded, should be regarded by me as a guide to be followed as faithfully as possible. In my judgment, as a matter of procedural law, either Ord. 18, r. 19 or Ord. 33, r. 3 is a potentially possible vehicle for such an application as is involved in the present case to decide whether a plaintiff minority shareholder has the necessary locus standi. But for present purposes it is sufficient for my decision to hold, as I do, that the procedure under Ord. 18, r. 19 is not of itself an impossible procedure which leads to an application, made under that rule or under the inherent jurisdiction, to be struck out as being evidently improper. It seems to me that although the Court of Appeal undoubtedly had Order 33 procedure before it in the form of the summons in relation to which they were discussing the propriety of what had happened below, their guidance was intended to be general in relation to minority shareholders' actions, and on that basis I find that the procedure is not inherently defective.

A That leads me to the second of the two issues with which I am faced, and that is the effect of the answer to the problems that are raised not being plain or obvious. Mr. Potts has relied on two separate lines of very well established authority, one on Ord. 18, r. 19, which is summarised conveniently at p. 305 of The Supreme Court Practice 1985 under the rubric "Exercise of powers under this rule," the note being numbered 18/19/3, where the text reads:

B "It is only in plain and obvious cases that recourse should be had to the summary process under this rule . . . The summary procedure under this rule can only be adopted when it can be clearly seen that a claim or answer is on the face of it 'obviously unsustainable' . . . The summary remedy under this rule is only to be implied in plain and obvious cases when the action is one which cannot succeed or is in some way an abuse of the process or the case unarguable . . . It cannot be exercised by a minute and protracted examination of the documents and facts of the case, in order to see whether the plaintiff really has a cause of action . . ."

C

As a typical example of this type of authority he cited, along with other cases, the decision in Wenlock v. Moloney [1965] 1 W.L.R. 1238, where the headnote reads:

D

"By his writ and statement of claim the plaintiff claimed damages against the three defendants for conspiring to oust him from the business of a company. His original statement of claim was a long, inartistic and wandering document to which the defendants refused to plead. He, accordingly, remodelled it and delivered a second statement of claim in which he alleged the conspiracy and set out four stages of the conspiracy at various times between January 1961 and January 1964 as a result of which he alleged, inter alia, that he had been deprived of his shares and interest in the company. The defendants delivered defences denying the allegations made against them in the statement of claim, and sought further and better particulars of the statement of claim which the plaintiff gave. After the pleadings were closed the plaintiff issued a summons for directions in the ordinary way, but before it was heard the defendants applied to the master under R.S.C., Ord. 18, r. 19, alternatively under the inherent jurisdiction of the court, to strike out the pleadings and dismiss the action on the grounds that the pleadings disclosed no reasonable cause of action, were frivolous and vexatious, and an abuse of the process of the court. On the hearing of the applications to strike out, ten affidavits were filed, five by the defendants in support of the applications and five by the plaintiff in opposition thereto. The master read the affidavits, the documents exhibited thereto, and considered the issues of fact raised by the affidavits in a four-day hearing. There was no cross-examination on the affidavits or oral evidence. In his reserved judgment, which occupied 22 pages, the master held that the plaintiff's action was most unlikely to succeed and he, accordingly, struck out the pleadings and the action. The plaintiff appealed to the judge in chambers, who dismissed his appeal.

H

"On appeal to the Court of Appeal, which refused to look at the affidavits:—

"Held, allowing the appeal, that the trial by the master of issues of fact on affidavits to ascertain whether the plaintiff had a case was a usurpation of the functions of the trial judge and was a wholly improper procedure . . . and that since the pleadings on their face disclosed a reasonable cause of action and raised issues of fact which required to be determined on oral evidence by a judge, the action would not be struck out but would proceed to trial.” A

Danckwerts L.J. said, at p. 1243:

“The practice under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 4, and under the inherent jurisdiction of the court was well settled. Under the rule it had to appear on the face of the plaintiff’s pleading that the action could not succeed or was objectionable for some other reason. No evidence could be filed. In the case of the inherent power of the court to prevent abuse of its procedure by frivolous or vexatious proceedings or proceedings which were shown to be an abuse of the process of the court, an affidavit could be filed to show why the action was objectionable. The commonest case was where a plaintiff was seeking to bring an action on a point which had already been decided or was obviously wholly imaginary. An example of that is Willis v. Earl Howe [1893] 2 Ch. 545. But, as the procedure was of a summary nature, the party was not to be deprived of his right to have his case tried by a proper trial, unless the matter was clear.” B C D

And he went on to quote Lord Herschell in Lawrance v. Lord Norreys (1890) 15 App.Cas. 210, 219 where he said:

“It cannot be doubted that the court has an inherent jurisdiction to dismiss an action which is an abuse of the process of the court. It is a jurisdiction which ought to be very sparingly exercised, and only in very exceptional cases.” E

That was one line of authority on which Mr. Potts relied. The other line of authority is concerned with the trial of preliminary issues, but Mr. Potts relied on that as being equally applicable, and in that context I cite again, as an example of the numerous cases that were cited, the decision of Windsor Refrigerator Co. Ltd. v. Branch Nominees Ltd. [1961] Ch. 375. I need not read the headnote, but Lord Evershed M.R. summed up the principle involved at the end of his judgment, saying, at p. 396: F

“For the reasons that I have stated, I conclude that the answer to this case is that on the assumptions of fact which I have indicated—which can be determined only in the action—this instrument would be capable of being a writing as contemplated by the debenture taking effect on the date (28 February) when it was in fact, according to the defendants, passed over to Greenwood after a demand had been made by Inkin with the authority of the debenture holders. I would, therefore, order accordingly, and set aside the judgment of Cross J., though, as I say, I do not express any view upon the matter with which he expressly dealt, namely, whether the document took effect in the circumstances (or was capable of taking effect) as a deed. I repeat what I said at the beginning, that the course which this matter has taken emphasises, as clearly as any case in my experience has emphasised, the extreme unwisdom—save in very exceptional cases—of adopting this procedure of preliminary issues. My experience has taught me (and this case emphasises the teaching) that the shortest cut so attempted inevitably turns out to be the longest way round.” G H

Knox J.

A Harman L.J. said, at p. 396:

"I concur, and find myself doing so with particular heartiness with reference to the last observations my Lord has made. The number of conditions he has found it necessary to use to fence in the expression of this court's opinion shows at once the undesirability of this kind of procedure. It is highly undesirable that the court should be constrained to tie itself in so many knots, and in the end merely say: 'Well, if this was thus, then that was so.' "

That highlights, in a typically trenchant way, the proposition that it is often profoundly unsatisfactory for a court to give a decision as a preliminary matter in an action on an individual issue on various hypothetical bases of fact. The plain objection being that the hypothetical bases may prove not to be bases and illusory, and in those circumstances the decision of the court is so much air.

Both those lines of authority were distinguished by Mr. Aldous and Mr. Oliver on one single basis, and that is that they were without exception concerned with the interlocutory disposal of an issue which was going to form part of the issues in the action, and they submit that that is a piecemeal way of carrying on which is inherently open to the objections both under the inherent jurisdiction and under Ord. 18, r. 19 where there has to be a very obvious case before the issues can in effect be short-circuited, and to the preliminary trial of issues on assumed facts under Ord. 33, r. 3. In the present case they submit we have a fundamentally different situation, namely one where what has to be done is not to decide an issue in the action itself but an issue which the Court of Appeal has described in the way which I have read, namely whether a prima facie case on those two points has in fact been established by the plaintiff, and it is at least possible, and in many cases probable—and they would submit in this case near certain—that the issue there is not one which would occupy the court at the final trial of the action.

They support their submissions by further submissions that it is plain from the passage which I read from Danckwerts L.J.'s decision in the Windsor Refrigerator case [1961] Ch. 375, 396, and indeed from many other passages, that questions of fact can be gone into under Ord. 18, r. 19, and in exceptional cases cross-examination can be permitted on affidavits. In this particular case the principal affidavit on which the defendants rely in relation to the issue of fact which I have mentioned as the third of the potential issues in these applications is one sworn by Mr. Baldock and cross-examination was in fact offered during the course of the hearing on a number of different occasions but never applied for by Mr. Potts, and it would not be in accordance with the practice of this court to direct a cross-examination without an application for it. But my conclusion is that it is the question stated by the Court of Appeal as a preliminary matter that has to be decided, that it is a special form of procedure concerned with giving sensible operation to the rule in Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare 461 and which was concerned with avoiding the Scylla and Charybdis, on the one hand of having a preliminary issue which effectively requires one to try the whole action where the rule serves no useful purpose, and on the other side of the strait, of assuming that everything that the plaintiffs allege is necessarily correct as a matter of fact, which is of course the technique the court adopts when it has what was called a strict demurrer. The Court of Appeal, it seems to me, has laid down a halfway house for this very special type of case, one in which the legal issues in this particular case are sufficiently well defined for the parties to be able to argue them. Further, I am satisfied that they will determine the result of the action completely if answered in one particular way—not if answered in the other way, but that is seldom obtainable.

As regards the factual issue which I have sought to outline, that is to say the independence of Wren Trust Ltd., in my judgment that lies within a sufficiently small compass and is sufficiently independent of what I take to be the issues in the action itself for it to fall outside the lines of authority that Mr. Potts has cited and whose validity inside their scope is unchallenged. I do not propose to analyse the evidence in relation to the independence or otherwise of Wren Trust Ltd., it would be both impracticable and undesirable for me to do so not having had the benefit of submissions from Mr. Potts in relation to the evidence that is at present before the court. I therefore confine my observations exclusively to the question whether the existence of that issue of fact is a fatal obstacle to the adoption of the procedure which has in fact been chosen by the two defendants who have moved these motions before me, and to that extent I am not satisfied that there is any such fatal objection. Although, therefore, I view with mounting apprehension the escalation of authority which seems inevitably attendant on the difficult questions that arise in this case, I have reached the firm conclusion that it would not be right for me to stop these applications at this stage, and I so rule.

*Order accordingly.
Costs reserved.*

The hearing of the motions to strike out was then continued.

Cur. adv. vult.

19 December. KNOX J. read the following judgment. I have before me two notices of motion. The first is on behalf of the ninth defendant for an order pursuant to R.S.C., Ord. 18, r. 19, or under the inherent jurisdiction of the court that this action be struck out as being frivolous or vexatious or an abuse of the process of the court on the grounds that being purportedly brought by the plaintiffs on behalf of the ninth defendant the plaintiffs are in fact not entitled to bring or continue the same. The second is on behalf of the fourth defendant for an order in similar terms, with an alternative ground, “alternatively that [the action] is obviously unsustainable against the fourth defendant.” I have earlier ruled that the procedure thus adopted is not so defective that the application should in any event fail.

In the course of giving that ruling I expressed the view that the task for the court was to seek to follow the guidance given by the Court of Appeal in Prudential Assurance Co. Ltd. v. Newman Industries Ltd. (No. 2) [1982] Ch. 204, 221, where the following passage from the judgment of the court appears:

“In our view, whatever may be the properly defined boundaries of the exception to [the rule in Foss v. Harbottle (1843) 2 Hare 461] the plaintiff ought at least to be required before proceeding with his

- A action to establish a prima facie case (i) that the company is entitled to the relief claimed, and (ii) that the action falls within the proper boundaries of the exception to the rule in Foss v. Harbottle.”

That I now proceed to attempt to assess.

- B Much of the factual background to these proceedings is not in issue and the dispute is far more concerned with the mental element in what was done and the manner in which it was done than with what happened.

- C The present voting position among the single class of ordinary shareholders is as follows. The three plaintiffs, Nora Smith, Lucienne Crane and Lord Rathcavan, are the holders of 13,400, 1,000 and 4,000 shares respectively in the ninth defendant, Film Finances Ltd. (“the company”) out of the issued share capital of 155,100 fully paid shares. Together they therefore hold 18,400 shares which is 11·86 per cent. of the voting rights. The defendants against whom claims are made in the statement of claim are between them the holders of 97,000 shares, i.e. 62·54 per cent. of the voting rights. These defendants fall into three groups. The first, second and third defendants, William Alan Croft, Richard Martin Francis Soames and David Alexander Korda (“the executive directors”), form one group. It is against them primarily that charges are brought. The fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth defendants, Mannergrand Services Ltd. (“Mannergrand”), Cushingham Ltd. (“Cushingham”), Bellwedge Ltd. (“Bellwedge”) and Brindeel Ltd. (“Brindeel”), form the second group. I shall refer to them together as “the associated companies.” They are controlled or closely associated with one or more of the executive directors, Mannergrand with Mr. Croft, Cushingham with Mr. Soames, Bellwedge with Mr. Korda and Brindeel with all three of the executive directors. Finally there is the fourth defendant, Michael Lewis Carr. He is the chairman and a non-executive director of the company. He is a director of Wren Trust Ltd. and nominated by it to the board of the company. That leaves 39,700 shares unaccounted for which fall into the following groups:

- F (i) 4,000 are held by Messel Nominees Ltd., a company whose shares are owned by another company, Defester Ltd., the shares in which are owned by Stephen Richard Hill and Peter Welsford, both of whom have been active in promoting the plaintiffs’ claims. The votes attached to these shares are clearly in the plaintiffs’ camp, bringing up their voting strength to 22,400 or 14·44 per cent. of the whole.

- G (ii) Two other shareholders, Georgian Investments Ltd., who hold 2,000 shares, and Sir Reginald Sheffield, who owns 50 shares, are not under the control of or closely associated with the defendants against whom claims are made and have unequivocally stated their opposition to the further prosecution of this action. They account for 1·32 per cent. of the voting rights.

- H (iii) Film Finances Pension Fund holds 2,950 shares or 1·9 per cent. of the voting rights. It is common ground that it is under the control of Mr. Soames and Mr. Korda and is to be treated for present purposes as on a par with the executive directors so far as voting is concerned.

(iv) Wren Trust Ltd. (“Wren Trust”) holds 30,500 shares, i.e. 19·66 per cent. of the votes in the company. This company is a wholly owned subsidiary of Gresham Trust Plc., which is a member of the Eagle Star Group of companies. Wren Trust is thus owned and controlled by a large outside financial institution. One of the issues canvassed before me has been whether it should be regarded for the purposes of this application as independent or disinterested so far as the question whether or not these proceedings should continue is concerned. The boards of Wren Trust and of Gresham Trust Plc. have both expressed the view that the proceedings should not continue.

(v) Finally there are two holders of 100 shares each who have not committed themselves. This shareholding is so small as not to be of practical significance.

The following conclusions can be drawn from these shareholdings: (1) The executive directors with the associated companies have overall voting control. (2) If one excludes the votes of the executive directors, the associated companies and Film Finances Pension Fund, then the votes of Georgian Investments Ltd., Sir Reginald Sheffield and Wren Trust totalling 32,550 (or almost 20.99 per cent. of the whole) comfortably exceed those of the plaintiffs and the Messel Nominees, totalling 22,400 (14.44 per cent. of the whole) but not so comfortably as to give a 75 per cent. majority of the votes excluding those mentioned above. The majority is in fact about 59.24 per cent. Such a majority can carry an ordinary but not a special resolution. (3) If the votes of Wren Trust are excluded as well as those of the executive directors, the associated companies and Film Finance Pensions Fund, then the plaintiffs and Messel Nominees with 22,400 votes have a very large majority over Georgian Investments Ltd. and Sir Reginald Sheffield, with 2,050 votes. That majority would be one of 91.62 per cent. and sufficient to pass either an ordinary or a special resolution.

The factual background is as follows. It will be appreciated that I am not making findings of fact at the end of an action and I am therefore limiting this account of the facts to that which seems to me necessary to explain the reason for my decision on the questions I have to answer and which appear from the quotation at the outset of this judgment from the Court of Appeal decision in Prudential Assurance Co. Ltd. v. Newman Industries Ltd. (No. 2) [1982] Ch. 204.

The company was incorporated on 24 February 1950 with an initial paid up capital of £7,500. Throughout its history its trade has been the unusual one (it appears its only significant competitors are overseas companies) of guaranteeing the completion of films on time and within budget. It is obvious that this is a specialised business requiring for its successful operation both wide contacts in the film making world and skill and experience in the production of films. It is also a business which requires a very small number of highly skilled personnel. The number of executives has not exceeded ten. It is the absolute antithesis of mass production.

The founder of the business retired in 1959, and Robert Garrett became chairman and managing director. He had for a number of years a joint managing director, Bernard Smith, who died in 1977. The first plaintiff is his widow. Mr. Soames, the second defendant, joined the company as an employee in 1971, became a director in 1975 and managing director in 1977 in place of Bernard Smith and Robert Garrett, who continued as chairman. Mr. Croft, the first defendant, has been a director since well before October 1979. He is a chartered accountant and deals with the financial side of the business such as investments. This is very important more especially as it is from the income from premiums received by the company and invested that its profit is largely derived. In this it resembles many insurance companies

Knox J.

A which suffer underwriting losses but remain profitable because of their invested income. A Mr. Aikin, a solicitor, became an executive director in 1978 but resigned in September 1981 and Mr. Carr, the fourth defendant, was appointed director in October 1979 as the nominee of Wren Trust. Mr. Korda, the third defendant, became an executive director in July 1981. He ceased to be an executive director in January
B 1985 when he became managing director of R.K.O. Film Group International at a very large salary but remained a non-executive director of the company. So from October 1979 until October 1982 Mr. Garrett was chairman, the directors who were executives were Mr. Croft, Mr.
Soames and Mr. Aikin or Mr. Korda, there being a short period in 1981 when both were on the board, and Mr. Carr was a non-executive director.

C At the beginning of 1982 the executive directors only had shares carrying about 20 per cent. of the voting rights and the associated companies had none, but Mr. Aikin who had resigned by September 1981 had 7.5 per cent. of the voting rights. During the course of 1982 the executive directors and the associated companies acquired enough shares to give them, together with Wren Trust, overall voting control.
Those acquisitions include transactions which the plaintiffs seek to D impeach in these proceedings as having been effected by means of financial assistance from the company in breach of section 42 of the Companies Act 1981. Specifically Bellwedge bought 2,400 shares, Mannergrand bought 3,050 shares, as did Cushingam, and Brindeel bought 19,900. Bellwedge's purchase is not challenged in the statement of claim while those of Mannergrand, Cushingam and Brindeel are, but E it was the latter that Mr. Potts, for the plaintiffs, placed in the forefront of his argument on section 42 of the Companies Act 1981.

The purchase of 19,900 shares by Brindeel with money borrowed from the bank, the fact that Brindeel was acquired by the executive directors on or about 11 June 1982 with a view to the purchase of the 19,900 shares, that each of Mannergrand, Cushingam and Bellwedge received £33,000 from the company in early August and lent £28,000 to F Brindeel thereafter, and that these sums were used by Brindeel to discharge its bank indebtedness are all admitted. What is denied is that the payments by the company to those three associated companies constituted financial assistance within section 42(2) of the Companies Act 1981. The defendants contend that these payments were in satisfaction of anticipated liabilities by way of salary or bonus payable to the executive directors and that on that basis there was no reduction of G the net assets of the company for the purposes of section 42(2). I shall return to this later.

By 1982 there had been dissension for some time on the board of the company between Mr. Garrett, the chairman, who had been involved with the company from very early days and who was by then 70 years or so old, and the executive directors who were younger and had adopted a policy of expanding the company's business overseas, a project to which H Mr. Garrett was opposed. Matters came to a head in 1982, when the executive directors had completed their share purchases, which were not revealed in advance to Mr. Garrett, and Mr. Garrett was forced to resign as a director in October 1982 and received a £60,000 ex gratia payment. This caused a good deal of bitterness. One consequence was that Mr. Garrett consulted Mr. Hill to advise him about the executive directors' and Mr. Carr's activities, and Mr. Garrett provided Mr. Hill with a good deal of documentary material from the company's offices. This continued after Mr. Garrett's departure through Mr. Garrett's secretary, a Mrs. Byford, who clearly disapproved of the way Mr. Garrett was forced to resign and who continued, unbeknown to the executive directors for some time to provide Mr. Hill with documentary material from the company's offices. A

Armed with this material Mr. Hill launched a sustained campaign of criticism of the conduct of the affairs of the company by the executive directors, and Mr. Carr in particular, at the amounts drawn out of the company by the executive directors and the associated companies. Here again there is no dispute about the amounts drawn out. I ignore sickness benefits, pension scheme payments and small fixed directors' fees. In other respects payments were made as follows: B

The ex gratia payment of £60,000 mentioned above was also paid to him. Mr. Aikin's payments I need not detail. Finally in relation to Mr. Carr, there were payments of £1,500 made to Gresham Trust Plc. in the years 1980, 1981 and 1982 and £7,595 in 1983 and £5,028 in 1984.

Before the annual general meeting of the company called for 10 December 1982 Mr. Hill's solicitors wrote a letter dated 7 December 1982 to Mr. Carr: G

"Strictly private and confidential. Re: Film Finances Ltd. We are writing to you in your capacity as chairman and nominee of a minority shareholder in the above company. We are instructed by Mr. S. R. Hill, F.C.A., who has been appointed to act as adviser to a number of minority shareholders in the company holding in total over 40 per cent. of the issued share capital, including the executors of Patrick Garrett for whom we also act. H

"We understand that Mr. Hill informed you last week that: (1) The 1982 published accounts of the company are grossly misleading, indicating as they do a profit before tax of over £500,000 whereas compliance with current accounting standards and the usual statutory requirements would result in showing a loss of over £500,000. (2) The amounts proposed in the accounts as directors' remuneration

A are excessive, unreasonable and so out of all proportion as to cause very considerable doubt as to the collective bona fides of the executive directors. (3) There is firm evidence that the managing director of the company earlier this year approached a merchant bank (not your own of course) to seek advice on how to employ the company's funds to enable the executive directors to obtain 100 per cent. control of the company. It would appear that the advice given B was based upon an incomplete explanation of the provisions of sections 42 to 44 of the Companies Act 1981, which sections also impose criminal penalties for failure to comply with their provisions.

"We understand that Mr. Hill did not inform you of this aspect of item (3) above as he would have preferred to have told you this in person and shown to you the evidence. However, Mr. Hill did C inform you that there is evidence that the executive directors have partially adopted this misleading advice in the current year, in that there are accounting irregularities in respect of items passing through the bank pass sheets not entered in the cash book of the company.
(Mr. Hill, of course, only has detailed information up to mid-October when Mr. Garrett retired from chairmanship of the company.) In view of the prima facie evidence of fraud, the D minority shareholders' group requires that further investigations be carried out to enable this evidence to be substantiated or refuted and the available remedies pursued if necessary. It would be preferable that you use your position as chairman of the company to effect this, as the alternatives would be a Department of Industry or fraud squad investigation which could result in very far-reaching consequences including exposure damaging to the company. (4) E There is evidence of other financial irregularities that are not of such pressing importance as points (1) to (3) above and which may be regulated in due course following the full and early investigation that must be carried out into the affairs of the company. . . ."

F At the annual general meeting of the company on 10 December 1982 at which the accounts for the year ending 30 June 1982, approved by the directors on 18 November 1982, were to be laid for approval, there were angry scenes and allegations of accounts incorrect by £1 million. Mr.
Carr adjourned the meeting and forthwith instructed Messrs. Peat, Marwick Mitchell & Co. to investigate and report upon Mr. Hill's complaints. Initial instructions were by telephone but the formal instruction was in a letter from Mr. Soames dated 14 December 1982. It G is addressed to Peat, Marwick Mitchell & Co. for the attention of Tom Allen, Esq. and reads:

"Dear Sirs, I write to confirm the board's instructions to you to carry out an investigation of the affairs of this company in respect of its accounting period to 30 June 1982, the following period and any preceding period or periods you may think necessary in relation H to the allegations set out in points (1) to (4) inclusive of the letter from Wood Nash & Winters dated 7 December 1982 addressed to Michael Carr."—That letter is the one which I have just read.—"In view of the seriousness of the allegations you are requested to commence and complete the investigation as soon as possible and make a full report to the board at the earliest possible date.

"While the board's instructions are to investigate specific points referred to, it is not their intention to prevent or restrict you from extending the investigation where you believe it to be necessary in the cause of establishing the truth or in the event that other irregularities are revealed.

"I confirm that instructions have been given to all the executives and employees of the company and to its solicitors and auditors to co-operate with you to the fullest extent and to give you such information as you may require."

That is signed on behalf of Film Finances Ltd. by Mr. Soames.

Mr. Allen of Peat, Marwick Mitchell & Co. interviewed the company's staff and directors, met Mr. Hill and his helper Mr. Welsford twice, and had access to the company's books. His report ("the report") was produced on 11 March 1983. It contains the following passage, after having set out the circumstances of the investigation being instituted:

"We have decided that it would be appropriate for us to submit a report at this stage, which addresses the matters set out above and summarises our comments in relation to the work we have so far carried out. The directors will then be in a position, having considered this report and received any representations which shareholders think fit to make to them, to consider whether or not we should be asked to pursue any of the matters discussed, or any other matters."

The report is therefore not to be regarded as necessarily definitive. A substantial part of the report was concerned with criticisms made by Mr. Hill and set out in his solicitor's letter of 7 December 1982, which I have read, concerning the accountancy deficiencies in the preparation of the company's accounts. These criticisms were effectively rejected in the report. No claims are made in this action about this and I pass over that part of the report. [His Lordship read part of the report, headed "Directors remuneration and allied matters" and continued:] Then there are set out in tabular form figures for emoluments and payments to connected firms or companies which correspond, so far as the figures are concerned, with the figures in the statement of claim.

Two things appear from the extract of the report quoted above. The first is that it was Mr. Allen's view that the payments to Cushingham in the years ending 30 June 1980, 1981, 1982 of £15,000, £18,500 and £61,000 should have been disclosed as part of Mr. Soames' emoluments because in the circumstances they did fall within the requirements of section 196 of the Companies Act 1948. The inclusion in the note on directors' salaries of the £61,000 for 1982 in the revised 1982 accounts which were presented to and passed by the adjourned annual general meeting on 30 March 1983 and the inclusion therein of the £18,500 for 1981 in the comparative figures in those accounts constitute a major difference between those accounts and the original 1982 accounts which were approved by the directors on 18 November 1982 and laid or intended to be laid before the annual general meeting on 10 December 1982.

The second is that if the only basis upon which the payments to Mannergrand or Billsons and Bellwedge could be justified was that of remuneration for acting as a director or in connection with the management of the affairs of the company the same conclusion as that reached regarding Cushingham would have applied. But Mr. Allen took the view that these payments were for services rendered by the

3 W.L.R.

Knox J.

A organisations to which payments were made and were exempt from disclosure under section 196 of the Companies Act 1948 because the services could have been provided whether or not Mr. Croft and Mr.
Korda had been directors of the company. In relation to Mr. Korda there is a later reference in the report to "the technicality that Mr.
Korda works for Bellwedge Ltd. which provides his services to the company." The amounts involved are not limited to those mentioned for B the year ending 30 June 1982 with which the report was primarily concerned but also so far as Mr. Croft is concerned £13,150 and £42,650 for the years ending 30 June 1981 and 1982.

C The report went on to deal with some matters which I need not discuss because they are not in issue in this action, such as Mr. Carr's consultancy fees paid to Gresham Trust Plc., the taxation treatment of directors' emoluments, the relevance of dividend waivers and continued:

D "Mr. Carr, who became chairman of the company in October 1982, was previously a non-executive director and is now non-executive chairman. Mr. Soames and Mr. Korda are both engaged full time in working for the company (ignoring the technicality that Mr. Korda works for Bellwedge Ltd. which provides his services to the company). Mr. Croft is in practice as a chartered accountant, but spends at least two full days a week at the company's offices and we understand that he is available to the company at all times for such other time as is needed.

E "The company operates in an industry where the risks and rewards are high. The levels of remuneration, and standards of living, enjoyed by prominent people in the industry are often high in relation to those enjoyed by prominent people in many other industries. In their business relationships with companies in the industry, the directors are dealing with prominent people in the companies concerned.

F "It has been indicated to us that the time devoted by Mr.
Garrett to the affairs of the company in recent years was substantially less than full time. However, Mr. Garrett had, in the past, been active in the company's affairs and continued to be identified with the company as a prominent member of the industry.

G "In forming a view as to whether the level of emoluments and charges paid or payable to the directors and/or the connected companies is reasonable, there are no absolute yardsticks and, while members will no doubt want to form their own views they may wish to have regard to our general comments, as set out above.

H "The arrangements for the determination of the levels of remuneration, and the acceptance of charges from connected companies, would appear to have been conducted with very little formality. We understand that the present directors do not have service agreements. Mr. Garrett had a service agreement which was not due to expire until 31 March 1985; this was terminated on his resignation in October 1982. As a consequence of the termination of his service contract, the company made an ex gratia payment of £60,000 to Mr. Garrett and agreed to indemnify him against liabilities arising out of claims or proceedings brought against the company or himself relating to the term of his employment (excluding liability for taxes for which Mr. Garrett might be personally assessable).

"There is some reference in the minutes to agreed salary levels, but a substantial part of the total remuneration has been by way of bonus and, for the most part, it is not possible to point to specific memoranda or minutes of directors' meetings confirming the levels of remuneration and charges from connected companies.

"The view has probably been taken that, because of the very few people involved, the frequent overseas travel which is necessary (making formal meetings difficult to arrange) and the ability of the directors to deal with matters on an informal basis, there is no need for formal confirmation of matters discussed informally between the directors. In any event, it can be argued that the approval of the company's accounts by the directors for submission to members constitutes implicit approval of all the amounts included in the accounts. This is not, however, a company in which all the shares are owned by the directors, nor is it a company in which all the directors have been, or have remained, in agreement with one another. In our view it is most important that there should be a proper record of directors' meetings and confirmation of approval by the directors of their remuneration, amounts payable to companies with which they are connected and other significant matters. We do not think that the lack of formal confirmations affects the validity of the charges accepted by the company but, not least in the directors' own interests, we strongly recommend that in future these matters should be properly recorded."

Mr. Potts attacked the adequacy of the report, regarding payments thus dealt with, principally on the ground that Mr. Allen had failed entirely to address himself to the question of the characterisation of the disputed payments, and had not satisfied himself on the question whether there was or was not a contractual obligation on the company to the several associated companies, and whether the latter ever did actually render any services to the company.

[His Lordship read part of the report dealing with the directors' expenses incurred in travelling and promoting the company, stated that, in relation to the impeached share transactions and the complaints made under section 42 of the Companies Act 1981, the report first of all set out the transfers in question, then stated that the transfers were approved by a directors' meeting of 19 October 1982, that the payments for the three parcels of shares bought by Brindeel were made on 1 and 14 July and 7 September 1982 which was the date when the transfers were lodged for stamping with the Inland Revenue and that the approval of the accounts of the company, for submission to members by the directors, on 18 November 1982, effectively constituted implicit approval of all the items included in the accounts and the necessary formal approval of various charges relating to the directors and connected companies might be said to be implicit in the approval by the directors of the accounts of the company. That part of the report also criticised the lack of formal procedures for the approval of expenditure but concluded that the question of whether the payments made in August 1982 were properly made by the company depended on whether or not the charges from the companies in question were proper charges for the company to accept. His Lordship continued:] The report does not in terms say that the charges made by the associated companies were proper charges. That was in a sense left for shareholders to make up

A their minds about in the light of the general considerations set out in the earlier passage in the report which I have already quoted.

B Here too Mr. Potts criticised the report on the following grounds. The reliance on the accounts for the year ending 30 June 1982 was, he submitted, misplaced, because those accounts, even in the first edition, were not approved by the directors until 18 November 1982 and were therefore not in existence in August 1982 when the three cheques for £33,000 plus V.A.T. were signed in favour of the associated companies. Everything hinged, he submitted, on whether there was at that date an obligation to pay, a question which was assumed rather than decided in the report. So far as the executive directors were concerned the only liability of the company was under such service contracts as existed.

C As to service contracts there is no dispute on the facts. Mr. Soames had a service agreement dated 27 May 1975 which by clause (4) provided for him to receive a fixed salary of £10,000 per annum with such bonuses as the directors might determine with a proviso that in no event should the said salary and bonus payable in any one year exceed £20,000. That agreement has not been terminated. Various resolutions have been passed by the board resolving that clause (4) of the service agreement should be varied by increasing Mr. Soames' salary to figures in excess of £20,000, or that his basic emoluments or salary should be increased to figures in excess of £20,000. With effect from 1 July 1980 the operative figure under the latest such resolution is £50,000. Mr. Korda too had a letter dated 15 April 1981 setting out the terms of his employment as a full-time executive of the company at a salary of £35,000 per annum. So far as Mr. Croft is concerned there was no formal service contract but there have from time to time been board resolutions increasing his salary. The amounts paid to the executive directors and the associated companies in respect of services rendered have at all material times exceeded the amounts provided for by the relevant service agreement or board resolution and the justification for this is claimed to reside in the board's powers under the articles, and if necessary that of the company in general meeting.

F The relevant articles provide as follows. (I take the version exhibited to Mr. Croft's affidavit of 9 January 1986 as more up to date than that exhibited earlier by Mr. Hill. Only the numbering differs; the texts are the same so far as relevant.) Article 10 reads:

G "The first sentence of clause 76 of Part I of Table 'A' shall be deemed to be deleted. Each of the directors shall be paid out of the funds of the company by way of remuneration for his services as a director, at the rate of £150 per annum and the chairman shall also be paid additional remuneration for his services as chairman at the rate of £100 per annum. Such rates of remuneration may be increased by an ordinary resolution of the company."

Article 18 reads:

H "(A) The directors may from time to time appoint one or more of their body to be holder of any executive office, including the office of chairman, deputy chairman, managing or joint managing director or manager, on such terms and for such period as they may determine. . . . (C) A director appointed to any such office as is mentioned in sub-paragraph (A) of this article shall receive in addition to any remuneration to which he is or may become entitled under clause 76 of Part I of Table A hereof such additional remuneration by way of salary, lump sum, commission or participation in profits as the directors may determine, and he or his dependants may receive from the company such pension or other gratuity benefit or retiring allowance as the directors shall think fit.” A

Article 76 of Table A provides:

“The remuneration of the directors shall from time to time be determined by the company in general meeting. Such remuneration shall be deemed to accrue from day to day. The directors may also be paid all travelling, hotel and other expenses properly incurred by them in attending and returning from meetings of the directors or any committee of the directors or general meetings of the company or in connection with the business of the company.” B

I mention in passing that article 80 of Table A is not modified or excluded, and thus the business of the company is to be managed by the directors. C

Purely as a matter of construction it is in my judgment clear that the exclusion of the first sentence in article 76 of Table A contained in article 10 relates only to remuneration for activity as a director and does not operate to exclude the residual power of the company in general meeting to approve remuneration for executive services. Even on that basis, however, the actual right to remuneration, over and above what any relevant service agreement provided in relation to services rendered in the year ending 30 June 1982, would not have arisen, on any view, before the directors' meeting approving the accounts for that year in October 1982, and therefore after August 1982 when the impeached payments to the associated companies were made. So if Mr. Potts is right in his submission that only actual liabilities counted for the purpose of testing the propriety of a payment by a company in relation to section 42 of the Companies Act 1981, a breach of the section would be established at least prima facie. I shall return to this later. D E

Once the report was issued a revised version of the accounts for the year ending 30 June 1982 was prepared, and the annual general meeting, which had been adjourned on 10 December 1982 and once again later, was completed on 30 March 1983. At that meeting those accounts, as thus revised, were approved by a majority of the shareholders, but there is no undisputed evidence of how the majority was made up. There were many criticisms voiced at that meeting, mainly by Mr. Hill. In general terms they were principally directed either at accounting questions concerning the calculation of profits or at the level of remuneration which the executive directors were receiving. There were also criticisms, not only from Mr. Hill, of the payment of £61,000 to Cushingham Ltd. and its treatment in the accounts and in the report. It is not, however, now claimed in the action that any of the matters now complained of, regarding the year ending 30 June 1982, were not, at least in general terms, matters of which the ordinary shareholders were made aware, through the report and the revised accounts for that year. F G H

In the last two years in which there are payments which are impeached (the years ending 30 June 1983 and 1984) Mr. Soames received the whole of the payments made in connection with his services, and nothing was paid to Cushingham. On the other hand apart from the fixed director's fee of £150 and the relatively trivial payments for sickness insurance neither Mr. Croft nor Mr. Korda received salary or

3 W.L.R.

Smith v. Croft (No. 2) (Ch.D.)

Knox J.

A bonus, but Billsons and Mannergrand between them received £65,150 in the first of those years and £85,150 in the second, while Bellwedge received £93,750 and £131,867 in those years respectively. There is no allegation that these sums were not revealed in the company's accounts for those years, and those accounts were passed at an annual general meeting of the company, as regards one year, with one dissentient voice (that of a representative of Messel Nominees) and, as regards the other, without dissent.

B During 1984 the company, in accordance with the relevant provision of the Companies Act 1981, purchased 44,900 issued shares, principally from members of the family of Mr. Garrett, who had died on Christmas Eve 1982, and the executive directors purchased other shareholdings from one or more of the vendors to the company totalling 12,350 shares at the same price of £9 per share. Other minority shareholders were offered the same price but, save for a Mr. Travis who sold 4,000 shares in July 1984 to Mr. Soames and Mr. Korda, again at £9 per share, no further shares changed hands, leaving the voting position as I described it at the outset.

C Over the years while the executive directors have had control of the management of the company the trend both of profits, net assets and dividends have all followed a general upward course. In the year ending 30 June 1977 there was a loss before taxation of £237,257, net current assets of £6,439 and no dividend was declared, while for the year ending 30 June 1984 the accounts show group profit on ordinary activities before taxation of £1,244,185, net current assets of £4,090,518 and a dividend of £1.50 per share was declared. On any view the business has expanded and is very substantial. This has been reflected by the trend in the price paid for shares in the company, which has risen from £3 in early 1982 to £9 in 1984. The plaintiffs' complaint is that the profits should have been larger still, if the executive directors had behaved with the same commercial enthusiasm so far as the company's earnings are concerned, but with greater legal and accountancy propriety and honesty so far as payments out by the company are concerned.

D The writ was issued on 7 February 1985 with the statement of claim endorsed upon it. The claims made in the very lengthy statement of claim can be placed in four categories.

E (1) There are claims of excessive remuneration in the strict sense of excessive payments to the person direct who is alleged to be overpaid. For example, paragraph 32 of the statement of claim avers that Mr. Soames was paid £170,239 in respect of the year ending 30 June 1984 in addition to his fixed £150 under the articles, that these payments purported to be by way of salary and bonus, that it is not admitted that any of these sums were duly paid to him, save in so far as they were authorised by his service agreement, and that at least to the extent to which £170,239 exceeded £93,543 (viz. what Mr. Soames was paid in the year ending 30 June 1982) that was in excess of a commercially fair, reasonable and proper remuneration. The conclusion is drawn that to the extent of not less than £76,696 there was an ultra vires gift by the company, that the executive directors and Mr. Carr, in procuring such payments, did not act in good faith or for the benefit of the company, but with a view to benefiting Mr. Soames, were in breach of their fiduciary duties and guilty of a fraud upon the minority shareholders, that those breaches were dishonest and that the executive directors and Mr. Carr were guilty of a conspiracy in so acting.

(2) The second category of claims made relates to payments made to one or other of the associated companies or Billsons which are claimed also to be in whole or in part payments not authorised by the board or otherwise and constituting an ultra vires gift by the company made otherwise than in good faith or for the benefit of the company but rather with a view to benefiting the executive director concerned and made in dishonest breach of fiduciary duties by way of fraud upon the minority shareholders and the product of conspiracy.

I take as an example a claim to a sum of £55,300 referred to in paragraph 31(iii) of the statement of claim. In relation to that it is pleaded by paragraph 31(i) that in respect of the financial year ending 30 June 1984 the executive directors and Mr. Carr procured the payment out of the company's funds of £85,150 to Mannergrand and/or Billson, that none of those payments was authorised by the company either by virtue of any resolution of its board of directors or otherwise, and that in relation to those payments to the extent of not less than £55,300 they were received by Mannergrand and/or Billson purportedly in respect of services allegedly rendered to the company by Mannergrand and/or Billson during that financial year but that in reality the company received no consideration or benefit of any kind for any of those payments to that extent but they amounted in substance to a gift out of the funds of the company and were ultra vires the company. That figure of £55,300, which is the part of the total of £85,150 paid out to Mannergrand and Billson, and is claimed to be thus vitiated, is arrived at by deducting from the total payments of £85,150 £29,850, which is what Mr. Croft received from the company in respect of the financial year ended 30 June 1983 and with regard to which the plaintiffs, while not admitting that they ever became payable to Mr. Croft except to the extent that a fixed salary was payable to Mr. Croft in accordance with the resolutions of the board, the last of which was for Mr. Croft's existing salary to be increased to £15,000 per annum, nevertheless do not raise a claim of an ultra vires gift or make a claim for repayment to the company. Similar claims are raised in relation to payments made to Bellwedge such as a claim to £86,868 in respect of the financial year ending 30 June 1984, being the excess over £45,000 described as the maximum total sum which Bellwedge was properly entitled to receive in respect of that year in respect of Mr. Korda's employment as a full-time executive of the company.

(3) The third category of claim is that based on infringements of section 42 of the Companies Act 1981, more especially in relation to Brindeel's purchase of 19,900 shares in the company.

(4) The fourth and last category of claim relates to expenses of the executive directors in respect of which it is alleged that the sums in question were not paid in respect of any expenses which the executive director concerned had ever incurred in rendering any services to the company. As regards those payments it is similarly alleged that they were in substance gifts, either to the executive director concerned or other persons, and therefore ultra vires the company and made by the executive directors concerned in fraudulent breach of fiduciary duties which constituted a fraud on the minority shareholders. Here again the issue is not whether the payment was made, for that is conceded, but whether it was a proper expense of the director concerned.

Finally as regards all the claims made the payments which it is sought to impeach were all made out of profits available for distribution. There

Smith v. Croft (No. 2) (Ch.D.)

Knox J.

A is no question raised at any stage of an improper return of capital or potential fraud on creditors.

There have been earlier proceedings in this court in this action. Walton J. on 27 June 1986 discharged orders made the previous year by Master Chamberlain, notably an order made on 28 March 1985 on an ex parte application by the plaintiffs whereby he gave liberty to the plaintiffs to continue the action until the conclusion of discovery and inspection of documents, on terms that the company should pay the plaintiffs' costs on a common fund basis down to that stage of the action and indemnify the plaintiffs against any liability for costs down to that stage. The decision of Walton J. is reported as Smith v. Croft [1986] 1 W.L.R. 580. It is primarily concerned with the costs aspects of the matter with which I am not concerned but Walton J. observed of the application before him, at p. 591:

"This is, of course, not an application to strike out the action on the grounds that it cannot be justified as a minority shareholders' action, but quite clearly the same kind of considerations apply."

Similarly it is my view that there is a very large degree of overlap in the material to be evaluated in the two applications.

D Both parties agreed in submitting to me that I was not in any way bound by Walton J.'s findings or his view of the matter in that decision, but not surprisingly the plaintiffs submitted that Walton J.'s approach was wrong and not one which I should follow, whereas the fourth and ninth defendants invited me to reach similar conclusions to those which he reached and for the same reasons. The situation is not simplified for me by the facts that Walton J. refused leave to appeal, and May L.J. subsequently gave leave to appeal on 3 July 1986, directing that the appeal be not heard until the application to strike out, that is the application before me, was dealt with. It would be wrong for me to liken the Court of Appeal to the deep blue sea and even more wrong for me to liken Walton J. to the devil, but there is very clearly rather more scope than usual for any view I express to be in conflict with more authoritative ones. However, I have come to the conclusion that I should express my own views.

I adopt the same four-fold classification as that which I have used above in setting out the nature of the claims made by the plaintiffs in the statement of claim. I emphasise that, in assessing whether or not the plaintiffs have established a prima facie case that the company is entitled to the relief claimed, I am not deciding anything conclusively. In these circumstances it is undesirable for me to say more than is strictly necessary to give my reasons for the view I have formed. In particular I propose to deal differently with the questions of law which are involved in the determination of the first question which I have to answer, namely whether the plaintiffs have established a prima facie case that the company is entitled to the relief claimed, from those which are involved in the determination of the second question which I have to answer, namely whether the plaintiffs have established a prima facie case that the action falls within the proper boundaries of the exceptions to the rule in Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare 461. The former are bound to arise in the action if it proceeds and are in some cases dependent on findings of fact to be made in the action. The latter are unlikely to arise in the action, and in so far as questions of fact arise they are collateral to the issues in the action. I therefore propose only to give my prima facie view with regard to the former, but to decide the latter, more especially as they were very fully argued by counsel on both sides. A

I return to the four categories of claim.

(1) Payments made to an executive director purportedly by way of remuneration

No arguable ultra vires claim arises here in my view. I take as the fundamental rule in considering the scope of what is properly called ultra vires, by which I mean beyond the capacity of the company as opposed to that of its officers, the following passage in the judgment of Slade L.J. in Rolled Steel Products (Holdings) Ltd. v. British Steel Corporation [1986] Ch. 246, 295: B

“if a particular act . . . is of a category which, on the true construction of the company’s memorandum, is capable of being performed as reasonably incidental to the attainment or pursuit of its objects, it will not be rendered ultra vires the company merely because in a particular instance its directors, in performing the act in its name, are in truth doing so for purposes other than those set out in its memorandum. Subject to any express restrictions on the relevant power which may be contained in the memorandum, the state of mind or knowledge of the persons managing the company’s affairs or of the persons dealing with it is irrelevant in considering questions of corporate capacity.” C D

On that basis, whereas the excessive remuneration of a director may well be an abuse of power where, as here, the power to decide on remuneration is vested in the board, it cannot be ultra vires the company. In re George Newman & Co. [1895] 1 Ch. 674 in my judgment supports that view. E

Secondly, my impression on the evidence as to quantum is that the plaintiffs are more likely to fail than to succeed. In common with Walton J. I find the uncontradicted evidence of the very special field in which the company operates and the very high level of remuneration which obtains in that field very much more impressive than the statistics about general levels of professional remuneration which the plaintiffs adduced. I therefore do not find a prima facie case that the company is entitled to the relief claimed in this category of claim. F

(2) Payments to associated companies or to Billson

The question whether these transactions can properly be claimed to be ultra vires is less clear cut than in relation to payments made to an executive director purportedly by way of remuneration. But my prima facie view is that the question should be answered similarly, that is to say that this is not an ultra vires claim at all. G

On this aspect, the defendants’ case was primarily based on the necessity for a proper characterisation of the payments made to the associated company or Billson. The evidence of invoices having been rendered by the company or firm for “services rendered,” coupled with the absence of proper board resolutions of the company authorising such payments, and the absence of any evidence of a contractual link between the company and the relevant associated company or Billson, showed, it was argued, that there was no legal obligation whatever upon which the impeached payments could be based. In addition they were not shown H

A in the company's accounts as directors' remuneration. Therefore they did not pass the characterisation test and qualify as remuneration, so as to be intra vires the company, whether or not proper as to quantum.
Mr. Potts relied on In re Halt Garage (1964) Ltd. [1982] 3 All E.R.
1016. That was a case where a liquidator of a company compulsorily wound up challenged the validity of payments purportedly by way of B remuneration both to a husband and a wife, a Mr. and Mrs.
Charlesworth. The two of them were at all material times the only shareholders and directors. The impeached drawings were mainly made out of capital as opposed to profits and those in favour of the wife were made when, because of illness, she took no active part at all in the business. Oliver J. said in relation to the payments made to the husband, at pp. 1038, 1039:

C "I accept entirely the submissions of counsel for the liquidator that a gratuitous payment out of the company's capital to a member, qua member, is unlawful and cannot stand, even if authorised by all the shareholders. What I find difficulty in accepting is that, assuming a sum to be genuinely paid to a director-shareholder as remuneration under an express power, it becomes an illegal return of capital to D him, qua member, if it does not satisfy some further test of being paid for the benefit of the company as a corporate entity. If he genuinely receives the money as a reward for his directorship, the question whether the payment is beneficial to the company or not cannot, as I see it, alter the capacity in which he receives it: see, for instance, Cyclists' Touring Club v. Hopkinson [1910] 1 Ch. 179, E 188. . . . What I think counsel's submission comes to is this, that while the company has divisible profits remuneration may be paid on any scale which the shareholders are prepared to sanction within the limits of available profits, but that, as soon as there cease to be divisible profits, it can only lawfully be paid on a scale which the court, applying some objective standard of benefit to the company, F considers to be reasonable. But assuming that the sum is bona fide voted to be paid as remuneration, it seems to me that the amount, whether it be mean or generous, must be a matter of management for the company to determine in accordance with its constitution which expressly authorises payment for directors' services. Shareholders are required to be honest but, as counsel for the respondents suggests, there is no requirement that they must be wise and it is G not for the court to manage the company.

H "Counsel for the liquidator submits, however, that if this is right it leads to the bizarre result that a meeting of stupid or deranged but perfectly honest shareholders can, like Bowen L.J.'s lunatic director, vote to themselves, qua directors, some perfectly outlandish sum by way of remuneration and that in a subsequent winding up the liquidator can do nothing to recover it. It seems to me that the answer to this lies in the objective test which the court necessarily applies. It assumes human beings to be rational and to apply ordinary standards. In the postulated circumstances of a wholly unreasonable payment, that might, no doubt, be prima facie evidence of fraud, but it might also be evidence that what purported to be remuneration was not remuneration at all but a dressed-up gift to a shareholder out of capital, like the 'interest' payment in

[Ridge Securities Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [1964] 1 W.L.R. 479] which bore no relation to the principal sums advanced. A

“This, as it seems to me, is the real question in a case such as the present. I do not think that in circumstances such as those in the instant case the authorities compel the application to the express power of a test of benefit to the company which, certainly construed as Plowman J. held that it should be construed, would be largely meaningless. The real test must, I think, be whether the transaction in question was a genuine exercise of the power. The motive is more important than the label. Those who deal with a limited company do so on the basis that its affairs will be conducted in accordance with its constitution, one of the express incidents of which is that the directors may be paid remuneration. Subject to that, they are entitled to have the capital kept intact. They have to accept the shareholders’ assessment of the scale of that remuneration, but they are entitled to assume that, whether liberal or illiberal, what is paid is genuinely remuneration and that the power is not used as a cloak for making payments out of capital to the shareholders as such.” B C

His conclusion on the facts as regards Mr. Charlesworth was as follows, at p. 1040: D “Turning now to the facts of the instant case, it seems to me that the question which I have to determine is whether, on the evidence before me, I can say that the payments made to Mr. Charlesworth and to Mrs. Charlesworth were genuinely exercises of the company’s power to pay remuneration . . .” E and he concluded that it was, and he said, at p. 1041:

“But I do not think that, in the absence of evidence that the payments made were patently excessive or unreasonable, the court can or should engage on a minute examination of whether it would have been more appropriate or beneficial to the company to fix the remuneration at £X rather than £Y, so long as it is satisfied that it was indeed drawn as remuneration. That is a matter left by the company’s constitution to its members. In my judgment, a general meeting was competent to sanction the payments which he”—that is Mr. Charlesworth—“in fact drew and the claim in misfeasance against Mr. Charlesworth under this head must fail.” F

And he said, in connection with Mrs. Charlesworth, the wife, at p. 1042: G

“But of course what the company’s articles authorise is the fixing of ‘remuneration,’ which I take to mean a reward for services rendered or to be rendered; and, whatever the terms of the resolutions passed and however described in the accounts or the company’s books, the real question seems to me to be whether the payments really were ‘directors’ remuneration’ or whether they were gratuitous distributions to a shareholder out of capital, dressed up as remuneration. H

“I do not think that it can be said that a director of a company cannot be rewarded as such merely because he is not active in the company’s business.”

and the rest of that paragraph was concerned with refuting that proposition. Going on at the foot of the page, he said, at pp. 1042–1043:

3 W.L.R.

Smith v. Croft (No. 2) (Ch.D.)

Knox J.

A "The difficulty that I felt about this at first was that there is, in relation to the misfeasance claim, which is the only claim with B which I am concerned, no allegation of fraud or mala fides in relation to these payments. The liquidator's case has been argued throughout on the footing that they were payments of remuneration but were also payments which could not be sanctioned by a general meeting because it was not for the benefit of the company to C resolve on payments on this scale. For the reasons which I have endeavoured to state, I think that in circumstances such as exist in this case, where payments are made under the authority of a general meeting acting pursuant to an express power, the matter falls to be tested by reference to the genuineness and honesty of the transaction rather than by reference to some abstract standard of D benefit. I do not, however, think that bona fides (in the sense of absence of fraudulent intention) and genuineness are necessarily the same thing. It is not suggested here that there was any intent to defraud, but that cannot be conclusive. As Jessel M.R. remarked in In re National Funds Assurance Co. (1878) 10 Ch.D. 118, 128, to say that something is done bona fide is not the same thing as merely to say that the actor had no intention to commit a fraud. The real question is, were these payments genuinely director's remuneration?
If your intention is to make a gift out of the capital of the company, you do not alter the nature of that by giving it another label and calling it 'remuneration'."

E As a matter of fact he concluded that the payments to Mrs. Charlesworth were not genuine exercises of the power to remunerate at all. He said, at p. 1043:

"I find it really impossible on the facts to hold that the whole of these sums, amounting to £1,500 per annum, drawn during the years 1968-69 and 1969-70, can be treated as genuine director's remuneration in any real sense of the term."

F On the question whether the plaintiffs establish a prima facie case that these payments are ultra vires the company my finding is that they do not. For the reasons already given I state my reasons shortly. First, I am far from convinced that payments at the request of an executive director to an outside entity such as one of the associated companies or Billson is not capable of being a payment in respect of services physically rendered G by the executive director concerned within the meaning of the test quoted above from the judgment of Slade L.J. in Rolled Steel Products (Holdings) Ltd. v. British Steel Corporation [1986] Ch. 246. Secondly, the fact that in some instances part only of a series of payments is attacked as ultra vires by the plaintiffs seems to me to lend strong support to this view. There are formidable difficulties in classifying any transaction as partly ultra vires. The analogy with the curate's egg seems H to me compelling.

Thirdly, In re Halt Garage (1964) Ltd. [1982] 3 All E.R. 1016, was concerned with remuneration out of capital and not with the principle to be found in In re George Newman & Co. [1895] 1 Ch. 674, but in any event it is to be noted that the payments which were found to be ultra vires, those to Mrs. Charlesworth, were all ultra vires, and there could scarcely have been, on Oliver J.'s reasoning, a finding that payments to Mr. Charlesworth were partly ultra vires. Finally, if the payments to the associated companies are found to be shams, as Mr. Potts contends, the reality thus discovered is one of the executive directors drawing remuneration for themselves or at their direction, and although that is perfectly capable of being excessive and improper it is not in itself ultra vires. In short Mr. Potts' argument in my judgment places far too much weight on the label attached to the transaction for characterisation purposes. A

As to quantum the same considerations apply as to the claims about direct remuneration, which I dealt with earlier, but there is no doubt but that the plaintiffs are on stronger ground in criticising the mechanics of what was done. In particular, as regards the payments to Cushingham in the years ending 30 June 1981 and 1982, I find there was a prima facie case shown of irregularity not fully cured by the subsequent adoption of the accounts by the annual general meeting, at which the accounts, which should have disclosed those payments, were adopted. (3) Claims under section 42 of the Companies Act 1981

Section 42 provides:

"(1) Subject to the following provisions of this section and sections 43 and 44 of this Act, where a person is acquiring or is proposing to acquire any shares in a company it shall not be lawful for the company or any of its subsidiaries to give financial assistance directly or indirectly for the purpose of that acquisition before or at the same time as the acquisition takes place. (2) Subject to the following provisions of this section and sections 43 and 44 of this Act, where a person has acquired any shares in a company and any liability has been incurred (by that or any other person) for the purpose of that acquisition it shall not be lawful for the company or any of its subsidiaries to give any financial assistance directly or indirectly for the purpose of reducing or discharging the liability so incurred." D E

It is in relation to the latter subsection that it is claimed that financial assistance was given to Brindeel to the extent of the £28,000 loans made by associated companies to it. Financial assistance is defined by subsection (8): F

"In this section 'financial assistance' means—(a) financial assistance given by way of gift; . . . (d) any other financial assistance given by a company the net assets of which are thereby reduced to a material extent or which has no net assets. In this subsection 'net assets' has the same meaning as it has for the purposes of the 1980 Act." G

The references to the purposes of the Companies Act 1980 is something of a trap for the unwary because it is a reference to the purposes of the Act of 1980 as amended by the Act of 1981. Section 87(4) of the Act of 1980 as originally enacted and so far as relevant read:

"For the purposes of this Act—. . . (c) the net assets of a company are the aggregate of its assets less the aggregate of its liabilities; and in paragraph (c) above 'liabilities' includes any provision (within the meaning of Schedule 8 to the 1948 Act) except to the extent that that provision is taken into account in calculating the value of any asset of the company." H

But paragraph 62(b) of Schedule 3 to the Companies Act 1981 provided for the substitution for the words from "(within the meaning of" to the

A end of section 87(4) the words “for liabilities or charges (within the meaning of paragraph 88 of Schedule 8 to the 1948 Act).” It will come as no surprise that Schedule 8 of the Act of 1948 only acquired a paragraph 88 at all by the operation of the Companies Act 1981, itself (see section 1(2) and Schedule 1), but if one assembles all the pieces of the jigsaw the result is I think as follows:

B “For the purposes of this Act (c) the net assets of a company are the aggregate of its assets less the aggregate of its liabilities and in paragraph (c) above liabilities includes any amount retained as reasonably necessary for the purpose of providing for any liability or loss which is either likely to be incurred or certain to be incurred but uncertain as to amount or as to the date on which it will arise.”

C There was some discussion in argument why this circuitous definition of “liabilities” was adopted in preference to the apparently identical definition of “liabilities” in section 42(11) which only applies for the limited purposes of section 42(7). It appears that the difference between the two subsections (8) and (11) in relation to net assets resides in the different definitions to which they lead as regards “net assets” rather than “liabilities,” but I am not directly concerned with that, there being
D no doubt but that section 42(7), which only applies to public companies, is irrelevant to the company here.

The question which therefore emerges is whether the admitted payments to the associated companies of £33,000 plus V.A.T. thereon were payments of amounts retained as reasonably necessary for the purpose of providing for a liability likely to be incurred, that is to say the remuneration of the relevant executive director. The time at which
E this has to be assessed is early August. That was after the end of the financial year in relation to which it is claimed that the remuneration was paid (viz. that ending 30 June 1982) so that the general financial picture of the result of the previous year’s activities would be available but well before the accounts for that year were drawn up, let alone approved by the directors, an event which in relation to the first edition
F of these accounts did not occur until November 1982. I find that a prima facie case of infringement of section 42 of the Companies Act 1981 is established primarily because it does not seem to me to be shown that these were amounts retained as reasonably necessary for the purpose of providing for the liability likely to be incurred of paying directors’ remuneration. I say no more than that because I am not deciding the point.

G On that footing there is no doubt that the claim is one in respect of an ultra vires transaction, for it is conceded that a transaction in breach of section 42 of the Companies Act 1981 is ultra vires as well as illegal and not capable of ratification.

(4) Claims in relation to directors’ expenses

H I do not consider that there is an ultra vires claim established prima facie here. My reasons are similar to those in relation to direct remuneration, the first category, and as to quantum I regard the report as rebutting a prima facie case in relation to matters arising before the date of the report, for in this instance, unlike the claims under section 42 of the Companies Act 1981, the report does seem to me to state a definite opinion which is based on wide experience and which I am content to adopt for the purposes of a prima facie view. For that limited purpose I would also be prepared to regard the report as a general guide, even as regards expenses incurred after the time covered by the report itself. A

The question now arises, more especially in relation to claims under section 42 of the Companies Act 1981 whether the plaintiffs have established a prima facie case that the action falls within the proper boundaries of the exceptions to the rule in Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare 461. The same question would arise if the view I have expressed regarding the other three categories of claim is wrong. B

In my judgment the arguments addressed to me on this aspect of the case raise two questions of law and one of mixed law and fact before an answer that the action does not fall within the proper boundaries of the exception to the rule in Foss v. Harbottle could be given. The questions of law can be formulated as follows. C

(1) Is a minority shareholder always entitled as of right to bring and prosecute an action for the company to recover money paid away in the course of a transaction which was ultra vires the company or is the prosecution of such an action susceptible of coming within the rule in Foss v. Harbottle so that there can be circumstances in which the court will not allow it to continue. D

(2) If the latter view is the correct one in relation to those categories of claims based on ultra vires transactions, and also in all cases of minority shareholders' actions to recover money for the company in respect of acts which constitute a fraud on the minority, will the court pay regard to the views of the majority of shareholders who are independent of the defendants to the action on the question whether the action should proceed? E

This process of ascertaining the views of the shareholders who are independent of the defendants to the action was described by Mr. Potts as a secondary counting of heads, an expression which did not much commend itself to Mr. Aldous but goes some way towards explaining what is involved. In terms of the present case the question is whether the court should have regard to the views of Wren Trust, Georgian Investments and Sir Reginald Sheffield, who do not want the action to continue, or is it conclusive that the defendants have voting control so that if the plaintiffs show a prima facie case of fraud on the minority they have a right to prosecute to the end an action for the company to recover in respect of the loss it has suffered, regardless of the views of the rest of the minority. Another way of putting the question is to ask whether if a minority has been the victim of a fraud entitling the company in which they are shareholders to financial redress, the majority within that minority can prevent the minority within that minority from prosecuting the action for redress. The usual reason in practice for wanting to abandon such an action is that there is far more to lose financially by prosecuting the right to redress than by abandoning or not pursuing it, and that view will be reinforced in the minds of those who wish to abandon the claim if their opinion is that it is a bad claim anyway. F G H

The third question which arises is whether in this case Wren Trust should be treated as independent, if the views of an independent majority are relevant? That is a question of fact. But it involves a question of law, namely what constitutes independence for this purpose?

Upon the first question of law which arises, in my judgment the solution is to be found by a correct analysis of the rights which the

3 W.L.R.

Smith v. Croft (No. 2) (Ch.D.)

Knox J.

A minority shareholder is seeking to exercise or enforce in relation to the result of an ultra vires transaction. There was no dispute before me but that any individual shareholder, be he in a minority or not, has a personal right to apply to the court to restrain a threatened action which if carried out would be ultra vires. Neither the right to object to such an action nor the shareholder's locus standi to bring proceedings admits of any doubt. The rule in Foss v. Harbottle poses no obstacle, because neither of the two bases for the rule is applicable, that is to say the matter is not, by definition, a mere question of internal management nor is the transaction capable of ratification by or on behalf of the company. I was referred to two general statements of the rule. The first is in Burland v. Earle [1902] A.C. 83, where Lord Davey said, at p. 93:

"It is an elementary principle of the law relating to joint stock companies that the court will not interfere with the internal management of companies acting within their powers, and in fact has no jurisdiction to do so. Again, it is clear law that in order to redress a wrong done to the company or to recover moneys or damages alleged to be due to the company, the action should prima facie be brought by the company itself. These cardinal principles are laid down in the well known cases of Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare 461 and Mozley v. Alston (1847) 1 Ph. 790, and in numerous later cases which it is unnecessary to cite. But an exception is made to the second rule, where the persons against whom the relief is sought themselves hold and control the majority of the shares in the company, and will not permit an action to be brought in the name of the company. In that case the courts allow the shareholders complaining to bring an action in their own names. This, however, is mere matter of procedure in order to give a remedy for a wrong which would otherwise escape redress, and it is obvious that in such an action the plaintiffs cannot have a larger right to relief than the company itself would have if it were plaintiff, and cannot complain of acts which are valid if done with the approval of the majority of the shareholders, or are capable of being confirmed by the majority. The cases in which the minority can maintain such an action are, therefore, confined to those in which the acts complained of are of a fraudulent character or beyond the powers of the company. A familiar example is where the majority are endeavouring directly or indirectly to appropriate to themselves money, property, or advantages which belong to the company, or in which the other shareholders are entitled to participate, as was alleged in the case of Menier v. Hooper's Telegraph Works (1874) L.R. 9 Ch.App. 350. It should be added that no mere informality or irregularity which can be remedied by the majority will entitle the minority to sue, if the act when done regularly would be within the powers of the company and the intention of the majority of the shareholders is clear. This may be illustrated by the judgment of Mellish L.J. in MacDougall v. Gardiner (1875) 1 Ch.D. 13, 25.

"There is yet a third principle which is important for the decision of this case. Unless otherwise provided by the regulations of the company, a shareholder is not debarred from voting or using his voting power to carry a resolution by the circumstance of his having a particular interest in the subject matter of the vote. This is shown by the case before this board of the North-West Transportation Co.

Ltd. v. Beatty (1887) 12 App.Cas. 589. In that case the resolution of a general meeting to purchase a vessel at the vendor's price was held to be valid, notwithstanding that the vendor himself held the majority of the shares in the company, and the resolution was carried by his votes against the minority who complained."

A

The other general statement is in Prudential Assurance Co. Ltd. v. Newman Industries Ltd. (No. 2) [1982] Ch. 204, 210 where a slightly condensed version of a passage from Jenkins L.J.'s judgment in Edwards v. Halliwell [1950] 2 All E.R. 1064, 1066 reads:

B

"The classic definition of the rule in Foss v. Harbottle is stated in the judgment of Jenkins L.J. in Edwards v. Halliwell [1950] 2 All E.R. 1064 as follows. (1) The proper plaintiff in an action in respect of a wrong alleged to be done to a corporation is, prima facie, the corporation. (2) Where the alleged wrong is a transaction which might be made binding on the corporation and on all its members by a simple majority of the members, no individual member of the corporation is allowed to maintain an action in respect of that matter because, if the majority confirms the transaction, cadit quaestio; or, if the majority challenges the transaction, there is no valid reason why the company should not sue. (3) There is no room for the operation of the rule if the alleged wrong is ultra vires the corporation, because the majority of members cannot confirm the transaction. (4) There is also no room for the operation of the rule if the transaction complained of could be validly done or sanctioned only by a special resolution or the like, because a simple majority cannot confirm a transaction which requires the concurrence of a greater majority. (5) There is an exception to the rule where what has been done amounts to fraud and the wrongdoers are themselves in control of the company. In this case the rule is relaxed in favour of the aggrieved minority, who are allowed to bring a minority shareholders' action on behalf of themselves and all others. The reason for this is that, if they were denied that right, their grievance could never reach the court because the wrongdoers themselves, being in control, would not allow the company to sue."

E

F

I was also referred by both sides to two articles by Mr. Wedderburn on "Shareholders' rights and the rule in Foss v. Harbottle" [1957] C.L.J. 194, and [1958] C.L.J. 93, to which I should like to acknowledge my indebtedness.

I should also say at this stage that I have not in this judgment used the expressions "derivative" or "corporate" actions, terms which are often used to describe certain categories of minority shareholders' actions. There seemed to me to be a risk of apparent prejudging of issues by the use of such terminology.

G

The difficulty arises in this case when one considers not the restraint of an illegal or ultra vires transaction but the recovery on behalf of the company of money or property which the company is entitled to claim as the result of the ultra vires transaction. The submissions made to me were as follows: Mr. Aldous, with Mr. Oliver's support, drew a distinction on behalf of the fourth and ninth defendants between those cases, on the one hand, where individual shareholders, despite the rule in Foss v. Harbottle, can bring a personal or representative action to enforce contractual rights that the memorandum and articles be observed,

H

- A such rights not being removable by simple majority votes, and, on the other hand, those cases where what is sought to be done is to bring an action in respect of loss already sustained by a company where the right of action is vested in the company, and an individual shareholder has, it is submitted, no personal right of action at all but can start an action on behalf of the company if, but only if, he can bring himself within one or other of two well established exceptions to the rule in Foss v. Harbottle.
- B These are (1) Where the loss is attributable to an illegal or ultra vires act, and (2) Where the transaction complained of constitutes a fraud on the minority shareholders.

- They further submitted that even where there is a right to start an action to enforce a right of the company because one or other of the exceptions to the rule in Foss v. Harbottle is applicable, a company acting either through an independent board of directors or pursuant to a resolution passed by a majority of independent shareholders can always compromise or waive the cause of action vested in it so long as the decision in question to compromise or waive is taken by the persons concerned bona fide and for reasons genuinely believed to be in the best interests of the company. If such a decision is taken any action started on behalf of the company by a minority shareholder should not be
- C
- D allowed to proceed.

- Mr. Potts, on the other hand, drew a distinction between those cases where the minority shareholder on behalf of the company was seeking to rescind a transaction carried out ultra vires and those where, without seeking to rescind the ultra vires transaction, the minority shareholder was seeking to recover damages or other compensation on behalf of the company. In the former Mr. Potts submitted the minority shareholder was entirely outside the rule in Foss v. Harbottle and had an indefeasible right to bring and prosecute the proceedings. There was, he submitted, no difference in principle between his right to bring such proceedings for rescission and recoupment and his right to restrain a threatened ultra vires transaction: both were personal rights vested in the individual shareholder which it was entirely within his power to bring or not. He
- E
- F also added that in cases where the plaintiffs rely on ultra vires transactions it is not necessary to prove that the defendants have control of the company.

- This latter point I can dispose of at once by accepting it. By itself, it does not advance the matter much. Mr. Potts did not contend that it was never possible for a company validly to abandon, compromise or decide temporarily not to pursue a right of action for damages vested in it as a result of an ultra vires transaction effected on its behalf, but he submitted that the arguments advanced by the defendants involved denying the ultra vires doctrine altogether and that exactly the same wrong was involved in relation to a past ultra vires transaction as in relation to a prospective one, so that if the defendants' arguments based on a company's ability to release its cause of action in respect of a past ultra vires transaction were well founded, the same arguments would
- G
- H apply to a prospective ultra vires transaction, where it is common ground the minority shareholder has a right of action which the company cannot control.

Treating the matter as a question of principle for the moment, when a minority shareholder seeks to enforce a right of the company to claim compensation for a past ultra vires transaction there are two quite separate rights involved. First, there is the minority shareholder's right to bring proceedings at all and secondly, there is the right of recovery which belongs to the company but is permitted to be asserted on its behalf by the minority shareholder. The passage I have quoted from Lord Davey's speech in Burland v. Earle [1902] A.C. 83, 93 makes it clear that the bringing of an action in the name of the company is mere matter of procedure in order to give a remedy for a wrong which would otherwise escape redress. That is an echo of what was said in one of the two cases often cited as the foundation for these doctrines, namely Mozley v. Alston (1847) 1 Ph. 790, 801, where Lord Cottenham L.C. said of a bill alleging that a large majority of the shareholders were of the same opinion as the plaintiffs:

"to allow, under such circumstances, a bill to be filed by some shareholders on behalf of themselves and others, would be to admit a form of pleading which was originally introduced on the ground of necessity alone, to a case in which no such necessity exists."

True it is the Court of Appeal in Prudential Assurance Co. Ltd. v. Newman Industries Ltd. (No. 2) [1982] Ch. 204, 221 said that they were not convinced that it was a practical test to adopt to hold, as Vinelott J. had done at first instance, that there was an exception to the rule in Foss v. Harbottle wherever the justice of the case so requires. But the fact that such a yardstick would or might be unsatisfactory because it does not give a practical guide to the limits of the rule and its exceptions does not detract from the fact that the whole doctrine whereby a minority shareholder is permitted to assert claims on behalf of the company is rooted in a procedural expedient and adopted to prevent a wrong going without redress. Where what is sought is compensation for the company for loss caused by ultra vires transactions the wrong, in my judgment, is a wrong to the company, which has the substantive right to redress. Where the minority shareholder is seeking to prevent an ultra vires transaction or otherwise seeking to enforce his personal substantive rights, the wrong which needs redress is the minority shareholder's wrong.

The peculiar status of the minority shareholder in such actions is also illustrated by the judgments in the Court of Appeal in Towers v. African Tug Co. [1904] 1 Ch. 558, where a company had declared and paid illegally a dividend out of capital and two shareholders who had themselves received their portion of the illegal dividend were held to be disentitled to bring an action on behalf of the company for repayment by the directors. Vaughan Williams L.J. said, at p. 566:

"In that state of things, what ought to be done with this action? There is no doubt that the payment of this interim dividend was an ultra vires payment. I start with the assumption one is bound to make, that if an act is done by a company which is ultra vires, no confirmation by shareholders—not even by every member of the company—can convert that which was ultra vires into something intra vires: it always must be ultra vires. As is pointed out in one or two of the cases, the result of that is that if the company are plaintiffs, no amount of acquiescence or resolutions by the shareholders can form an answer to the action by the company for the reinstatement of things in the position in which they would have been but for the ultra vires act complained of. But, to my mind, it is a different thing where the action is brought by a shareholder on behalf of himself and other shareholders. I am assuming this case to

A be one of those in which the facts have been such that an individual shareholder ought to be able to sue in a representative action for the purpose of preventing acts being done in reference to the company in which the shareholders are interested, and which might damnify the company by reason of those acts being ultra vires. I assume that an action not only to prevent ultra vires acts in the future but also to remedy acts that have been done ultra vires is an B action which can be brought in the form in which this action is brought. But although that is so, my own opinion is that this is a kind of action which has to be brought by a plaintiff personally. It is an action which he cannot bring unless he has an interest; it is an action which a stranger could not bring."

C Stirling L.J. said, at p. 569:

"It is proved beyond all contradiction by documents under the hand of Mr. Towers that he was perfectly well aware of the circumstances in which the dividend was paid. It is true that Mr. Wedlake was not in the same position as Mr. Towers; but I think, having regard to the admissions which he made by not denying the allegation in the counterclaim—that he received his dividend 'with full notice of all D the facts relating thereto'—and to the fact of his having submitted to judgment against himself on that footing, and also having regard to the high probabilities of the case, that, inasmuch as he did not choose to go into the box and deny it, we ought to assume that he, like his partner Mr. Towers, knew the circumstances in which the dividend was declared.

E "Now the action is one by the plaintiffs on behalf of themselves and all other shareholders against the company; originally all the shareholders were not made parties, but the other shareholders were afterwards, at their own request, made defendants, so that now we have here all the shareholders of the company. I think this is a form of action which in certain circumstances may be maintained.
That a shareholder who had received a dividend, without knowing F anything of the illegality of it, might maintain such an action I do not doubt. Whether in some circumstances a shareholder so suing ought not to return what he had received in respect of dividend is another question. Why is it that this form of action is allowed?
Prima facie the proper plaintiff, where it is sought to bring back the property of the company into its own coffers, is the company itself.
G But there are exceptions to that rule; and what is the reason of the exceptions? Sir George Jessel M.R. in the case which has been referred to of Russell v. Wakefield Waterworks Co. (1875) L.R. 20 Eq. 474, 480, says this: 'The exceptions turn very much on the necessity of the case; that is, the necessity for the court doing justice.'"

H Cozens-Hardy L.J. said, at p. 571:

"An action in respect of or arising out of an ultra vires transaction ought properly to be brought by the company; but it has long been well established that there are cases in which such an action may be maintained by a shareholder suing on behalf of himself and all other shareholders against the company as defendants. I will not pause to consider under what particular circumstances such an action may be maintained, but I assume that this is one of those cases in which such an action may be maintained—I mean in point of form. But I think it is equally clear that the action cannot be maintained by a common informer. A plaintiff in an action in this form must be a person who is really interested. When you get that fact clearly established it seems to me impossible to avoid taking the next step—that all personal objections against the individual plaintiff must be gone into and considered before relief can be granted.”

That decision illustrates the dual nature of the rights involved. The minority shareholder's locus standi as someone with a real interest greater than that of a common informer is defeasible by showing a personal disability to sue such as was present in Towers v. African Tug Co. But as Lord Davey said in Burland v. Earle [1902] A.C. 83, 93 the plaintiffs cannot have a larger right to relief than the company itself would have if it were plaintiff. And from that it follows in my judgment that if there is a valid reason why the company should not sue it will equally prevent the minority shareholder from suing on its behalf. He is therefore liable to be defeated on two points, first by any ground preventing him from exercising his procedural remedy, and secondly by any ground preventing the company from exercising its substantive right. Conversely, however, he is able to assert a cause of action which arose before he became a shareholder because it is the company's and not his substantive right that is being enforced: Seaton v. Grant (1867) L.R. 2 Ch.App. 459.

Where ultra vires transactions are involved the number of grounds upon which the company can be debarred from suing is limited. In particular it was not argued that ratification of the ultra vires transaction, by however large a majority of shareholders, could prevent the company from suing. There is, however, a clear difference in principle between ratifying what has been invalidly done in the past and abandoning, compromising or not pursuing rights of action arising out of a past ultra vires transaction, and I see no reason in principle why in appropriate circumstances the latter should not intervene to prevent the prosecution of a suit on behalf of the company in relation to such rights of action.

Conversely I am not persuaded of the validity of the criterion suggested by Mr. Potts for separating actions brought by minority shareholders to recover property for the company into those where it is sought to rescind the relevant ultra vires transaction or otherwise have it set aside, on the one hand, and those where that transaction is not sought to be set aside but damages or other compensation is claimed, on the other hand. The former according to Mr. Potts' argument fall entirely outside the rule in Foss v. Harbottle, while the latter are, he accepts, within its potential ambit. This distinction in my judgment places too much emphasis on the nature of the remedy sought rather than the substantive right and the legal person in whom it is beneficially vested.

So much for the principles which seem to me to apply to the first legal question which falls for determination. Is there any authority which precludes me from giving effect to the view which I have expressed? I was referred to a very large number of authorities and I see no useful purpose in going through them all. There are certain discernible categories.

(1) One category is where articles of association require a particular type of majority such as a special resolution and it has been held that a

- A simple majority incapable of constituting such a majority cannot achieve indirectly what it is forbidden to achieve directly. An example is Baillie v. Oriental Telephone and Electric Co. Ltd. [1915] 1 Ch. 503, 511 where in the course of argument in relation to a submission by counsel that "If the majority wish an action to be brought and it is found that the special resolutions were improperly obtained, then they would be nullified," Swinfen Eady L.J. said: "It might be opposed by a bare majority, with the result that a bare majority might supersede the necessity for a special resolution."

In his judgment he said, at p. 518:

"It was then contended that the plaintiff is not entitled to sue. The plaintiff's counsel urged that if this as a special resolution was invalidly passed, how is it to be impeached if the plaintiff cannot sue; how can the question of illegality be raised? Suppose he called a meeting and the majority of the shareholders were to say 'We are content with the present position, and we will not raise any question,' can it be said that by a side wind, as it were, not being able to pass a valid special resolution, they could pass an invalid one and then by a bare majority say we will not allow any proceedings to be taken? In my opinion they cannot do that."

That type of case is concerned with preventing the indirect achievement of an unlawful object which raises different considerations from the recovery of compensation for past illegalities.

(2) Another category consists of cases on demurrer, mostly in the middle and last part of the 19th century but including Birch v. Sullivan [1957] 1 W.L.R. 1247, although that case was concerned with misfeasance rather than ultra vires. Cases on demurrer are necessarily concerned with the locus standi of the plaintiff to bring the proceedings in question rather than the question whether a properly constituted action should be allowed to proceed. The cases principally relied on by Mr. Potts in this category included Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare 461 itself, where there were in fact two complaints made by the plaintiffs, one based on improper intra vires acts and the other on ultra vires activities described by Wigram V.-C., at p. 493, as mortgaging in a manner not authorised by the powers of the Act, and of which he said,

"This, being beyond the powers of the corporation, may admit of no confirmation whilst any one dissenting voice is raised against it."

The first complaint is the context for the very famous statement of basic principle which has given the name of the case to the rule which has been applied on innumerable subsequent occasions.

Mr. Potts relied on this decision as supporting his submission that where there is no claim for rescission of an ultra vires transaction a minority shareholder may be debarred from bringing an action on behalf of the company and that Wigram V.-C. did not deal with what his position would have been had such a claim been made. I accept that submission which seems to me substantiated by the passage, 2 Hare 461, 504, 505:

"The case made with regard to these mortgages or incumbrances is, that they were executed in violation of the provisions of the Act. The mortgagees are not defendants to the bill, nor does the bill seek to avoid the security itself, if it could be avoided, on which I give no opinion. The bill prays inquiries with a view to proceedings being taken aliunde to set aside these transactions against the mortgagees. The object of this bill against the defendants is to make them individually and personally responsible to the extent of the injury alleged to have been received by the corporation, from the making of the mortgages. Whatever the case might be, if the object of the suit was to rescind these transactions, and the allegations in the bill showed that justice could not be done to the shareholders without allowing two to sue on behalf of themselves and others, very different considerations arise in a case like the present, in which the consequences only of the alleged illegal acts are sought to be visited personally upon the directors. The money forming the consideration for the mortgages was received, and was expended in, or partly in, the transactions which are the subject of the first ground of complaint. Upon this, one question appears to me to be, whether the company could confirm the former transactions, take the benefit of the money that has been raised, and yet, as against the directors personally, complain of the acts which they have done, by means whereof the company obtains that benefit which I suppose to have been admitted and adopted by such confirmation. I think it would not be open to the company to do this; and my opinion already expressed on the first point is, that the transactions which constitute the first ground of complaint may possibly be beneficial to the company, and may be so regarded by the proprietors, and admit of confirmation. I am of opinion that this question,—the question of confirmation or avoidance,—cannot properly be litigated upon this record, regard being had to the existing state and powers of the corporation, and that therefore that part of the bill which seeks to visit the directors personally with the consequences of the impeached mortgages and charges, the benefit of which the company enjoys, is in the same predicament as that which relates to the other subjects of complaint. Both questions stand on the same ground, and, for the reasons which I stated in considering the former point, these demurrers must be allowed.”

The decision shows quite clearly that similar considerations are capable of applying to an action based on an ultra vires transaction as to a claim based on breach of duty so that the rule in Foss v. Harbottle can apply to the former. It is not in any way conclusive on the nature of the minority shareholder's right to bring proceedings in respect of compensation for an ultra vires transaction.

In Salomons v. Laing (1850) 12 Beav. 377 the side note reads:

“The directors of one incorporated railway company paid over its funds to another railway company, for purposes wholly unauthorised; and the latter received them with knowledge of the breach of trust. Held, on demurrer, that the second company were properly made parties to a suit to bring back the fund; and, secondly, that, in such a case, an individual shareholder in the first company might sue the second company ‘on behalf’ etc., without alleging that the corporation of which he was a member had refused to sue.”

The plaintiff's right to sue the directors and the South Coast Co., the first company referred to, was conceded and the only matters on which issue was joined on demurrer was whether the Portsmouth company, the second company referred to, could properly be joined as defendant and

Knox J.

A whether the plaintiff could sue them direct without proving that he had previously attempted to get the concurrence of the South Coast company to sue, both of which were answered in the affirmative. At its highest the case proves no more than that a minority shareholder has a locus standi to bring an action for recovery of property paid out of a company in an ultra vires transaction and is not obliged to prove that an unsuccessful attempt to get the company to sue has been made. Neither

B of these is disputed.

Bagshaw v. Eastern Union Railway Co. (1849) 7 Hare 114 was another case on demurrer but, contrary to the side note, was concerned not only with a threatened ultra vires application of funds but also with a past misapplication. Here again though, in my judgment, all that was decided was the plaintiff's locus standi to sue in respect of both past and threatened ultra vires activities. Wigram V.-C. said, at p. 129:

C "No majority of the shareholders, however large, could sanction the misapplication of this portion of the capital. A single dissenting voice would frustrate the wishes of the majority. Indeed, in strictness, even unanimity would not make the act lawful. This appears to me to take it out of the case of Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare 461 to which I was referred. That case does not, I apprehend, upon

D this point, go further than this: that if the act, though it be the act of the directors only, be one which a general meeting of the company could sanction, a bill by some of the shareholders, on behalf of themselves and others, to impeach that act, cannot be sustained, because a general meeting of the company might immediately confirm and give validity to the act of which the bill complains."

E

Mr. Potts submitted that the passage showed that the rule in Foss v. Harbottle was not concerned with ultra vires transactions. That, in my judgment, is far too wide a proposition. In Foss v. Harbottle itself, as Mr. Potts rightly pointed out, Wigram V.-C. himself dealt in the same way with claims based both on intra vires but improper transactions and on ultra vires transactions. Certainly Bagshaw's case, 7 Hare 114 is authority for the proposition that a minority shareholder can in appropriate circumstances have a sufficient interest to bring an action for relief with regard to past as well as future apprehended ultra vires transactions. The fact that both past and future acts were involved might well constitute appropriate circumstances.

G Russell v. Wakefield Waterworks Co. (1875) L.R. 20 Eq. 474 was a decision of Sir George Jessel M.R. that was concerned with recovery of some £5,500 claimed by plaintiff minority shareholders to have been paid out ultra vires to the promoters of a competing undertaking to dissuade them from promoting a bill in Parliament in competition with the company's undertaking. In terms the decision allowed a demurrer on the grounds that ultra vires was inadequately pleaded and there was no sufficient allegation that there was a reason preventing the company itself from suing. Jessel M.R. also examined what he described as the exceptions to the rule laid down in Foss v. Harbottle, and said, at p. 480: "the exceptions depend very much on the necessity of the case, that is the necessity for the court doing justice."

H

He identified two such exceptions. One he described, at p. 481, as cases "in which an individual corporator sues the corporation to prevent the corporation either commencing or continuing the doing of something which is beyond the powers of the corporation.” He went on to point out that this may involve the joinder of a non-corporator who is a party to the ultra vires transaction, and that in turn may lead to the action embracing the recovery from that third party of money paid under such an ultra vires agreement. He continued, at pp. 481–482:

“If the detainer or holder of the money or property, that is, the second corporation or other person, is already a party, and a necessary party, to the suit, it would be indeed a lame and halting conclusion if the court were to say it could [not] do justice in a suit so framed by ordering the money to be returned or the property restored.”—It is perfectly clear that the word “not” has dropped out between “could” and “do.” The judgment continues—“It is a necessary incident to the first part of the relief which can be obtained by individual corporators, and will do complete justice on each side, and that has always been the practice of the court. Therefore, in a case so framed there is no objection to a suit by an individual corporator to recover from another corporator, or from any other persons being strangers to this corporation, the money or property so improperly obtained. But that is not the only case. Any other case in which the claims of justice require it is within the exception.”

If anything that decision seems to me to assist the defendants, because in relation to the ultra vires aspect of the matter it emphasises the necessity of flexibility to attain justice rather than the imposition of hard and fast rules.

In my judgment the above cases on demurrer establish that a minority shareholder can, as Mr. Potts argued, have a locus standi to bring an action to recover on behalf of a company property or money transferred or paid in an ultra vires transaction and that it is not a necessary averment that control is vested in individual defendants so as to prevent the company from bringing the proceedings. I am not persuaded that it follows from that that the minority shareholder necessarily has an individual and indefeasible right to prosecute that action on the company’s behalf.

(3) A third category of case which I only mention to dispose of is made up of matters which the court concludes are mere matters of internal management. MacDougall v. Gardiner (1875) 1 Ch.D. 13 is an example. They are of no assistance to the present problem.

(4) A further category are those cases where an individual member either of a company or a trade union has been held to be entitled to restrain illegal activity by the company or association to which he belongs. That in itself is not a subject of dispute. Simpson v. Westminster Palace Hotel Co. (1860) 8 H.L.Cas. 712 is House of Lords authority if it be needed. Of more help, however, are some modern trade union cases. Thus in Edwards v. Halliwell [1950] 2 All E.R. 1064, from which I have already cited the general statement by Jenkins L.J. quoted by the Court of Appeal in Prudential Assurance Co. Ltd. v. Newman Industries Ltd. (No. 2) [1982] Ch. 204 there is what seems to me a revealing contrast in the treatment by Jenkins L.J., at p. 1067, on the one hand, of acts complained of which are wholly ultra vires the company and therefore incapable of confirmation by a majority so that they constitute exceptions to the general ambit of the rule in Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare 461 and, on

3 W.L.R.

Smith v. Croft (No. 2) (Ch.D.)

Knox J.

A the other hand, cases such as Edwards v. Halliwell [1950] 2 All E.R. 1064 itself as to which Jenkins L.J. said, at p. 1067:

B “In my judgment, this is a case of a kind which is not even within the general ambit of the rule. It is not a case where what is complained of is a wrong done to the union, a matter in respect of which the cause of action would primarily and properly belong to the union. It is a case in which certain members of a trade union complain that the union, acting through the delegate meeting and the executive council in breach of the rules by which the union and every member of the union are bound, has invaded the individual rights of the complainant members, who are entitled to maintain themselves in full membership with all the rights and privileges appertaining to that status so long as they pay contributions in accordance with the tables of contributions as they stood before the purported alterations of 1943, unless and until the scale of contributions is validly altered by the prescribed majority obtained on a ballot vote. Those rights, these members claim, have been invaded. The gist of the case is that the personal and individual rights of membership of each of them have been invaded by a purported, but invalid, alteration of the tables of contributions. In those circumstances, it seems to me the rule in Foss v. Harbottle has no application at all, for the individual members who are suing sue, not in the right of the union, but in their own right to protect from invasion their own individual rights as members.”

E The boundary there seems to me very clearly drawn between suits in the right of the union and suits to protect the individual rights of members. The former are capable of coming within the rule in Foss v. Harbottle; the latter are not.

F (5) Another category is to be found where the constitution of a corporation has been sought to be varied in a manner which is ultra vires, e.g. by amalgamation. Clinch v. Financial Corporation (1868) L.R. 5 Eq. 450, affirmed by the Court of Appeal at L.R. 4 Ch.App. 117, is an example of such a case, but the shareholder's right in such a case was described by Lord Cairns L.C., at p. 122, as a right to bring a suit to arrest a contract on the ground that it was in the eye of the court beneficial to all the shareholders to do so. Similarly Wood V.-C., who heard the case at first instance as well as in the Court of Appeal, said that every shareholder is supposed to have a common interest with the plaintiff in varying any arrangement that may have been entered into ultra vires. The fact that even such ultra vires arrangements are capable of being within the ambit of the rule in Foss v. Harbottle is shown very clearly by Gray v. Lewis (1873) L.R. 8 Ch.App. 1035 chosen by the court in Prudential Assurance Co. Ltd. v. Newman Industries Ltd. (No. 2) [1982] Ch. 204, 217–219, as a simple application of the first aspect of the rule in Foss v. Harbottle, viz. that a company is the proper plaintiff to sue for redress for moneys due to it.

H I turn now to a modern case from which I have derived much assistance. This is Taylor v. National Union of Mineworkers (Derbyshire Area) [1985] B.C.L.C. 237. The headnote reads:

“In September 1984 the plaintiffs, who were members of the Derbyshire Area of the National Union of Mineworkers (the Derbyshire union), were successful in obtaining, inter alia, a declaration that a strike called by their union (the Derbyshire union) and the National Union of Mineworkers (N.U.M.) was unlawful. The plaintiffs sought in the present proceedings by way of summary judgment an order restraining the defendants, who were the Derbyshire union and some of its officers, from using the funds of the Derbyshire union for the purpose of a strike called by the N.U.M. and the Derbyshire union, and requiring those defendants who were officers of the Derbyshire union to restore to the union funds which had been used for this purpose.

“Held—Injunction granted: summary judgment on the monetary claim refused. Where a member of a union commenced an action on behalf of the union, the union would be treated as being analogous to a company and the member’s standing to bring the action would be determined on the same principles as those applicable to an action brought by a shareholder on behalf of a company. These principles did not prevent an individual member from maintaining an action on behalf of the union against its officers where it was clear that the officers had made an ultra vires application of the funds which could not be ratified by the members. In such an action by a member of the union against its officers for the ultra vires misapplication of the union’s funds, the court could order the officers responsible to restore the funds as such misapplication would constitute a breach of fiduciary duty. On the facts, it was clear that the Derbyshire union’s funds had been used to support the strike and there was no reasonably arguable case that this payment was authorised by the union’s rules or could be ratified by the members of the union. Accordingly, as a matter of principle, the plaintiffs were entitled to the order which they sought. However, although the making of the payment could not be ratified by the members of the union, the members could resolve to take no action to remedy the wrong done to the union provided that such resolution was made in good faith and for the benefit of the union. As there was evidence to suggest that the members might so resolve, and as the circumstances in this case were otherwise exceptional, the court would not grant summary judgment on the monetary claims.”

Then there is a statement that an injunction to prevent future misapplications was available to them. Vinelott J. said, at p. 241:

“The first question is whether the plaintiffs are in a position to maintain an action against the individual defendants in effect on behalf of the Derbyshire union whose members have not been consulted on the question whether proceedings should be brought against the individual defendants. A great wealth of authority has been cited on this issue. The position, in my view, is not open to serious doubt.”

He then proceeded to review the authorities, and said, at p. 246:

“The principles which emerge are, I think, clear. Foss v. Harbottle applies to a union but does not bar the right of an individual to maintain an action joining the union and its officers as defendants and claiming that a particular application by the officers was ultra vires and an injunction to restrain further application of the funds of the union for the same purposes and requiring the officers to make good the loss to the union. Being ultra vires the misapplication cannot be ratified by any majority of the members.

A “The central issue in this case is whether the payments, amounting to over £1.7 million, were misapplications of the funds of the union within the exception to the rule in Foss v. Harbottle.”

He answered that question, after a review of the authorities and facts, at p. 254:

B “If that is the right conclusion, then it seems to me that it must follow that any payment to a member on unofficial strike whether by way of weekly allowance or by way of intermittent payment or by meeting expenses directly or in any other way with a view to making good the wages lost by the member on unofficial strike must be equally impermissible. So also must payments to pickets be impermissible. . . . I find myself therefore driven to the conclusion, C uncomfortable though it is, that once it is accepted that the payments in question were made, as they admittedly were made, to pickets and otherwise in furtherance of the strike or for the relief of miners on unofficial strike from hardship caused by the stoppage of work and wages, the conclusions that follow inevitably are first that the payments were beyond the powers of the union; second, that D the two officers, the second and third defendants, who made or sanctioned the payments, are liable to reimburse the union; third, that the plaintiffs are entitled to maintain this action; and fourth, that the misapplication of the union’s fund cannot now be ratified by any majority of the members, however large. Should I therefore, make the order which is sought?

E “I have come to the conclusion that I should not. My reasons are shortly as follows. Although the misapplication of the funds of a corporate body (I include for this purpose funds belonging to a union) cannot be ratified by any majority of the members, however large, it is open to a majority of the members, if they think it is right in the interests of the corporate body to do so, to resolve that no action should be taken to remedy the wrong done to the corporate body and such a resolution, if made in good faith and in F what they considered to be for the benefit of the corporate body, will bind the minority. The majority of the members of a trading company, for instance, might properly take the view that the publicity, costs, and the inevitable loss, let us say, of the services of a managing director, who would be the defendant, would outweigh the benefit to the company of successfully prosecuting an action and might properly decide not to pursue it; although, of course, a G contractual release of the right of action, as compared with a decision simply not to institute proceedings, would require to be supported by some consideration.

H “In the instant case there is an impressive body of evidence filed on behalf of the defendants which is designed to establish that the overwhelming majority of members approves the expenditure in question. It must, I think, follow that they would most probably oppose proceedings for the recovery of the moneys misapplied.”

He then went on to deal with three particular reasons advanced by counsel for the plaintiffs against a refusal to give summary judgment. They are particular to the facts of that case and neither the reasons nor the basis for Vinelott J.’s rejection of them is directly material to this case. Vinelott J.’s conclusions were stated, at p. 256:

"In these circumstances I have come to the conclusion that the right course is not to make an order for summary judgment in the hope that the action will come on, if it does come on, after this dispute has been settled, and that the members will be able to work together in the future for their common benefit within the rules of the union. It will be said that this is a case where hard cases make bad law. My reply to that is that it sometimes happens that hard cases make good law, because they compel a radical re-examination of principles which, rigidly applied, would lead to a result which would be felt widely to be unjust. In particular, the boundary between ratifying a misapplication of a union's funds and resolving to take no action to recover funds innocently misapplied may not be easy to draw in the case of a union and this aspect of the case may, I think, merit further consideration when the union is properly represented."

That authority draws the distinction between impossibility of ratification and the possibility of not suing in respect of the consequences of ultra vires transactions very clearly and in my judgment lends strong support to the view in principle which I have expressed. Overall therefore, on the authorities cited to me, I conclude that there is some support for and no absolute bar on that conclusion.

Another consideration which tends in the same direction is that the plaintiffs have applied for, and until Walton J. discharged the master's order obtained, the benefit of an indemnity as to costs in respect of the action. There was never any suggestion that the plaintiffs were enforcing personal rights in respect of the claimed ultra vires transactions as opposed to the rights of the company. On the contrary, the whole basis of the decision on which reliance was placed—Wallersteiner v. Moir (No. 2) [1975] Q.B. 373—was that the minority shareholder was acting for the benefit of the company rather than asserting an individual right.

Reliance was also placed by Mr. Aldous on Viscount of the Royal Courts of Jersey v. Shelton [1986] 1 W.L.R. 985 as supporting the distinction between the impossibility of ratifying an ultra vires transaction and the possibility of a compromise or release of a right of action in respect of such a transaction. I accept Mr. Potts' submission that this authority is concerned with the rather different point how far articles of association can, outside this jurisdiction, which has a statutory prohibition, now contained in section 310 of the Companies Act 1985, confer an immunity from suit on directors who participate in breaches of their fiduciary duty. That is not to say that I regard the distinction drawn by Mr. Aldous as an invalid one.

Mr. Potts further submitted that there were three objections to any reliance on a release, or the equivalent of a release, of the claims against defendants in relation to ultra vires acts. The first was that the right in question was that of the minority shareholder and not of the company, so that neither the board nor the shareholders in general meeting could release it. That I have already dealt with.

Secondly, assuming it to be legally possible, he submitted first that the board had no available power to do so, and that, in the circumstances of the present case, is not in dispute; and secondly, that the company in general meeting could only do so by special resolution. The reason for this was that by article 80 of Table A which applies to the company the management of the business of the company is given to the directors. It

Knox J.

A followed that the shareholders could only pass a valid resolution about the conduct of proceedings, which it is common ground is part of the business of the company, by a resolution capable of altering the articles, i.e. a special resolution. In support he cited the passage in Buckley on the Companies Acts, 14th ed. (1981), vol. 1, p. 989, under the heading "How far members may control directors:"

B "There is no provision in this Act corresponding with section 90 of C the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, which provides that D the exercise by the board of their powers shall be subject to the control of any general meeting specially convened for the purpose. And it appears now to be established that under an article in the present form, whatever effect is to be given to the words 'to such regulations, being not inconsistent with the aforesaid regulations or provisions, as may be prescribed by the company in general meeting', these words do not enable the shareholders, by resolution passed at a general meeting without altering the articles, to give directions to the directors as to how the company's affairs are to be managed, nor to overrule any decision come to by the directors in the conduct of its business, even as regards matters not expressly delegated to the directors by the articles."

Mr. Aldous countered this submission by drawing a distinction between shareholders in general meeting seeking to compel directors to do that which they declined to do and shareholders in general meeting authorising or ratifying a matter which the directors considered to need their authority or ratification. In the former case a special resolution is needed: in the latter an ordinary resolution will suffice. In my judgment that distinction is validly made and is supported by Buckley J.'s decision in Hogg v. Cramphorn Ltd. [1967] Ch. 254. Buckley J. said, at p. 269:

F "Mr. Instone says, no doubt rightly, that the company in general meeting could not by ordinary resolution control the directors in the exercise of the powers under article 10. He goes on to say, with less justification, that what they could not ordain a majority could not ratify. There is, however, a great difference between controlling the directors' exercise of a power vested in them and approving a proposed exercise by the directors of such a power, especially where the proposed exercise of the power is of a kind which might be assailed if it had not the manifest approval of the majority. Had the majority of the company in general meeting approved the issue of the 5,707 shares before it was made, even with the purported special voting rights attached (assuming that such rights could have been so attached conformably with the articles), I do not think that any member could have complained of the issue being made; for in these circumstances, the criticism that the directors were by the issue of the shares attempting to deprive the majority of their constitutional rights would have ceased to have any force. It follows that a majority in a general meeting of the company at which no votes were cast in respect of the 5,707 shares could ratify the issue of those shares. Before setting the allotment and issue of the 5,707 shares aside, therefore, I propose to allow the company an opportunity to decide in general meeting whether it approves or disapproves of the issue of these shares to the trustees."

That passage was cited with approval by Harman L.J. in Bamford v. Bamford [1970] Ch. 212, 240–241. In my judgment it would not be right in a case where the court declines to act on the views of the board as not sufficiently disinterested, to assume that the board was not merely disqualified but also opposed to a decision by the shareholders in general meeting. I see no difference in principle between directors referring a doubtful matter to shareholders in general meeting and the court taking into account the views of shareholders in general meeting where the directors are effectively disqualified from speaking for the company. On this aspect of the matter I accept Mr. Potts' submission that the Court of Appeal in Prudential Assurance Co. Ltd. v. Newman Industries Ltd. (No. 2) [1982] Ch. 204, did not deal at all with the question what sort of resolution would have been needed regarding the non-prosecution of the action.

Mr. Potts' third point was that in any event Wren Trust's views should not be taken into account. I propose to deal with that later.

I turn now to the question whether it is right for the court to have regard to the views of the majority inside a minority which is, I assume for this purpose, in a position to bring an action to recover on behalf of the company in respect of breaches of duty by persons with overall control.

The fourth and ninth defendants claim that it is, the plaintiffs claim that it is not. On their view of the matter all that the court is concerned with, in cases where the exception to the rule in Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare 461 based on frauds on the minority applies, is the single question whether the defendants have control. The issue is highlighted by the conflicting interpretations placed by the parties on what the Court of Appeal said in Prudential Assurance Co. Ltd. v. Newman Industries Ltd. (No. 2) [1982] Ch. 204. Immediately after the formulation, at pp. 221–222, of the two matters which in the Court of Appeal's view a plaintiff ought at least to be required to show before proceeding with a minority shareholder's action there comes the following sentence:

“On the latter issue it may well be right for the judge trying the preliminary issue to grant a sufficient adjournment to enable a meeting of shareholders to be convened by the board, so that he can reach a conclusion in the light of the conduct of, and proceedings at, that meeting.”

Mr. Potts submitted that the purpose of that adjournment was to enable the courts to discern whether the defendants had control. I reject that submission. In my judgment the concern of the Court of Appeal in making that statement was to secure for the benefit of a judge deciding whether to allow a minority shareholder's action on behalf of a company to go forward what was described, at p. 221, as the commercial assessment whether the prosecution of the action was likely to do more harm than good or, as it was put originally by counsel for Newman Industries Ltd., kill the company by kindness. The whole tenor of the Court of Appeal's judgment was directed at securing that a realistic assessment of the practical desirability of the action going forward should be made and should be made by the organ that has the power and ability to take decisions on behalf of the company. Also the question of control pure and simple hardly admitted of any doubt in that particular case.

3 W.L.R.

Smith v. Croft (No. 2) (Ch.D.)

Knox J.

A Mr. Potts submitted, in the alternative, that what the Court of Appeal said was obiter. This I accept, but it was clearly a carefully considered statement contrasting with the express acknowledgment that they had had little argument on the proper boundaries of the exception to the rule in Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare 461 and were therefore not making any definitive statement on that subject, and I propose to follow what I understand to be the true construction of this statement albeit obiter, unless there is other authority binding on me the other way.

B As to that Mr. Potts submitted that no reported authority held that in a case falling within the fraud on a minority exception to the rule in Foss v. Harbottle the court should go beyond seeing whether the wrongdoers are in control and count heads to see what the other shareholders, i.e. those other than the plaintiffs and the wrongdoers, think should be done. I accept that in many reported cases the court has not gone on to the second stage. Mason v. Harris (1879) 11 Ch.D. 97 is one such case, and there are modern examples too, such as Pavlidis v. Jensen [1956] Ch. 565 and Daniels v. Daniels [1978] Ch. 406. But the fact that such an investigation was not conducted is not conclusive that it could not be conducted, more especially in the absence of any argument on this precise point. An investigation for interlocutory purposes of the propriety of the exercise of voting power in connection with the proposed prosecution of a minority shareholder's action was conducted by Sir Robert Megarry V.-C. in Estmanco (Kilner House) Ltd. v. Greater London Council [1982] 1 W.L.R. 2. In that case he permitted the action to proceed, but Mr. Aldous submitted that the careful scrutiny to which the propriety of the shareholders' voting activities was subjected is of itself an indication of the significance that the court in a proper case will attach to it. This I accept.

E Another indication in the same direction is Walton J.'s reaction in the earlier proceedings in Smith v. Croft [1986] 1 W.L.R. 580 already referred to. He said, at p. 591:

F "This is, of course, not an application to strike out the action on the grounds that it cannot be justified as a minority shareholders' action, but quite clearly the same kind of considerations apply. If the majority of the independent shareholders do not wish the action to be continued, clearly the court will not sanction its continuance and certainly not at the expense of the company."

G I accept that this is only by way of obiter for that particular question was not argued at that stage or before Walton J. but it represents the reaction of a judge very experienced in this field. In my judgment the word "control" was deliberately placed in inverted commas by the Court of Appeal in Prudential Assurance Co. Ltd. v. Newman Industries Ltd. (No. 2) [1982] Ch. 204, 219 because it was recognised that voting control by the defendants was not necessarily the sole subject of investigation. Ultimately the question which has to be answered in order to determine whether the rule in Foss v. Harbottle applies to prevent a minority shareholder seeking relief as plaintiff for the benefit of the company is "Is the plaintiff being improperly prevented from bringing these proceedings on behalf of the company?" If it is an expression of the corporate will of the company by an appropriate independent organ that is preventing the plaintiff from prosecuting the action he is not improperly but properly prevented and so the answer to the question is "No." The appropriate independent organ will vary according to the constitution of the company concerned and the identity of the defendants who will in most cases be disqualified from participating by voting in expressing the corporate will.

Finally on this aspect of the matter I remain unconvinced that a just result is achieved by a single minority shareholder having the right to involve a company in an action for recovery of compensation for the company if all the other minority shareholders are for disinterested reasons satisfied that the proceedings will be productive of more harm than good. If Mr. Potts' argument is well founded once control by the defendants is established the views of the rest of the minority as to the advisability of the prosecution of the suit are necessarily irrelevant. I find that hard to square with the concept of a form of pleading originally introduced on the ground of necessity alone in order to prevent a wrong going without redress.

I therefore conclude that it is proper to have regard to the views of independent shareholders. In this case it is common ground that there would be no useful purpose served by adjourning to enable a general meeting to be called. For all practical purposes it is quite clear how the votes would be cast, and that I described at the outset of this judgment. The questions therefore remain "What is the test of independence" and "Does Wren Trust pass it?"

Upon the former Mr. Potts submitted I should apply the test formulated in In re Hellenic & General Trust Ltd. [1976] 1 W.L.R. 123 by analogy. That decision was concerned with a scheme of arrangement and was accepted by Mr. Potts not to be direct authority, but he suggested that the passage in the judgment of Templeman J., at p. 125, provides appropriate guidance. He said:

"The question therefore is whether M.I.T. [Manchester Investment Trust Ltd.], a wholly owned subsidiary of Hambros, formed part of the same class as the other ordinary shareholders. What is an appropriate class must depend upon the circumstances but some general principles are to be found in the authorities. In Sovereign Life Assurance Co. v. Dodd [1892] 2 Q.B. 573, the Court of Appeal held that for the purposes of an arrangement affecting the policyholders of an assurance company the holders of policies which had matured were creditors and were a different class from policyholders whose policies had not matured. Lord Esher M.R. said, at p. 580: 'they must be divided into different classes . . . because the creditors composing the different classes have different interests; and, therefore, if we find a different state of facts existing among different creditors which may differently affect their minds and their judgment, they must be divided into different classes.' Bowen L.J. said, at p. 583: 'It seems plain that we must give such a meaning to the term "class" as will prevent the section being so worked as to result in confiscation and injustice, and that it must be confined to those persons whose rights are not so dissimilar as to make it impossible for them to consult together with a view to their common interest.' Vendors consulting together with a view to their common interest in an offer made by a purchaser would look askance at the presence among them of a wholly owned subsidiary of the purchaser."

Mr. Oliver, on the other hand, took me through a line of authority regarding the efficacy of resolutions passed by or with the help of votes

3 W.L.R.

Smith v. Croft (No. 2) (Ch.D.)

Knox J.

A whose validity was impugned. From Allen v. Gold Reefs of West Africa Ltd. [1900] 1 Ch. 656 onwards there has been applied a test whether the votes in question were exercised bona fide for the benefit of the company as a whole. The generality of the test has led to differences of judicial opinion on the result of applying it to a particular set of facts, notably in that particular case. That is further illustrated by the different results reached on not very dissimilar facts in Brown v. British Abrasive Wheel Co. Ltd. [1919] 1 Ch. 290 and Sidebottom v. Kershaw, Leese & Co. Ltd. [1920] 1 Ch. 154. In my judgment in this case votes should be disregarded if, but only if, the court is satisfied either that the vote or its equivalent is actually cast with a view to supporting the defendants rather than securing benefit to the company, or that the situation of the person whose vote is considered is such that there is a substantial risk of that happening. The court should not substitute its own opinion but can, and in my view should, assess whether the decision making process is vitiated by being or being likely to be directed to an improper purpose.

In general terms I would seek to apply the test applied by the Court of Appeal in Allen v. Gold Reefs of West Africa Ltd. [1900] 1 Ch. 656, but it seems to me possible to formulate a more particular one in the circumstances of this case. The analogy with schemes of arrangement and In re Hellenic & General Trust Ltd. [1976] 1 W.L.R. 123, is a good deal less compelling. Moreover the application of such a test as I have indicated should prevent any risk of the danger that Mr. Potts relied upon of the resolution which prevents proceedings being brought on behalf of the company being itself treated as a fraud on the minority.

D

The question thus arises whether Wren Trust's decision, which is the equivalent of a vote, passes the test or is vitiated by being directed to an improper purpose. The evidence filed by the defendants on this issue consist of two affidavits by Mr. Carr and two by Mr. Baldock, who is the managing director of Gresham Trust Plc. and a director of Wren Trust, its subsidiary. Mr. Baldock deposed in an affidavit sworn on 1 July 1985:

E

"(4) As a director of Gresham Trust and Wren Trust I am involved in making a number of investments in unquoted companies. I can say that, without doubt, the investment in Film Finances has been, both in terms of capital appreciation and income, a very successful investment. For the reasons set out in Mr. Carr's affidavit I am of the opinion that the remuneration which has been paid to Messrs. Soames, Korda and Croft is in all the circumstances reasonable.

F

"(5) The present litigation is a source of some considerable concern to Gresham Trust and Wren Trust in that it jeopardises a valuable investment. My reasons for so stating are that, as a professional investor, I am of the view that Mr. Soames represents the principal asset of the company. The present proceedings, purportedly brought on behalf of the company, are thus a personal attack on the company's principal asset. Whilst Mr. Soames has a substantial equity stake in the company he is not bound to the company by a long term service contract. There is therefore no reason why if Mr. Soames became so disenchanted with the present litigation he could not either set up business on his account in this country or seek alternative employment in the same industry in the United States of America. I have no doubt that in view of the record of the company he would have little difficulty in either obtaining the necessary finance to commence business on his own account or to find alternative employment in the United States of America at the same or a higher salary.

G

“(6) If Mr. Soames were to leave the company the effect upon the investment of all the minority shareholders in the company would in my opinion be catastrophic and, even if it were possible to replace Mr. Soames, then I verily believe that the remuneration which would have to be paid for an appropriate replacement would be at the same level or in excess of that which Mr. Soames is already receiving.

“(7) The statement of claim in these proceedings alleges that the proceedings are brought for the benefit of all shareholders. Wren Trust as a minority shareholder holding some 19.66 per cent. of the issued share capital of the company is of the view: (i) that the remuneration which has been paid to the executive directors is in all the circumstances reasonable; (ii) that the present proceedings are not for the benefit of the minority shareholders; and (iii) that if the present proceedings continue they will put in jeopardy the value of the investment of all the minority shareholders.”

After the independence of Wren Trust had been challenged he swore a further affidavit on 18 March 1986 in which he said:

“(5) Wren Trust Ltd. is not a party to the present proceedings. However, it has been suggested that because the non-executive chairman of Film Finances Ltd., Mr. Carr, is a director of Wren Trust and Gresham Trust, Wren Trust cannot properly be said to be an independent shareholder. In this regard, the board of Gresham Trust and the board of Wren Trust have carefully considered the passage in the judgment of Walton J. . . .

“(6) The directors of Gresham Trust and the directors of Wren Trust have been advised that this Honourable Court would be entitled to disregard the views of Gresham Trust and Wren Trust in assessing whether a majority of the independent shareholders considers that the proceedings are for the benefit of Film Finances Ltd., if they are allowed their consideration of the merits of the present proceedings to be influenced by the fact that Mr. Carr is a defendant in the proceedings.

“(7) The directors of Gresham Trust and the directors of Wren Trust (excluding in each case Mr. Carr) have carefully considered the issues in the present action, the affidavits sworn herein and the judgment of Walton J. For the reasons already set out in my first affidavit . . . and in the affidavit of Mr. Carr . . . they have concluded that the present proceedings are not only of no benefit to Film Finances Ltd. but they put at risk the investment of Gresham Trust and Wren Trust in Film Finances Ltd. Accordingly, the directors of Gresham Trust and the directors of Wren Trust (excluding in each case Mr. Carr) have resolved to support the application by Film Finances Ltd. to strike out the present proceedings, and any application which Mr. Carr may be advised to make to strike out the present proceedings, and I have been authorised to swear this affidavit in support of such applications.”

Then he exhibits minutes of the relevant board meetings. That in relation to Wren Trust recorded that Mr. Scott, a solicitor, reported on

3 W.L.R.

Smith v. Croft (No. 2) (Ch.D.)

Knox J.

A the present state of the proceedings which had been commenced by three minority shareholders in Film Finances Ltd. where Wren Trust Ltd. is a substantial minority shareholder, and then he refers to the application before Walton J. and the possibility of an appeal. There being no questions of a factual nature Mr. Carr then left the meeting, and the minute then said:

B "Mr. Scott explained to the meeting that in considering Film Finances' application to dismiss the proceedings the court would wish to have regard to the views of the independent shareholders.
In considering the merits of the proceedings and whether the board considered that the prosecution of the proceedings was in the best interests of Film Finances Ltd. the board must disregard the fact that one of its number was the defendant in the proceedings. The C directors should only have regard to the effect of the present proceedings upon its investment in Film Finances Ltd. If, for the reasons set out in the affidavits already sworn by Mr. Carr and Mr.
Baldock, the board considered that there were good commercial reasons why the proceedings were not in the best interests of Film Finances Ltd., then it should resolve to support Film Finances'
D application to dismiss the proceedings, and on the basis of Walton J.'s judgment there was no reason why the court should not take note of Wren Trust's view as to the merit of the proceedings."

And then the resolution is recorded.

E An attempt was made on behalf of the plaintiffs to adduce evidence to show that Mr. Baldock as well as Mr. Carr was personally interested but that attempt was not persisted in or relied upon at the hearing before me. I need not therefore take up time dealing with it. But the fact that it was made and that repeated offers to tender Mr. Baldock for cross-examination on this issue of the independence of Wren Trust were not taken up is, in my judgment, some indication of the weakness of the plaintiff's case on that issue.

F Mr. Potts relied on evidence that showed that Wren Trust has been described as an associate of the executive directors. I accept that there is evidence that Wren Trust sided with the executive directors in the board room tussle that resulted in Mr. Garrett's resignation as a director of the company and could properly be described as associates in that context, and that there is evidence that Gresham Trust itself was involved in the share transactions leading up to Mr. Garrett's resignation. I nevertheless G remain firmly of the view that there is no sufficient evidence that in relation to the present question whether these proceedings should continue Wren Trust has reached its conclusion on any grounds other than reasons genuinely thought to advance the company's interests. It is not for me to say whether the decision itself is right or wrong. It is for me to say whether the process by which it was reached can be impugned and I hold that it cannot. Nor do I consider that in the circumstances H there is shown to have been a substantial risk of Wren Trust's vote having been cast in order to support the defendants as opposed to securing the benefit of the company.

That conclusion means that I accede to the fourth and ninth defendants' motions and direct that the statement of claim be struck out.
Before parting with the case I should like to say a further word about the procedure.

Mr. Potts at the end of his long and helpful addresses described the procedure as a shambles. Without going to those lengths I do agree that it had unsatisfactory features not least the length of time taken. The order of speeches did not in the event match the onus of proof and although I doubt whether in the course of his marathon Mr. Potts left any ground uncovered, nevertheless that was another unsatisfactory feature. It may very well be that the Court of Appeal will have an opportunity of elaborating what was said in Prudential Assurance Co. Ltd. v. Newman Industries Ltd. (No. 2) [1982] Ch. 204.

For my part I would say three things. First, I consider there may well be a much stronger case for requiring a prospective plaintiff to have the onus of establishing that his case falls within the exceptions to the rule in Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare 461 or outside it altogether than there is for putting the same onus upon him to show that the company would be likely to succeed if it brought the action. Upon the latter it might well be appropriate to apply the usual test under R.S.C., Ord. 18, r. 19 and the inherent jurisdiction which puts the onus on the defendants to show the case is effectively unarguable.

Secondly, I consider it would be highly desirable for applications in respect of costs under Wallersteiner v. Moir (No. 2) [1975] Q.B. 373 procedure to be made at the same time as the plaintiff establishes whatever it is that he does have to establish. A great deal of expense has been caused in this case by the piecemeal way in which the matter has proceeded.

Thirdly I believe that it would be helpful for there to be specific procedure laid down, whether by way of rules of court or practice direction I know not, for the initiation and prosecution of actions by minority shareholders to recover on behalf of a company.

UDALL v. CAPRI LIGHTING LTD.
(IN LIQUIDATION)1987 Feb. 9, 10, 11;
March 12

Kerr, Neill and Balcombe L.JJ.

B Solicitor—Officer of court—Court's supervisory jurisdiction—Solicitor's undertaking to other side's solicitor to procure security from own clients for moneys due—Undertaking becoming incapable of performance—Clients incapable of providing security—Court's power to order compliance with undertaking—Whether other side entitled to be compensated

C The plaintiff brought an action for payment by the defendant company of money for goods supplied to it by the plaintiff. During the course of the proceedings the defendant's solicitor gave an undertaking to the plaintiff's solicitors that the defendant's directors would provide security for its liabilities towards the plaintiff by creating second charges in the plaintiff's favour on their personal properties. On the plaintiff's application the judge ordered the solicitor to carry out his undertaking. The evidence subsequently adduced showed that the directors were unable to fulfil that commitment and thus the solicitor's undertaking could not be performed.

D On appeal by the solicitor and cross-appeal by the plaintiff:—

E Held, allowing the appeal and cross-appeal, that as the evidence established that the undertaking could not now be performed the court would not order performance because it would not make an order in vain nor, since disobedience of the court's order amounted to contempt of court punishable by imprisonment, would the court make an order knowing that it was incapable of performance and would put the solicitor at risk; but that where the solicitor's conduct was inexcusable and merited reproof, and the failure to implement an undertaking could be regarded as such, the court had the power to make a compensatory order which was of a disciplinary nature; and that, accordingly, the case ought to be remitted to the court below for it to investigate whether the solicitor's acts were such as to justify ordering compensation and whether the plaintiff had suffered any loss for which he should be compensated (post, pp. 471E–G, 472G–H, 473D–F, 474D–E, H, 478E–G, 479E–480A).

The plaintiff, Robert Alan Udall (trading as Udall Sheet Metal and Co.), issued in May 1983 specially indorsed writs claiming payment for goods sold and delivered to the defendant company, Capri Lighting Ltd. Mr. Roe and Mr. Gowing were the defendant's directors. Messrs. Rutter & Rutter were the defendant's solicitors and the partner handling the defendant's matters was Mr. Richard Oxley Whiting. E

On 6 July there were a number of telephone conversations between Mr. Whiting and Mr. Timothy Grant Readman, of Messrs. Readman & Co., the solicitors for the plaintiff. Mr. Readman conveyed to Mr. Whiting that the plaintiff was only prepared to agree to an adjournment to proceedings under R.S.C., Ord. 14, if Mr. Roe and Mr. Gowing were to give second charges on their private residences or on life assurance policies having a surrender value. Subsequently, Mr. Whiting conveyed the agreement of Mr. Roe and Mr. Gowing with the proposal and gave his personal undertaking as a solicitor to procure those charges. F

Subsequently, in both actions judgments were entered in default of defence. The judgments remained unsatisfied and the defendant went into liquidation. The plaintiff issued summonses in both the actions seeking orders that Mr. Whiting should procure the second charges in accordance with his undertaking. After some earlier proceedings the matter came before Sir Neil Lawson who ordered Mr. Whiting to procure within 28 days second charges on the properties of Mr. Roe and Mr. Gowing. The judge disallowed Mr. Whiting's application to adduce evidence that the undertaking had become impossible of performance. G

By a notice of appeal dated 7 January 1986 Mr. Whiting appealed on the grounds that (1) it was not within his power to procure either of the charges; (2)(a) having heard evidence and argument in relation to the questions (i) as to whether or not Mr. Whiting had ever given the H

- A undertaking and (ii) as to what form of order there was jurisdiction in the court to grant in the event of a finding that the undertaking had been given and (b) having ruled (i) that Mr. Whiting had given the undertaking and (ii) that the only form of order which could be made was an order that Mr. Whiting should perform his undertaking, the judge (a) refused to permit Mr. Whiting to adduce such evidence as to the possibility of his being able to comply with the order as was then available and (b) refused to grant Mr. Whiting an adjournment for the purpose of adducing further such evidence.

- C The plaintiff gave a notice of cross-appeal seeking, inter alia, an order requiring Mr. Whiting to pay such damages in lieu of the undertaking as the court deemed necessary. Alternatively, such compensation was sought as was required to make good all losses occasioned by Mr. Whiting's breach of duty to perform the undertaking. The grounds of cross-appeal were that, if the judge ought to have considered on 11 December 1985 the additional issue of whether it was possible for Mr. Whiting to procure either of the second charges, he was empowered and/or entitled to and ought to have then concluded and ordered (a) that the undertaking found to have been given by Mr. Whiting was one which was capable of performance on the date the same was given and accordingly required to be complied with, (b) that the undertaking was not incapable of performance as it was possible for Mr. Whiting to purchase the dwellings in question or dwellings of like value and proffer the charges required and accordingly the undertaking required to be complied with within a reasonable period, (c) that the undertaking was an undertaking given by an officer of the court, had been accepted as such, that it had secured a benefit to Mr. Whiting's clients and accordingly it required to be enforced to ensure honourable conduct by a solicitor and (d) that had Mr. Whiting acted properly and/or honourably by forthwith acknowledging that he had given an undertaking in the terms found the court would have been possessed of sufficient powers to secure the consent of Mr. Whiting's clients to create the charges, alternatively to secure the charges and that accordingly Mr. Whiting should be ordered to compensate the plaintiff for all losses sustained.

Cur. adv. vult.

12 March. The following judgments were handed down.

- H BALCOMBE L.J. This appeal and cross-appeal from an order dated 11 December 1985 made by Sir Neil Lawson (sitting as a judge of the High Court) raise the question of the exercise by the court of its discretionary jurisdiction to control solicitors as its officers.

In May 1983 the plaintiff, Mr. Robert Alan Udall (trading as Udall Sheet Metal & Co.), issued specially indorsed writs against the defendant, Capri Lighting Ltd., of which company a Mr. Roe and a Mr. Gowing were directors. Both writs were in respect of goods sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant; the first writ claimed £20,215, the second £5,509, in each case together with interest. Messrs. Rutter & Rutter, solicitors of Shaftesbury, Dorset, acknowledged service of these writs on behalf of the defendant. The plaintiff then took out summonses under R.S.C., Ord. 14 in both actions, the return date being 7 July 1983 in each case.

On 6 July 1983 a number of telephone conversations took place between Mr. Timothy Grant Readman, the principal of Messrs. Readman & Co., solicitors for the plaintiff, and Mr. Richard Oxley Whiting, a partner in Messrs. Rutter & Rutter. In the course of one of these conversations Mr. Readman said that the plaintiff was only prepared to agree to an adjournment of the Order 14 summonses on the following day if Mr. Roe and Mr. Gowing were prepared to give second charges on their private residences or on life assurance policies having a surrender value. In the course of a subsequent telephone conversation on the same day Mr. Whiting told Mr. Readman that both Mr. Roe and Mr. Gowing were prepared to give second charges on their properties, which were then identified. The judge found that in the course of this conversation Mr. Whiting gave his personal undertaking as a solicitor to procure these charges; the precise form of the undertaking as found being to “procure second charges on the security of the residence of one Gowing, namely 54 Church Street, Tisbury in the county of Wiltshire and (on the residence of) one Rowe [sic] namely The Cottage, Dennis Lane, Ludwell, Shaftesbury in the county of Dorset . . .”

There has been no appeal against this finding by the judge.

The hearing of the Order 14 summonses was adjourned, but on 26 July Messrs. Rutter & Rutter wrote to Messrs. Readman & Co. to say that the defendant would submit to judgment. This evinced a reply from Messrs. Readman & Co. on the following day expressing astonishment and asserting that in the telephone conversation of 6 July Mr. Whiting had given Mr. Readman a specific personal undertaking that Mr. Roe and Mr. Gowing would give second charges on the security of their respective private residences. On 28 July 1983 Messrs. Rutter & Rutter wrote saying that no undertaking had been given by Mr. Whiting. Thus the scene was set for these proceedings.

In due course judgments were entered in default of defence in both actions but these judgments remain unsatisfied. The defendant has since gone into liquidation. So the plaintiff decided to enforce Mr. Whiting's personal undertaking. It is common ground that the plaintiff has a right of action in contract against Mr. Whiting on his undertaking, but it is also common ground that Mr. Whiting could and would plead by way of defence that there is no note or memorandum of the undertaking so as to satisfy section 4 of the Statute of Frauds or section 40 of the Law of Property Act 1925. Whether or not such a defence would succeed is immaterial; the plaintiff realistically took the view that the probability of this defence being raised was a good reason why he should not pursue an action at law and he decided instead to invoke the court's inherent jurisdiction over solicitors.

So the plaintiff issued summonses in the two actions asking for orders that Mr. Whiting should procure the second charges pursuant to his undertaking. Since both summonses raised precisely the same issues, I shall treat them as one application, as they have been treated throughout. After various procedural vicissitudes the matter came before

Udall v. Capri Lighting Ltd. (C.A.)

Balcombe L.J.

- A Judge Dobry Q.C., sitting as a High Court judge in chambers. Mr. Whiting then took the point that this was not a proper case for the invocation of the summary procedure, since it was not a clear case: Geoffrey Silver & Drake v. Baines [1971] 1 Q.B. 396. However, Judge Dobry rejected that contention, although he gave directions for pleadings and discovery and for the deponents to the affidavits to attend for cross-examination. Against that order there was no appeal. So it was that the plaintiff's application came on before Sir Neil Lawson for hearing on 4 and 5 December 1985.
- B

- C Before the judge the principal issue was whether Mr. Whiting gave his personal undertaking and the greater part of the two-day hearing and of the judgment was directed to this issue. Mr. Ross, who appeared for the plaintiff below as he did before us, opened the case on the basis that if the undertaking had been given then it should be enforced by the court, and, relying on United Mining and Finance Corporation Ltd. v. Becher [1910] 2 K.B. 296, he did not need, nor did he seek, then to allege dishonourable or discreditable conduct on the part of Mr. Whiting. Although the practicability of enforcing the undertaking was canvassed in argument before the judge, there was then no evidence that the enforcement of the undertaking, i.e. the procurement of the two second charges, was impossible.
- D

- E Having decided that the undertaking had been given, the judge went on to consider whether it was enforceable by the court in the exercise of its summary jurisdiction over solicitors. On this aspect of the case he considered three points: (1) Was it a clear case? He answered this question in the affirmative. (2) Could the court enforce a solicitor's undertaking to secure a third party to do an act, or execute a document? This question also he answered in the affirmative, in reliance on Ex parte Hughes (1822) 5 B. & Ald. 482 and the Canadian case of In re Solicitors (1916) 11 W.W.R. 529. (3) Was the undertaking one which it was impossible to perform? On this the judge said:

- F "I find it difficult to conceive of a solicitor giving an undertaking which it is impossible to carry out. But there is a point to that effect in . . . Peart v. Bushell (1827) 2 Sim. 38."

After pointing out that Hamilton J. had questioned the authority of the report and refused to follow Peart v. Bushell in United Mining and Finance Corporation Ltd. v. Becher [1910] 2 K.B. 296, the judge continued:

- G "But let it be assumed that that authority is still good support for the proposition that if an undertaking is impossible of performance the court will not enforce it (and, of course, that is a common sense point of view), I have absolutely no evidence at all that this undertaking, when it was given, was not possible to be performed. Nor have I any evidence before me at this stage that it is not possible to perform. It may be unlikely or difficult, but that is not the same thing as impossible. Here the case is to be distinguished from In re A Solicitor [1966] 1 W.L.R. 1604, because there Pennycuik J. refused to enforce an undertaking given by a solicitor to hand over a lease which not only had been lost but had also been forfeited. He questioned the evidence of the solicitor that the lease could not be found, so he obviously had evidence which satisfied him that it was, at the time when he was asked to make the order, impossible of performance. But there is no evidence to that effect here. A
- H

“Finally I come to consider what order to make in the exercise of the jurisdiction. I am quite satisfied that at this stage I have no jurisdiction to make any order other than an order that the undertaking be performed. If it is not performed, then the question will arise as to what should be done about it. In re Solicitors (1916) 11 W.W.R. 529, the Canadian case to which I have referred, seems to me good authority for the proposition that that is all the court can do in the enforcement of a summary jurisdiction. If one looks at The Supreme Court Practice 1985, vol. 2, p. 1026, notes, there is no case in which it has been suggested that the court can, in the exercise of this jurisdiction, do anything other than to order the solicitor to do that which he undertook. Therefore that is the order I make.” B C

The judgment was a reserved judgment, delivered some six days after the end of the hearing. and after it had been delivered Mr. Munby, for Mr. Whiting, applied for an adjournment to enable him to adduce evidence that it was impossible to perform the undertaking. This the judge refused. Accordingly an order was drawn up requiring Mr. Whiting within 28 days to procure second charges on the security of 54, Church Street, Tisbury and The Cottage, Dennis Lane, Ludwell, Shaftesbury, ordering him to pay the plaintiff's costs and refusing a stay of execution. D

From that order Mr. Whiting has appealed. By his notice of appeal dated 7 January 1986 he asks that the order be set aside or alternatively be varied by requiring him only to use his best endeavours to procure the charges. The grounds of the appeal are (1) the impossibility of performing the undertaking, and (2) the judge's refusal to allow evidence of impossibility to be adduced after judgment. E

The appeal first came before this court on 16 April 1986. At that stage there was still no evidence properly before the court as to the impossibility of performing the undertaking, so the appeal was stood over. Mr. Whiting was given leave to file evidence and the plaintiff was given leave to file evidence in reply; he was also given leave to file a respondent's notice by way of cross-appeal. F

Pursuant to that leave, both Mr. Whiting and Mr. Readman have filed evidence. I do not propose to refer to that evidence in detail, as it is of inordinate volume, but I am satisfied that it is now, and was in December 1985, impossible for Mr. Whiting to perform his undertaking. I can summarise the relevant facts quite shortly. G

No. 54 Church Street, Tisbury. The legal estate to this property was vested in Mr. Gowing and his wife. The property was subject to a first mortgage in favour of a building society, and to a second charge, dated 10 September 1979, in favour of a bank. Mr. Gowing was adjudicated bankrupt on 5 October 1984 and he is now in Australia. The property was sold in September 1984 for some £50,000 of which the greater part went to the building society and the bank (as first and second mortgagees), some £8,300 to the official receiver acting in Mr. Gowing's bankruptcy, and a similar sum to a bank in respect of Mrs. Gowing's share in the property pursuant to a guarantee she had given. There was no surplus, and a considerable deficiency still remains in Mr. Gowing's bankruptcy. H

A The Cottage, Dennis Lane, Ludwell. The legal estate to this property was vested in Mr. Roe alone, although it is possible that his wife had a beneficial interest. The property was subject to a first mortgage in favour of a building society and to a second charge, dated 29 September 1978, in favour of a bank. In December 1985, Mr. Roe was in hospital suffering from a terminal illness; he died on 24 February 1986. After the hearing at first instance Mr. Whiting asked Mr. Roe to execute a charge on the property, but he died without having done so.

B The plaintiff also served a notice of cross-appeal asking that the order of 11 December 1985 be varied in a number of respects, of which the only one now material is (3):

C “So as to require [Mr. Whiting] to pay damages in lieu of the said undertaking, alternatively such compensation as was/is required to make good all losses occasioned by his breach of duty to perform the said undertaking.”

D I can deal quite briefly with the appeal. There is a short answer to the second ground of appeal, i.e. the judge's refusal to allow evidence of impossibility to be adduced after judgment. It was for Mr. Whiting to adduce evidence of impossibility if he wished to rely on impossibility as an answer to the claim for enforcement of his undertaking. He did not do so at the appropriate time, and it was clearly within the judge's discretion to refuse him leave to adduce such evidence after judgment. However, on the first ground of appeal, i.e. impossibility of performance, the appeal must succeed. I do not say that the judge was wrong in making the order he did, since at that time he had no evidence as to impossibility and in those circumstances he was justified in ordering performance: compare In re A Solicitor [1966] 1 W.L.R. 1604. However, we did have evidence of impossibility and, as an appeal is by way of re-hearing—see Ord. 59, r. 3 (1)—we must of course take account of that evidence. It is old and trite law that the “court will not make any order in vain”: see, e.g. New Brunswick Co. etc. v. Muggeridge (1859) 4 Drew. 686, 699, cited and applied by Sir Robert Megarry V.-C. in Tito v. Waddell (No. 2) [1977] Ch. 106, 326. The proposition is so self-evident that it requires no elaboration. There is the further point that disobedience to the court's order is a contempt, and contempt is punishable with imprisonment. It is unthinkable that a court should put a man at risk of imprisonment by making an order which it knows, at the time of making the order, is impossible of performance. As

F Kindersley V.-C. said in Seawell v. Webster (1859) 29 L.J. Ch. 71, 73:

G “Put the extreme case of a vendor burning a title deed: the court could not make a decree that he should deliver it up, and be imprisoned if he does not.”

H Mr. Ross was constrained to accept that, in the light of the further evidence, he could not realistically expect successfully to resist the appeal and in the event the argument before us turned wholly on the cross-appeal. In opening his case, Mr. Munby submitted that there are two different jurisdictions which the court exercises in dealing summarily with solicitors:

(1) The jurisdiction to enforce undertakings. This is exercisable whether or not there were any proceedings pending in court and whether or not the undertaking was given in the course of legal proceedings. The jurisdiction is exercisable although the solicitor has not been guilty of dishonourable or discreditable conduct. A

(2) The jurisdiction to award compensation. This jurisdiction is exercisable only where the solicitor had the conduct or prosecution of some cause or matter before the court. The jurisdiction is dependent upon proof of serious misconduct.

However, during the course of the hearing of the appeal we were provided with a transcript of the judgments of this court (Sir John Donaldson M.R. and Nicholls L.J.) in John Fox v. Bannister, King & Rigbeys delivered on 19 December 1986, post, p. 480. In the light of those judgments Mr. Munby was constrained to concede that the compensatory jurisdiction was not limited to undertakings given in the course of proceedings; however, as the undertaking in the present case was given in the course of proceedings, this did not matter. However, he maintained his submission that the compensatory jurisdiction is only exercisable upon proof of serious misconduct, and he relied on the fact that no allegation of moral turpitude was made against Mr. Whiting in the plaintiff's points of claim, nor in the way in which the case was opened and presented before the judge. It was, he submitted, now too late for the plaintiff to allege misconduct on the part of Mr. Whiting of a kind sufficient to enable him (the plaintiff) to claim compensation for breach of the undertaking. B C D

In my judgment the true position is as follows. There are three ways in which a party who seeks to force a professional undertaking given by a solicitor can proceed:

(1) By an action at law, if there is a cause of action.

(2) By an application to the court to exercise its inherent supervisory jurisdiction. E

(3) By an application to The Law Society. In the Professional Conduct of Solicitors (The Law Society, 1986) it is stated in paragraph 15.02:

"A solicitor who fails to honour the terms of a professional undertaking is prima facie guilty of professional misconduct. Consequently, the council will require its implementation as a matter of conduct." F

However,

"Neither the council nor the tribunal have power to order payment of compensation or to procure the specific performance of an undertaking if a solicitor declines to implement it. The only step open to the council is to take disciplinary action for failure to honour the undertaking." G

It is the second of these methods with which this case is concerned, and I turn now to consider this jurisdiction. I should say at once that I do not accept Mr. Munby's submission that the enforcement of undertakings is in some way separate and distinct from the general question of professional misconduct. The true position is as follows. H

(1) The nature of the summary jurisdiction is explained in the following passage from the speech of Lord Wright in Myers v. Elman [1940] A.C. 282, 319:

"The underlying principle is that the court has a right and a duty to supervise the conduct of its solicitors, and visit with penalties any conduct of a solicitor which is of such a nature as to tend to defeat

3 W.L.R.

Udall v. Capri Lighting Ltd. (C.A.)

Balcombe L.J.

A justice in the very cause in which he is engaged professionally, as was said by Abinger C.B. in Stephens v. Hill (1842) 10 M. & W. 28.
 The matter complained of need not be criminal. It need not involve speculation or dishonesty. A mere mistake or error of judgment is not generally sufficient, but a gross neglect or inaccuracy in a matter which it is a solicitor's duty to ascertain with accuracy may suffice.
 B Thus, a solicitor may be held bound in certain events to satisfy himself that he has a retainer to act, or as to the accuracy of an affidavit which his client swears. It is impossible to enumerate the various contingencies which may call into operation the exercise of this jurisdiction. It need not involve personal obliquity. The term professional misconduct has often been used to describe the ground on which the court acts. It would perhaps be more accurate to C describe it as conduct which involves a failure on the part of a solicitor to fulfil his duty to the court and to realise his duty to aid in promoting in his own sphere the cause of justice. This summary procedure may often be invoked to save the expense of an action.
 Thus it may in proper cases take the place of an action for negligence, or an action for breach of warranty of authority brought by the person named as defendant in the writ. The jurisdiction is D not merely punitive but compensatory. The order is for payment of costs thrown away or lost because of the conduct complained of. It is frequently, as in this case, exercised in order to compensate the opposite party in the action."

E (2) Although the jurisdiction is compensatory and not punitive, it still retains a disciplinary slant. It is only available where the conduct of the solicitor is inexcusable and such as to merit reproof: R. & T. Thew
Ltd. v. Reeves (No. 2) (Note) [1982] Q.B. 1283, 1286.

(3) If the misconduct of the solicitor leads to a person suffering loss, then the court has power to order the solicitor to make good the loss occasioned by his breach of duty: Marsh v. Joseph [1897] 1 Ch. 213, 244–245, per Lord Russell of Killowen C.J.

F (4) Failure to implement a solicitor's undertaking is prima facie to be regarded as misconduct on his part, and this is so even though he has not been guilty of dishonourable conduct: see United Mining and Finance Corporation Ltd. v. Becher [1910] 2 K.B. 296, and in particular the argument of the successful applicants, at p. 301; John Fox v. Bannister, King & Rigbys, post, p. 480. However, exceptionally, the solicitor may G be able to give an explanation for his failure to honour his undertaking which may enable the court to say that there has been no misconduct in the particular case: see Fox's case, post, p. 485F–H.

(5) Neither the fact that the undertaking was that a third party should do an act, nor the fact that the solicitor may have a defence to an action at law (e.g. the Statute of Frauds), precludes the court from exercising its supervisory jurisdiction: see Ex parte Hughes, 5 B. & Ald.
 482; In re Greaves (1827) 1 Cr. & J. 374. However, these are factors which the court may take into account in deciding whether or not to exercise its discretion and, if so, in what manner.

H (6) The summary jurisdiction involves a discretion as to the relief to be granted: per Lord Wright in Myers v. Elman [1940] A.C. 282, 318. In the case of an undertaking, where there is no evidence that it is impossible to perform, the order will usually be to require the solicitor to do that which he had undertaken to do: see In re A Solicitor [1966] 1 W.L.R. 1604. A

(7) Where it is inappropriate for the court to make an order requiring the solicitor to perform his undertaking, e.g. on the grounds of impossibility, the court may exercise the power referred to in paragraph (3) above and order the solicitor to compensate a person who has suffered loss in consequence of his failure to implement his undertaking: see John Fox v. Bannister, King & Rigbys. It is stated in the text books (see Cordery on The Law Relating to Solicitors, 7th ed. (1981), p. 122; Halsbury's Laws of England, 4th ed., vol. 44 (1983), para. 255, pp. 193–194) that the court will not enforce an undertaking which is incapable of being performed ab initio. If this statement means no more than that the court will make no order in vain, then I would not quarrel with it. If, however, it is intended to suggest that the court will not order compensation for breach of an undertaking which is ab initio incapable of performance, then it is difficult to understand the principle on which it is based and I doubt whether it is an accurate statement of the law. It appears to depend on the authority of Peart v. Bushell, 2 Sim. 38, and I agree with the criticism of that case made by Hamilton J. in United Mining and Finance Corporation Ltd. v. Becher [1910] 2 K.B. 296, 306. However, the point does not arise in the present case and I need not consider it further. B C D

It follows that, in my judgment, the judge was wrong in thinking that he would have no jurisdiction to make any order other than an order that the undertaking be performed; the cross-appeal must be allowed and the matter remitted to the court below for consideration whether to make an order requiring Mr. Whiting to pay compensation to the plaintiff. In deciding whether or not to exercise its discretion the court will have to take into account a number of factors, including those mentioned below (the list is not intended to be exhaustive). E

(a) Whether Mr. Whiting's action in giving his undertaking and then failing to implement it is conduct of such a nature as to justify the exercise of the jurisdiction. The principles to be applied in the exercise of this discretion are those set out above. F

(b) Depending on the answer to point (a) above, whether the plaintiff can show that he has suffered loss in consequence of his not having had the benefit of the second charges which he would have had if the undertaking had been performed according to its terms. This must depend on a number of factors, including the value of the properties at the relevant date (whatever that may be) and the extent of the security afforded by any charges taking priority to the "second charges" in question. The evidence before us is insufficient to enable me to say whether the plaintiff can establish a prima facie case of loss and it may be that even the judge will find it necessary to order an inquiry, as was done in John Fox v. Bannister, King & Rigbys, post, p. 480. G

I would therefore allow both the appeal and the cross-appeal and remit the case to the court below, to be heard by Sir Neil Lawson, if available. H

NEILL L.J. I agree that the appeal and the cross-appeal should be allowed for the reasons given by Kerr and Balcombe L.JJ.

KERR L.J. I agree that the appeal of Mr. Whiting should be allowed for the reasons stated in the judgment of Balcombe L.J. I also agree

3 W.L.R.

Udall v. Capri Lighting Ltd. (C.A.)

Kerr L.J.

A that the plaintiff's cross-appeal be allowed on the grounds which I set out below, without implying any disagreement with anything stated in that judgment.

B This case has a number of unusual features. The first is the nature of the undertaking which Mr. Whiting has been held to have given to Mr. Readman. Solicitors' undertakings are normally concerned with matters within the solicitors' own control, such as to deliver up or not to part with documents in their possession, to pay moneys in certain events, to discharge a mortgage after completion, etc. In the present case, however, the undertaking was to procure for the plaintiff second charges on the residences of Mr. Gowing and Mr. Roe. That undertaking could not be honoured by Mr. Whiting without their co-operation. Its performance did not lie within Mr. Whiting's sole control, as in the case of the usual kinds of undertaking given by solicitors. In effect, the nature of the undertaking was that Mr. Whiting guaranteed that these two persons would provide second charges on their homes in favour of the plaintiff. If they failed to do so, for whatever reason, then the undertaking was broken. It is against that unusual background that I would like to add some comments to the judgment of Balcombe L.J.

D As he has pointed out, the fact that a solicitor has undertaken that a third party will do or refrain from doing something does not in itself affect the nature of the undertaking. The court has the same powers in relation to a solicitor who is alleged to have given an undertaking of this nature as in the case of any other undertaking. But the manner in which the court will exercise its powers in such cases may well be different from the more straightforward type of case. To give an undertaking that a third party will do or refrain from doing something may obviously be risky and indeed unwise. When there is a conflict as to whether or not an oral undertaking of the kind was in fact given, then the court may well conclude that the case is insufficiently clear to justify the application of its inherent summary supervisory jurisdiction over solicitors and that the matter should be left to proceed by action. But Judge Dobry Q.C. rejected that submission, albeit subject to the safeguard of ordering pleadings and discovery. There was no appeal against his decision and the matter then proceeded like an action, with oral evidence and full cross-examination. In this connection it should also be mentioned that it was rightly not suggested on behalf of Mr. Whiting that his inability to rely on the Statute of Frauds or on section 40 of the Law of Property Act 1925 was any reason against the use of the court's summary jurisdiction over solicitors. This is in line with the authorities which show that lawyers must accept responsibility for, and be able to rely upon, any oral undertaking given in the course of their profession. But these do not appear to have been cases where there was any conflict of evidence about the undertaking having been given. In such cases a high degree of proof should be required, and most solicitors would no doubt agree that, as a matter of normal good practice, oral undertakings should be confirmed in writing forthwith by the recipient. Thus, one surprising feature of the present case was that there was no reference to the undertaking held to have been given on 6 July in any correspondence across the line until a letter from Mr. Readman of 27 July. However, Sir Neil Lawson heard the evidence and will no doubt have made allowance for all these matters, and in any event there has equally been no appeal against his finding that the undertaking was in fact given. In the upshot, therefore, although this appears to me to be a very unusual case, there then remains nothing save to decide whether, and if so in what manner, the court's undoubted inherent jurisdiction over Mr. Whiting should be exercised. A

Before returning to this point I wish to add something about another unusual feature of this case. This is that by the time when it had been established to the satisfaction of the court that Mr. Whiting had given the undertaking in question, it had in any event become impossible for him to carry it out. While this may be unusual, it is perhaps hardly surprising in the circumstances. As I have said, the undertaking was held to have been given on 6 July 1983, but the hearing before Sir Neil Lawson did not take place until 11 December 1985, nearly two and a half years later. The possibility of changed circumstances concerning the two properties in question must have been obvious, and I find it astonishing that an order for what was effectively specific performance of the undertaking was made without prior investigation of the practicalities. B C

However, there were two reasons for this course of events. First, there appears to have been a misunderstanding between Mr. Munby and the judge, though I think that Mr. Munby must accept responsibility for it. The bulk of the two days' hearing had been taken up with the acute conflict of evidence as to whether or not the undertaking had in fact been given. At the end of it Mr. Munby assumed that the judgment would be limited to this issue, and that there would then be argument about the nature of the order which should be made in the event of it being held, as it was, that the undertaking had been given. It was therefore only at that stage that Mr. Munby proposed to deploy the evidence showing that performance of the undertaking had become impossible. In my view this was not a satisfactory way of dealing with the matter. Having regard to the passage of time and the nature of this undertaking it seems to me that it should have been ensured by all concerned that no order for the enforcement of the undertaking was considered, let alone made, without a prior investigation of the practicalities. If that had happened, then it is clear that it would quickly have become apparent that enforcement was out of the question, and the earlier appeal to this court for the admission of this and other evidence would have been avoided. Indeed, putting the matter quite generally, it seems to me that except in straightforward cases, enforcement of an undertaking should never be ordered without some consideration of the practical implications which will ensue from the order. D E F

But there was also another reason which appears to have affected the course of events below. Quite understandably on the authorities as they then stood, it seems clear that both counsel and Sir Neil Lawson were under the impression that in relation to unperformed undertakings, as opposed to other matters which could give rise to the court's supervisory jurisdiction over solicitors, the court's powers were restricted to ordering the solicitor to perform the undertaking, and that no order for compensation for non-performance could be made unless the circumstances also showed that the solicitor had acted dishonourably. This was not suggested by Mr. Ross on behalf of the plaintiff in the present case, since we were told that he opened the case against Mr. Whiting expressly on the basis that the nature of his conduct was irrelevant; what mattered was that the undertaking had been given but not performed. All this explains the passage from the judgment which G H

Kerr L.J.

A Balcombe L.J. has cited. Indeed, for the first day or so of the hearing of the appeal before us matters took a similar course. Mr. Munby's citations of authorities and text books had virtually convinced me that if an undertaking has become impossible of performance, as in the present case, then there was either no jurisdiction, or at any rate it was not the practice of the court, to make any order for compensation. Admittedly, B I found this proposition surprising, and it was assumed rather than stated expressly in Mr. Munby's citations. But it is now unnecessary to go over this ground again, since the decision of this court in John Fox v.
Bannister, King & Rigbeys (Note), post, p. 480 then came to light. We had heard, more or less by chance, that there had been a recent decision on this question. When Mr. Razi, one of the law reporters, learned about this, he helped us to trace the transcript, which had only reached C the Supreme Court Library a day or two earlier.

D The decision in John Fox v. Bannister, King & Rigbeys is of course binding upon us and it changed the course of this appeal. Mr. Munby was at one time inclined to submit that it had been decided per incuriam because the arguments and citation of authorities may have been more restricted than before us, but he rightly did not persist in this submission.
 It seems to me, with respect, that the decision is precisely in line with what I would expect the law to be. But it is clearly important to consider carefully what the case in fact decided.

E The plaintiff's solicitor, Mr. Fox, had for some time been acting for a Mr. Geoffrey Watts and was owed substantial fees. The defendants' solicitor, Mr. Bannister, had previously acted for Mr. Watts. He knew about Mr. Fox's concern about his fees and had received a written authority from Mr. Watts to give an undertaking to account to Mr. Fox for the balance of certain proceeds due to be received from the sale of a property. Having received these proceeds, Mr. Bannister paid some of them to Mr. Fox, but this left a balance of £18,000 in relation to which there appears to have been some disagreement between Mr. Fox and Mr. Watts. It was therefore agreed that Mr. Bannister would retain this sum for the time being. On 30 September 1982 Mr. Bannister accordingly F wrote to Mr. Fox and informed him that Mr. Watts had asked him to retain this sum and then added, at p. 482D:

"no doubt you and [Mr. Watts] will sort out as to the £18,000 which is still in my account and which of course I shall retain until you have sorted everything out."

G In the event, without going into the facts in further detail, Mr. Watts did not resolve the problems between him and Mr. Fox and asked Mr.
 Bannister to remit the £18,000 to him, which Mr. Bannister did without further reference to Mr. Fox. The latter thereupon issued an originating summons against Bannisters for an order for payment of the sum of £18,000 wrongfully released or alternatively for breach of the undertaking.
 Judge Tibber, sitting as a judge of the High Court, held that the letter H of 30 September 1982 contained an undertaking to Mr. Fox which had been broken, and although the £18,000 had meanwhile been released to Mr. Watts, he ordered Bannisters to put Mr. Fox in the same position as if the undertaking had been honoured. He therefore ordered that the sum should be paid into court or into a joint account "to the credit of Mr. Watts" (see p. 483B) and granted a stay pending appeal.

The appeal was heard by Sir John Donaldson M.R. and Nicholls L.J., and the latter gave the leading judgment. [His Lordship set out the passage in the judgment of Nicholls L.J., at p. 483C-E which became crucial for the plaintiff's cross-appeal in the present case for compensation for breach of Mr. Whiting's undertaking, and continued:] Nicholls L.J. then held that the letter of 30 September contained an undertaking given by Mr. Bannister in his capacity as a solicitor to Mr. Fox; that it was irrelevant whether Mr. Bannister had Mr. Watts's authority to give it although there was no evidence to the contrary; but that, if Mr. Bannister had had no such authority and Mr. Fox had known this, then "this might well have affected the attitude which the court would adopt to the undertaking in these proceedings:" see p. 484B. This is important, because it shows that even in cases of unperformed undertakings the court retains a discretion. He then dealt with the decision of Pennycuik J. in In re A Solicitor [1966] 1 W.L.R. 1604 and held, at p. 484H that the case was "no authority for the proposition now being advanced, to the effect that if a solicitor undertakes not to part with a fund and then in breach of his undertaking does so, the court is powerless to take any steps to require the solicitor to make good his default, but must leave the party to whom the undertaking was given to his remedy, if any, at law."

He then went on to note that the case was not straightforward, because the breach of the undertaking had occurred over four years earlier and the parties' positions had changed a great deal, in particular since Mr. Watts had meanwhile gone bankrupt. Moreover, the judge's order that Bannisters should re-create and hold the fund of £18,000 to the credit of Mr. Watts could not be upheld in any event, since it was clear that neither Mr. Watts nor his trustee in bankruptcy could have any claim to the fund. But, on the other hand, Mr. Fox had not necessarily lost £18,000 but only the opportunity of taking such steps as were then open to him to stop this sum from being paid over to Mr. Watts and thereafter to have recourse to it to meet his bill. In these circumstances he proposed, and Sir John Donaldson M.R. agreed, that the court should order an inquiry as to what loss, if any, Mr. Fox had suffered by reason of the breach of the undertaking.

That was the outcome of the appeal, and to that extent the case is clear authority for the proposition that where a solicitor's undertaking has become impossible of performance, or where an order for its specific enforcement would be impracticable, then the court has power in its inherent jurisdiction to make an order for compensation instead. But that leaves the question as to the circumstances in which the court will exercise its discretion to make such an order. I have already referred to one brief passage in which Nicholls L.J. made it clear that the court's attitude in that regard may be flexible. I then come to the main passages in the judgments where this point was discussed. It was dealt with in connection with the submission that the situation in that case had not been sufficiently clear to justify the application of this summary procedure in the first place. This was the issue decided by Judge Dobry in the present case, which has not been appealed. And, since in consequence of his order there were pleadings, discovery and full oral evidence in the present case, so that the character of the procedure was in effect no more summary than if the matter had proceeded by action, I do not cite the passages from the judgments in Fox's case which deal with the importance of ensuring that solicitors are not prejudiced from

Kerr L.J.

A defending themselves by the summary character of the supervisory procedure. The important passages for present purposes are those which refer to the standard of conduct of solicitors, in the context of unperformed undertakings, which will justify intervention by the court.
[His Lordship set out the passages in the judgments of Nicholls L.J., at
p. 485D–H, and Sir John Donaldson M.R., at p. 486F–487A, and continued:] What these passages show is that even in cases which are B suitable for the application of this summary procedure, as opposed to holding that the matter must proceed by action, and even where it has been established that an undertaking has been given but not performed, the court still retains a residual discretion about the order which is appropriate in the circumstances. In cases where enforcement of an undertaking by an order for its performance is still possible and C practicable, such an order will no doubt be made more or less as a matter of course. The reason is that the failure to perform an undertaking which is still capable of being performed will generally amount to professional misconduct or a serious dereliction of professional duty, to use the expressions mentioned in the judgments. But these passages also show, to use the language of Nicholls L.J., at p. 485G–H that “a solicitor is not necessarily to be regarded as having misconducted himself by D failing to honour an undertaking.” One of the examples which he gives is the situation “where there was real scope for genuine misunderstanding on what was said or meant by a solicitor on a particular occasion.”

Although, as I have said, these passages were clearly directed to the question whether or not the application of the summary procedure was in any event appropriate, it seems to me that the test which they lay down for its application must also remain relevant to the order which E the court will ultimately make in cases where the summary procedure has been invoked, and where it has been established that an undertaking had been given but not performed. Since the purpose of the procedure is disciplinary, being designed to ensure a high standard of conduct on the part of solicitors, an order for enforcement of the undertaking or for compensation for its non-performance will not necessarily follow as a F matter of course. Before making such an order the court will have to be satisfied that by failing to perform the undertaking the solicitor had been guilty of professional misconduct or a serious dereliction of professional duty. If it is not satisfied about this, then it seems to me that it must still be open to the court to decline to make any order, and to hold that the matter must proceed by action, if at all, on the ground that the G circumstances do not warrant an order of a disciplinary nature against an officer of the court.

Where does that leave the present case? I agree with the order proposed by Balcombe L.J. that the matter must be remitted for decision whether any, and if so what, order should be made against Mr.
Whiting in all the circumstances. We have not seen any of the evidence in this case and it would therefore be quite inappropriate to express any H view about this. It is clear, of course, that specific enforcement of the undertaking is out of the question and that the issue must be whether or not it is appropriate to make a disciplinary order for compensation. But in deciding this issue, which may not necessarily be easy in the unusual circumstances of this case, one of the factors which it may be necessary to take into account, as pointed out by Mr. Munby, is the legal professional privilege of Mr. Whiting's clients, and the general principles of confidentiality, which may hamper him in seeking to establish that he was not guilty of professional misconduct in this case. Thus, it is possible that these factors may prevent him from explaining fully what happened, and why the second charges were not provided. A

On these grounds I agree that the cross-appeal should be allowed, as well as the appeal; and I also agree with the terms of the order proposed by Balcombe L.J.

APPEAL from Judge Tibber sitting as a judge of the Queen's Bench Division.

The plaintiffs, John Fox, a firm of solicitors, by originating summons dated 11 December 1984, sought against the defendants, Bannister, King & Rigbeys, also a firm of solicitors, an order for payment of £18,000 alleged to have been wrongfully released to a Mr. Watts, for whom both firms had acted at various times, in breach of an undertaking given by the defendants on 30 September 1982. On 4 October 1986 Judge Tibber, sitting as a judge of the Queen's Bench Division, ordered the defendants to pay £18,000 into a deposit account to the credit of Mr. Watts. G

The defendants appealed on the grounds, inter alia, that (1) there was no evidence on which the judge could find that the defendants had given an undertaking to the plaintiffs; (2) the judge had been wrong in law in holding that it was not necessary to look too nicely at the language of an undertaking if the intention of the parties was clear; (3) the judge should have held that to be enforceable the terms of an undertaking given by a solicitor had to be certain, clear and unambiguous; (4) the judge misdirected himself in concluding that the meaning of the alleged undertaking was that the defendants would retain £18,000 belonging to Mr. Watts as a fund against which the plaintiffs would be able to proceed in respect of their unpaid fees; (5) the judge misdirected himself in H

Cur. adv. vult.

D 19 December. NICHOLLS L.J. This is a dispute between two firms of solicitors, both of whom at various times acted for a Mr. Geoffrey Watts. The issue concerns a solicitor's undertaking said to have been given in 1982 by Mr. J. W. Bannister, a partner in the defendant firm, to Mr. John Fox, who is the senior partner of the plaintiff firm. Before the court is an appeal from a decision, given on 4 October 1985, of Judge Tibber sitting as a High Court judge.

E From about the middle of 1981 the plaintiff firm ("John Fox") acted as solicitors for Mr. Watts and companies of his in various pieces of litigation, all of which eventually were compromised in July 1982. A substantial amount of complicated legal work had been involved, and John Fox's taxed fees and disbursements, including value added tax, amounted to £59,311. Mr. Watts paid sums totalling £27,760 on account.

F Mr. Watts' previous solicitors had been the defendant firm ("Bannisters"). Mr. Watts had been a client of that firm for some time. When John Fox started to act for Mr. Watts they did not take over the conduct of all Mr. Watts' affairs, and it was Bannisters, and not John Fox, who acted for Mr. Watts in selling two properties of his. One of these was known as King Street Coach Station, Stourbridge. The other was 14, Cemetery Road, Lye, Stourbridge.

G Mr. Fox was very anxious about his lack of security for his firm's costs. His firm had incurred a substantial bank overdraft during the litigation. In February 1982 Mr. Fox obtained from Mr. and Mrs. Watts a charge over the Cemetery Road property, to secure his liabilities to John Fox, but that charge ranked behind a first charge granted to a bank, and it seems there was or will be no surplus remaining after discharging the liabilities to the bank. It seems that Mr. Fox also obtained a charge over the King Street property but that this was never registered.

H In 1982 the King Street property was sold, but part of the purchase price was retained by the purchaser pending the carrying out of demolition works on the site. In July 1982 Mr. Fox obtained from Mr. Watts a form of authority signed by him and addressed to Bannisters. It read:

"I hereby authorise and request you to give an undertaking to account to Messrs. John Fox, solicitors, of P.O. Box No. 2, Broadway, Worcestershire for the balance of the retention moneys in connection with the sale of the King Street Garage and also the balance proceeds of sale of the Cemetery Road property."

On 22 July 1982 John Fox sent that form of authority to Bannisters with a request for Bannisters' undertaking. Despite reminders from John Fox, the undertaking was not forthcoming.

By the end of September the demolition work was finished. On 29 September Mr. Fox spoke to Mr. Watts. Mr. Watts, it seems, had had second thoughts about applying the balance of the price of the King Street property in paying John Fox's costs and disbursements and was considering using the money as a deposit for the purchase of an airfield. On the same day Mr. Fox wrote an agitated letter to Mr. Watts, reminding him of how much was owing, and pointing out reasons why Mr. Watts could not embark on the purchase of the airfield. Mr. Fox insisted that no part of the balance of the sale price should be used for that purchase until his firm's costs had been paid, and he told Mr. Watts that he was asking Mr. Bannister to account to Mr. Fox for the proceeds "in accordance with the irrevocable authority he holds."

I now come to the crucial day, 30 September. According to the undisputed affidavit evidence, on that day Mr. Bannister met Mr. Fox and gave him a cheque for £11,500. Mr. Bannister retained £18,000, representing the balance of the proceeds after deducting Bannisters' own costs. Mr. Bannister retained that sum in accordance with instructions given to him by Mr. Watts. Mr. Bannister told Mr. Fox that he would not part with that sum of £18,000 without referring to Mr. Fox. When giving Mr. Fox the cheque for £11,500 Mr. Bannister also handed to Mr. Fox a letter on Bannisters' headed paper, the material part of which read:

"this leaves a balance in hand of £29,553.10 as I told you [Mr. Watts] wanted me to retain the £18,000 and I enclose a cheque for £11,500.00 in your favour. I see your letter of 29 September and no doubt you and [Mr. Watts] will sort out as to the £18,000 which is still in my account and which of course I shall retain until you have sorted everything out."

On the following day Mr. Fox wrote to Mr. Bannister thanking him for his efforts. He sent Mr. Bannister a copy of a further letter he had written to Mr. Watts, on 1 October, in which he had said that unless Mr. Watts authorised Mr. Bannister to pay over to Mr. Fox the £18,000, he (Mr. Fox) would do no further work for Mr. Watts or his companies and would commence proceedings to recover the balance due. Mr. Fox commented to Mr. Bannister that so far there had been no response from Mr. Watts, and added that he would be grateful if Mr. Bannister would kindly retain the £18,000 pending resolution of the problem.

Mr. Bannister's response to that letter, on 4 October, was to inform Mr. Fox that he had told Mr. Watts that he would not part with the £18,000 until Mr. Fox and Mr. Watts had "decided what to do about this."

Unfortunately Mr. Fox was unable to sort out the position with Mr. Watts. On 18 October Mr. Watts wrote to Mr. Bannister asking for payment of the £18,000, which he proposed to use as a deposit for the purchase of the airfield, and three days later this was followed by a further written demand, delivered by hand, from another firm of solicitors, Cove & Co., acting for Mr. Watts.

Meanwhile, on 19 October Mr. Fox had written to Mr. Bannister asking for the release of the money to him in view of the original authority given by Mr. Watts in July. On 21 October he followed this up with a letter asking Mr. Bannister under no circumstances to part with the £18,000.

By now Mr. Watts' financial problems had become more pressing: an auction sale held on 20 October of other properties belonging to Mr. Watts or his companies had been unsuccessful, and a winding up petition had been presented against one of his companies. Mr. Watts was threatening to hold Bannisters liable for the loss if they held on to the £18,000 and as a result his company was forced into liquidation.

Bannisters considered the matter and decided they had no alternative but to hand over the money to Mr. Watts. Whereupon, without reference to Mr. Fox, they did so.

3 W.L.R.

John Fox v. Bannister, King & Rigbeys (C.A.)

Nicholls L.J.

A John Fox then made efforts to recover their unpaid costs from Mr. Watts and his companies but without success. None of them has any money. Mr. Watts is now bankrupt.

B On 11 December 1984 John Fox issued an originating summons against Bannisters, seeking an order for payment of the sum of £18,000 wrongfully released in breach of an undertaking given on 30 September 1982 or, alternatively, damages for breach of the undertaking. This was supported by an affidavit sworn by Mr. Fox in December 1984, and a short further affidavit sworn in September 1985. Bannisters adduced no evidence.

C The judge decided that the letter of 30 September 1982 from Mr. Bannister to Mr. Fox contained an undertaking, which had subsequently been broken, and that Bannisters should now put John Fox in the same position as if the undertaking had been honoured. To achieve this he ordered that Bannisters should pay £18,000 into court or into a joint deposit account to the credit of Mr. Watts, that sum to remain there until further order of the court. He granted a stay pending appeal.

D The basic principles applicable in the present case are not in doubt. The jurisdiction being invoked here is the inherent jurisdiction which the Supreme Court has over solicitors, who are its officers. It is a jurisdiction which is exercised, not for the purpose of enforcing legal rights, but for the purpose of enforcing honourable conduct on the part of the court's own officers: see In re Grey (H.A.) [1892] 2 Q.B. 440, 443, per Lord Esher M.R.

E One of the areas in which this principle falls to be applied is the enforcement of undertakings given by solicitors in their capacity as solicitors. As officers of the court solicitors are expected to abide by undertakings given by them professionally, and if they do not do so they may be called upon summarily to make good their defaults: see United Mining and Finance Corporation Ltd. v. Becher [1910] 2 K.B. 296, 305, per Hamilton J. Where a solicitor, directly or indirectly, still has it in his power to do the act which he undertook to do, the court may order him to do that act. Where the solicitor does not have it in his power, he may be ordered to make good the loss flowing from his failure to perform the undertaking, as loss flowing from a breach of duty committed by a solicitor as an officer of the court: see Marsh v. Joseph [1897] 1 Ch. 213, 245 per Lord Russell of Killowen C.J.

F So I turn to consider whether any undertaking was given in the present case by Mr. Bannister and, if it was, whether it was given by him in his capacity as a solicitor.

G In my view Mr. Bannister did give an undertaking to Mr. Fox. On 30 September 1982 Mr. Bannister had in his possession money belonging to his client Mr. Watts. He knew that in instructing him to retain £18,000 and not pay that amount to Mr. Fox, Mr. Watts was going back on the authority he had signed in July. Mr. Bannister also knew that this change of attitude was a matter of great concern to Mr. Fox, who had been hoping for some time that this sum would be the source from which part of his outstanding bill would be paid. When, in these circumstances, Mr. Bannister wrote to Mr. Fox in the terms of his letter of 30 September, he made to Mr. Fox a clear and unequivocal statement that he would not part with the sum of £18,000. I can see no reason why Mr. Fox was not entitled to rely on that as a commitment by Mr. Bannister. H Mr. Fox's evidence is that he did rely on that undertaking as the security for counsel's outstanding fees which amounted to over £23,000.

Moreover, that was a commitment given by Mr. Bannister in his capacity as a solicitor, for it was in that capacity he was holding the £18,000 in question.

For Bannisters it was pointed out that both firms of solicitors knew that Mr. Watts wished the sum of £18,000 to be retained so that the money could be used as a deposit for the airfield purchase. It was submitted that Mr. Bannister had no authority to give any undertaking regarding this sum and, moreover, that Mr. Fox knew this.

There are two separate points here. The first point is whether Mr. Bannister had authority from his client to give the undertaking and, if he did not, what is the consequence of that in these proceedings. As to this, there is no evidence that Mr. Bannister was acting without authority, but in any event, whether Mr. Bannister had authority from Mr. Watts is irrelevant to the question of whether he gave an undertaking to Mr. Fox. Mr. Bannister wrote the letter of 30 September. Whether his statement in that letter amounted to an undertaking is a question of construction of that letter in the light of the surrounding circumstances.

The second point is whether, even assuming Mr. Bannister lacked authority, Mr. Fox is to be taken as having known of this, and if so what would be the consequence of that in these proceedings. As to this, I accept that if the circumstances were that when the undertaking was given Mr. Fox was aware of Mr. Bannister's lack of authority, this might well have affected the attitude which the court would adopt to the undertaking in these proceedings. But on the affidavit evidence I do not think that any such knowledge is made out. Mr. Fox knew that Mr. Watts had countermanded his original instructions to pay the money to Mr. Fox, and that he had told Mr. Bannister to hold on to the money. Mr. Fox knew, too, of Mr. Watts' plans about the airfield deposit. But Mr. Fox also knew that Mr. Watts' plans in that regard were fraught with difficulties (and, indeed, the money was never used as a deposit on the airfield). All in all, I am not satisfied that from these facts it would be right to infer that Mr. Fox knew that Mr. Bannister was acting without authority in writing the letter of 30 September (if, indeed, that was the case).

Nor can I accept the further submission that the words relied upon were not sufficiently clear in their meaning to amount to a solicitor's undertaking. To my mind there is no material ambiguity. Mr. Bannister stated that he would hold on to the money until Mr. Fox had come to some arrangement regarding it with their mutual client. This did not mean, however, that if Mr. Fox was unable to come to some such arrangement, Mr. Bannister's obligation would have continued indefinitely. Mr. Bannister could have terminated his obligation on giving reasonable notice to Mr. Fox. So that if Mr. Watts sought payment, Mr. Bannister would have been at liberty to pay over the money to him but only after giving reasonable advance warning of this to Mr. Fox, thus affording Mr. Fox an opportunity to take whatever steps he wished to protect his position. In this way the object for which Mr. Bannister's undertaking was given, to provide Mr. Fox with some immediate protection against the dissipation of the £18,000, would have been achieved as intended at the time. (It will be recalled that at the same time as the cheque for £11,500 was handed over with the letter of 30 September, Mr. Bannister had said to Mr. Fox that he would not part with the balance, of £18,000, without referring to him.)

What, then, should now be done? The undertaking was broken. For Bannisters it was submitted that, since the £18,000 has gone, the undertaking is incapable of performance. It was submitted, in reliance on In re A Solicitor [1966] 1 W.L.R. 1604, that in general the court will not make a committal order against a solicitor without first ordering him to perform the undertaking, and that the court will not order a solicitor to perform an undertaking which it is impossible for him to perform. In re A Solicitor was a case where a solicitor was sought to be committed to prison for failing to comply with certain undertakings given by him. Pennyquick J. pointed out, at p. 1608, that in practice the court makes an order upon the solicitor to do the act which he has undertaken to do, and only if the solicitor disobeys that order would a committal order be made. But that case is no authority for the proposition now being advanced, to the effect that if a solicitor undertakes not to part with a fund and then in breach of his undertaking does so, the court is powerless to take any steps to require the solicitor to make good his default, but must leave the party to whom the undertaking was given to his remedy, if any, at law.

3 W.L.R.

John Fox v. Bannister, King & Rigbys (C.A.)

Nicholls L.J.

A That said, however, the present case is not a straightforward one. The breach of the undertaking occurred over four years ago, and the parties' positions have changed much in the meantime. The £18,000 was paid to Mr. Watts, and he is now bankrupt. Thus to order Bannisters now to re-create a fund of £18,000, and place this in an account to the credit of Mr. Watts cannot, with all respect to the judge, be right. The one person who can have no claim to the new fund is Mr. Watts or his trustee in bankruptcy.

B Again, if the sum of £18,000 is ordered to be paid into a joint account or into court, what is the issue between John Fox and Bannisters which will decide the entitlement to that fund?

C I approach the matter in a different way. The purpose of the undertaking was as I have sought to describe. What Mr. Fox lost by the breach of the undertaking was the opportunity to take whatever steps might have been open to him at the time to stop the £18,000 being paid to Mr. Watts and, ultimately, to have recourse to that money to meet his bill. What those steps were, and whether they would have been successful, are not matters canvassed adequately in the evidence in its present form. On the present evidence I am not satisfied that, if the undertaking had been faithfully honoured, John Fox would necessarily have obtained payment to them of the £18,000. Nor, conversely, am I persuaded that they would necessarily have been left empty-handed.

D That being so, I consider that the appropriate course is to direct an inquiry, in these proceedings, as to what loss, if any, John Fox suffered by reason of the breach of the undertaking. If, as contended by Bannisters, John Fox suffered no loss, Bannisters will not be required to make any payment to John Fox. If, however, John Fox can prove loss to the satisfaction of the master who will conduct the inquiry, it would only be right that Bannisters as officers of the court should now make good to John Fox the amount of that loss suffered as a result of the breach of the undertaking.

E There is one final point I should add. Mr. Toulson submitted that to succeed with an application such as this the applicant has to show he has a plain and obvious case, and that where serious or difficult questions are involved, the case is not one appropriate to be dealt with under the court's summary jurisdiction over its officers. I am unable to accept this submission expressed in such wide terms. If this submission were well founded it would mean that if, for example, a dispute arose over whether a solicitor had given an oral undertaking, or had given a written undertaking the only copy of which had been destroyed or lost, the court would be precluded from investigating the matter. That cannot be right. Since the jurisdiction is disciplinary as well as compensatory, the court must be satisfied that there has been misconduct in that there has been a breach of an undertaking given by the solicitor acting professionally. But, in an appropriate case, the court can resolve issues of fact with the assistance of cross-examination of deponents. If necessary, an order for discovery can be made.

G Again, if there is a dispute about the true construction of a document, the court can resolve that issue having heard argument on it.

H The court, however, will always have in mind that a solicitor is not necessarily to be regarded as having misconducted himself by failing to honour an undertaking when, for example, the issue of whether the words amounted to an undertaking, or the further issue of whether there has been a breach, turns on the answer to a fine or subtle point of construction. Likewise where there was real scope for genuine misunderstanding on what was said or meant by a solicitor on a particular occasion. In that sense this supervisory jurisdiction will only be exercised in a clear case.

Moreover, although the court has the means to resolve disputed issues as mentioned above when exercising its summary jurisdiction over solicitors, the court will be careful to ensure that the solicitor defendant is not prejudiced by the course which is being followed in the circumstances of the particular case, and it will exercise the discretion which it has regarding this summary jurisdiction with that in mind.

Nicholls L.J.

John Fox v. Bannister, King & Rigbeys (C.A.)

[1987]

None of that applies to this case. John Fox's evidence of the history, including what occurred on and after 30 September 1982, is clear and not disputed. To my mind this is a clear case.

Accordingly I would uphold the judge's view that there was a breach of an undertaking given professionally by Mr. Bannister, but allow the appeal to the extent of substituting for the judge's order for payment an order directing an inquiry in the terms I have indicated, with an order for payment of the sum found due in answer to that inquiry.

SIR JOHN DONALDSON M.R. I agree with the judgment of Nicholls L.J. and wish only to add a word on the nature of the summary jurisdiction of the Supreme Court over solicitors as officers of that court.

Mr. Toulson submitted that it was equivalent to the summary jurisdiction under R.S.C., Ord. 14, and that, accordingly, if it could be shown that the solicitor had an arguable defence, the court should dismiss the application, leaving it to the applicant to bring such other normal or non-summary proceedings as he thought fit. He supported this argument by reference to the decision of this court in Geoffrey Silver & Drake v. Baines [1971] 1 Q.B. 396 in which Lord Denning M.R. said, at p. 402:

"This summary jurisdiction means, however, that the solicitor is deprived of the advantages which ordinarily avail a defendant on a trial. There are no pleadings; no discovery; and no oral evidence save by leave. The jurisdiction should, therefore, only be exercised in a clear case."

And Megaw L.J. said, at p. 405:

"If in any particular case where it is sought to invoke this extraordinary jurisdiction it appears to the court that justice requires that another procedure should be followed rather than this special procedure, then the court must exercise its discretion to refuse to allow this extraordinary procedure to be used. In my judgment in the present case, having regard to the serious and difficult issues which are raised, it would be quite wrong, against the will of the respondent to the application, to allow this matter to be dealt with otherwise than by means of an ordinary action in the court with evidence given orally and with the opportunity for cross-examination."

The jurisdiction is indeed "extraordinary," being based upon the right of the court to see that a high standard of conduct is maintained by its officers acting as such: see Cordery on the Law Relating to Solicitors, 7th ed. (1981), p. 116. It is, in a sense, a domestic jurisdiction to which solicitors are only amenable because of their special relationship with the court and it is designed to impose higher standards than the law applies generally. Thus, for example, it is no answer to a complaint that a solicitor acted in breach of an undertaking given by him that there was no consideration for it: United Mining and Finance Corporation Ltd. v. Becher [1910] 2 K.B. 296, 303.

Its summary character lies not in the burden or standard of proof, although it is only exercisable where there has been a serious dereliction of duty, but in the procedure whereby it is invoked. This is normally by originating summons, although it can be by simple application in an action where the conduct complained of occurred in the course of that action, and will not automatically or usually involve pleadings, discovery or oral evidence, although the court can, in appropriate circumstances, require a definition of the issues (by pleadings or otherwise), discovery and oral evidence.

In Geoffrey Silver & Drake v. Baines [1971] 1 Q.B. 396, what I think that the judges were saying was that the court will only exercise this jurisdiction where in the end it is clearly established that there has been a serious dereliction

A of professional duty by a solicitor as such. Both Lord Denning M.R., at p. 403B, and Widgery L.J., at p. 404D, held that Mr. Baines, the solicitor, was not acting in that capacity and so could not have been guilty of any such breach of duty. On the other hand, the plaintiff might have had a claim in contract against Mr. Batts, the employee of Mr. Baines, and against Mr. Baines as an individual, but not as a solicitor, if Mr. Batts had acted with his authority. Such a claim, even if successfully established, would not however fall within the special jurisdiction invoked by the plaintiff, not because of its summary nature but because its application is limited to professional conduct.

MAPLES (FORMERLY MELAMUD) v. MELAMUD

1987 March 17, 18, 19; 26

Latey J.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Foreign decree, recognition of—Jewish get—Jewish get of divorce obtained in London—Judgment of confirmation in Israel—Whether together entitled to recognition—Whether marriage still subsisting—Foreign Judgments (Reciprocal Enforcement) Act 1933 (23 & 24 Geo. 5, c. 13), s. 8(1)(2)¹—Domicile and Matrimonial Proceedings Act 1973 (c. 45), s. 16(1)²

In September 1968, the wife married her first husband in Haifa, Israel where the matrimonial home was established. A son was born in 1970. In May 1974 the wife and son came to London. The husband followed in August 1974 and a second son was born in October 1974. The marriage broke down. On 2 June 1977 following formalities at the Beth Din in London the husband granted and the wife accepted a get by which both acknowledged that the marriage celebrated in Haifa had been dissolved according to Jewish law. On 31 July 1977 the District Court of Haifa issued a judgment of confirmation of the get obtained in London. In the meantime, the wife had left the matrimonial home to live with another man with whom she went through a ceremony of marriage at the register office in St. Albans on 7 August 1978.

¹ Foreign Judgments (Reciprocal Enforcement) Act 1933, s. 8: "(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, a judgment to which Part I of this Act applies or would have applied if a sum of money had been payable thereunder, whether it can be registered or not, and whether, if it can be registered, it is registered or not, shall be recognised in any court in the United Kingdom as conclusive between the parties thereto in all proceedings founded on the same cause of action . . ."

[1987]

In an undefended petition the wife sought a decree of nullity of the marriage of 7 August 1978 on the ground that at that time she had no capacity to marry since the marriage celebrated in Haifa was still subsisting. In a defended petition the wife sought dissolution of the Haifa marriage on the ground that the marriage had irretrievably broken down, evidenced by the fact that the parties had lived apart for more than five years. By his answer, the first husband maintained that the Haifa marriage had been dissolved by the granting and acceptance of the get together with the judgment of confirmation issued by the District Rabbinical Court of Haifa. He asserted that the Jewish decree was entitled to be recognised by the court under the provisions of section 8 of the Foreign Judgments (Reciprocal Enforcement) Act 1933.

On the question whether the get coupled with the judgment of confirmation was a dissolution of the marriage valid in English law:—

Held, (1) that on its true construction section 8 of the Act of 1933 did not apply to judgments affecting marital status since such judgments did not solely concern “the parties thereto” and, in any event, the Haifa judgment confirming that the get obtained in London dissolved the marriage in Israeli law was not “the same cause of action” as the present, and, accordingly, the Haifa judgment was not one to which section 8 applied (post, pp. 491F–G, 492D–F).

Dicta of Lord Reid in Black-Clawson International Ltd. v. Papierwerke Waldhof-Aschaffenburg A.G. [1975] A.C. 591, 617, H.L.(E.) and of Sir John Arnold P. in Vervaeke (formerly Messina) v. Smith [1981] Fam. 77, 125–126, C.A. considered.

(2) That section 16 of the Domicile and Matrimonial Proceedings Act 1973 expressly excluded from recognition a non-judicial proceeding in the United Kingdom; and that, accordingly the Jewish get of divorce granted in London, being such a proceeding, was not entitled to recognition and both petitions would be granted (post, p. 490H).

The following cases are referred to in the judgment:

PETITIONS

The petitioner, Louise Rachel Maples (formerly Melamud) went through a ceremony of marriage at the register office in St. Albans, Hertfordshire with the respondent, Stephen Maples on 7 August 1978. On 31 May 1985 the petitioner filed a petition for a decree of nullity on the ground that at the time of the ceremony of marriage she had no capacity to marry the respondent because she was lawfully married to Yair Melamud. The suit was undefended.

3 W.L.R.

Maples v. Maples (Fam.D.)

A By a petition filed on 2 April 1984 and amended on 15 January 1986 the petitioner, Louise Rachel Maples (formerly Melamud) prayed for the dissolution of her marriage, which took place on 3 September 1968, to Yair Melamud in Haifa, Israel, on the ground that the marriage had irretrievably broken down, evidenced by the fact that the parties had lived apart for a continuous period of at least five years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition.

B Paragraph 6 of the petition stated that on 2 June 1977 the parties had obtained a Jewish religious divorce at the Beth Din (the Court of the Chief Rabbi), Tavistock Square, London and that on 31 July 1977 the District Rabbinical Court, Haifa, Israel had issued a judgment of confirmation but that those proceedings would not be recognised in England and Wales as validly dissolving the marriage.

C By an amended answer filed on 20 October 1986 the respondent, Yair Melamud, admitted that a Jewish religious divorce had been obtained in England on 2 June 1977 and that the District Rabbinical Court in Haifa, Israel had issued a judgment of confirmation and averred that the judgment of the District Court, Haifa was a declaratory judgment of a superior court of the country in which both parties were domiciled declaring the status of the parties which would be recognised under the English rules of private international law. Paragraph 4 of the amended answer stated that the petitioner had married Stephen Maples in England on 7 August 1978; that the petitioner had capacity to marry and that the marriage celebrated on 7 August 1978 was a valid and subsisting marriage. The respondent prayed for the rejection of the petition.

E The facts are stated in the judgment.

Hugh Morgan for the husband, Mr. Melamud.

Cur. adv. vult.

F 26 March. LATEY J. read the following judgment. The petitioner, the wife, presents two petitions. She asks for a decree of nullity of her ceremony of marriage with Mr. Maples on 7 August 1978; and she asks for a decree of divorce of her marriage with Mr. Melamud on 3 September 1968. The result of both petitions depends on whether a Jewish get divorce dissolved the marriage according to English law.

G What happened was this. In September 1968 the wife and Mr. Melamud married in Haifa. The wife's mother was Jewish; her father was British and Christian. Mr. Melamud is Jewish. There are two children, both boys, E., born 27 July 1970, now 16½ years old, and D., born 23 October 1974, now 12 years old.

H Between 1968 and 1974 they lived together in Haifa. Then, in September 1973, there was the Yom Kippur War and the husband was called up as an army reservist. In January 1974 the wife's father died and her mother was ill. In May 1974 the wife and E. came to England. At that time the wife was carrying D. In August 1974, on release from the Israeli army, the husband joined them in England and obtained employment here. In October 1974, D. was born, and in 1975 they bought a house in London.

It is convenient to say here, that after the issues on the petitions are decided there will, or may, be financial issues to be decided; and they may involve questions of conduct. At this stage I am dealing solely with the two petitions and the question of marital status they involve.

Late in 1976 and early in 1977 the marriage went adrift. For present purposes the reasons do not matter. Divorce was discussed. Mr. Melamud was ready to agree to a Jewish get divorce, but not to an English civil divorce which would have involved allegations of one kind or another being made, which neither wished to make against the other. So, after preliminary inquiries, on 2 June 1977 they went to the Beth Din, Tavistock Square. There, with the formalities which are required duly complied with, Mr. Melamud granted and the wife accepted a get—a paper stating and acknowledging that their marriage was dissolved according to Jewish law. The wife went to live with Mr. Maples. On the advice of the Beth Din, Mr. Melamud wrote to the Rabbinical Court at Haifa. On 31 July 1977, the District Rabbinical Court of Haifa issued a judgment of confirmation of the London Beth Din divorce; a “judgment of confirmation” is how the Hebrew is translated in the translation prepared for these proceedings.

The wife and Mr. Maples wanted to marry. The Registrar-General refused to authorise a marriage between them because of his understanding of the position in English law. The wife says she told the husband about this and asked for a civil divorce. Her husband refused that but said he would “sort it out.”

In April 1978 the husband, when next in Haifa, went to the Rabbinical Court and there emerged another judgment of confirmation, which omitted mention that the divorce had taken place in the Beth Din in London. It is agreed that this was a colourable transaction with no materiality to the issues in this case; but it sufficed to enable the wife and Mr. Maples to go through a ceremony of marriage, though the Registrar-General wrote a cautionary letter stressing that it was questionable whether the marriage would be valid in English law. On 7 August 1978 the wife and Mr. Maples went through a ceremony of marriage.

This brief history omits much which may be relevant in any ancillary financial proceedings. As I have said, I am dealing now solely with the two petitions concerned with matrimonial status. The wife now petitions (1) for a decree of nullity of the ceremony of marriage with Mr. Maples, on the ground that her marriage with Mr. Melamud was not dissolved according to English law. Mr. Maples does not contest that petition; and (2) for a decree of divorce of her marriage with Mr. Melamud on the ground that they have been separated for five years or more. Mr. Melamud contests the petition, on the ground that their marriage was in fact validly dissolved. He accepts that if he is mistaken about that, she is entitled to a divorce decree on the ground of five years’ separation. Both petitions depend on one question only. Was the get, coupled with the judgment of confirmation, a dissolution of the marriage valid in English law?

The experts in Israeli law are agreed that the granting by the husband of the get, and the acceptance of it by the wife, at the Beth Din in London effectively and finally dissolved their marriage according to Israeli law. This was an extra-judicial proceeding and, if the matter stopped there, it would have no validity in English law by reason of the provisions of section 16(1) of the Domicile and Matrimonial Proceedings Act 1973. This provides:

3 W.L.R.

Maples v. Maples (Fam.D.)

Latey J.

A "No proceeding in the United Kingdom, the Channel Islands or the Isle of Man shall be regarded as validly dissolving a marriage unless instituted in the courts of law of one of those countries."

B It is a simple, straightforward enactment. The proceeding in the Beth Din, London, was not a proceeding instituted in an English court of law. It is, no doubt, because of this that the guidance issued by the Jewish Marriage Council and the Beth Din, London stresses the importance, indeed the necessity, of obtaining a civil divorce in the courts.

C So, the get of 2 June 1977 is only valid in English law if there is some basis of recognition other than pursuant to the Domicile and Matrimonial Proceedings Act 1973. For Mr. Melamud it is contended that such basis is to be found in the Foreign Judgments (Reciprocal Enforcement) Act 1933. For the wife it is contended that the Act of 1933 does not provide any such basis.

Counsel remarked that the decision may have far-reaching implications for the Jewish community here, and probably for the Muslims and other communities, where there is extra-judicial "divorce." They have researched widely and have argued the case fully and helpfully.

D Mr. Morgan, for Mr. Melamud, bases his contention on a passage in the judgment of Sir John Arnold P. in the Court of Appeal in Vervaeke (formerly Messina) v. Smith [1981] Fam. 77, 125-126. In that passage Sir John Arnold P. sets out the relevant sections of the Act of 1933 which led him to the view that, contrary to its seeming tenor, the Act does apply to judgments of marital status.

E It is to be observed, first, that what Sir John Arnold P. said was obiter. Secondly, that on this particular point he was in a minority. Both Cumming-Bruce and Eveleigh L.JJ. were doubtful whether the Foreign Judgments (Reciprocal Enforcement) Act 1933 applied to matrimonial cases involving judgments of status. The fact that matrimonial causes are mentioned in the Act could be explained on the basis that money judgments in matrimonial causes are envisaged. Thirdly, the "judgment" in that case was a decree of nullity given in the Belgian courts.

F Mr. Morgan accepts that the get granted at the Beth Din was what dissolved the marriage in Israeli law, and that he cannot rely on that as dissolving the marriage in English law, or, of course, as something to which the Act of 1933 could apply. But he submits that the "judgment" in the Haifa court is covered by the Act.

G What did that "judgment" do? It did not dissolve the marriage. The marriage had already been dissolved in Israeli law by the get in England. That is agreed. All it did was to certify that the requirements for a valid get (valid, that is to say, in Israeli law) had been met at the Beth Din. It would be strange indeed, if that certification could be registered and recognised under the Foreign Judgments (Reciprocal Enforcement) Act 1933 as validly dissolving the marriage in English law.

H Mr. Holman argues that the whole ring and tenor of the Act of 1933 concerns commercial and tortious situations and the normal range of civil actions not involving status.

In the field of matrimonial law there are express statutory provisions dealing with validity and recognition of divorce and nullity decrees: the Recognition of Divorces and Legal Separations Act 1971, and the Domicile and Matrimonial Proceedings Act 1973. Are the provisions of those Acts outflanked by the Foreign Judgments (Reciprocal Enforcement) Act 1933? The language of the relevant parts of that Act, especially section 8(1), is convoluted and difficult to fathom, at any rate in this context. I am not alone in finding it so. Lord Reid described it as "obscure." In Black-Clawson International Ltd. v. Papierwerke Waldhof-Aschaffenburg A.G. [1975] A.C. 591, 617, Lord Reid said:

"It is said that the effect of these obscure words in section 8(1) is to make the section apply to all judgments which would come within the terms of section 1(2) if condition (b) were omitted. Besides the fact that this would be a very odd way of bringing in another section of the Act that cannot be right. If (b) is omitted then section 1(2) would apply to every kind of judgment including judgments on status and family matters and in rem. No one suggests that section 8 was meant to deal with them."

Those dicta were obiter but, coming from such a source, they are powerful and persuasive. Sir John Arnold P. in Vervaeke's case [1981] Fam. 77, 125, said that section 8 "is not framed so as to yield up its meaning easily or quickly." In Dicey and Morris, The Conflict of Laws, 10th ed. (1980), vol. 2, p. 1075 it is described as a "tortuously drafted provision."

In my opinion, it can indeed lead to the interpretation which Sir John Arnold P. reached in Vervaeke (formerly Messina) v. Smith [1981] Fam. 77. But if that is the correct interpretation it has odd results, some of which I have already described.

But in my judgment, looking at the relevant provisions as a whole, the correct interpretation is that the Foreign Judgments (Reciprocal Enforcement) Act 1933 does not apply to judgments of marital status.

As well as those already mentioned, there are other indications pointing in that direction. There are the words in section 8(1) "a judgment . . . shall be recognised . . . as conclusive between the parties thereto in all proceedings founded on the same cause of action . . ." A decree or judgment affecting marital status has a wider significance than solely to "the parties thereto." The state has an interest. So may others: children, for example. Nor is "cause of action" apt language for such proceedings. In the instant case, in fact, the "cause of action," if so it can be described, in these proceedings is not the same as that in the Rabbinical Court in Haifa.

Mr. Holman advanced some further supplementary arguments. I do not reject them, but I think it unnecessary to repeat them.

For the reasons already given, in my judgment the Act of 1933 does not apply to the Haifa judgment or certification. It follows that section 16(1) of the Domicile and Matrimonial Proceedings Act 1973 does apply, and that the get did not, in English law, validly dissolve the Israeli marriage. Accordingly, the ceremony of marriage with Mr. Maples was void and on that petition there will be a decree of nullity.

The marriage with Mr. Melamud has irretrievably broken down and they have lived apart for more than five years. On that petition there will be a decree nisi of divorce. There will be a declaration that there are the two relevant children and a certificate of satisfaction as to the arrangements for their care.

To provide for certain possibilities and contingencies, counsel have asked that there be findings as to the parties' domicile at material times. Evidence has been given and the position is clear, in my judgment: Mr. Melamud's domicile of origin was Israeli and he has at no time abandoned it; that is conceded. Mrs. Maples' father was and remained

A domiciled in England and that was her domicile of origin. She retained it until she married Mr. Melamud. In January 1974 she ceased to be dependently domiciled in Israel but in fact remained so until some time after she came, and then he came, to live in England later in 1974. In 1975 they bought their house in London. The marriage went wrong. Her domicile of choice withered away during those years, and before the Beth Din get she had reverted to her domicile of origin in England, and she has never abandoned it.

Decree of nullity granted on the wife's undefended petition.

CLAUSS AND ANOTHER v. PIR

[1985 P. No. 6528]

1986 Oct. 24

Francis Ferris Q.C. sitting as a deputy High Court judge

Practice—Discovery—Affidavit of documents—Power of attorney—Attorney swearing affidavit verifying defendant's documents—Whether defendant's duty to verify documents discharged—Powers of Attorney Act 1971 (c. 27), s.7(1)—R.S.C., Ord. 24, r. 3

The master in a probate action made an order, under R.S.C., Ord. 24, r.3, for discovery of documents verified by affidavit and to be served by 26 June 1986. The plaintiffs complied with the order but the defendant, who was a serving Pakistani army officer resident in Pakistan, failed to comply. A further order was made that unless the defendant complied with the order by 19 August 1986, he would be debarred from defending the action. The defendant's solicitors, in purported compliance with that order and in reliance on sections 7(1) and 10(1) of the Powers of Attorney Act 1971,¹ served a list of documents in prescribed form accompanied by an affidavit sworn by the defendant's wife which stated that she held a valid power of attorney.

On the plaintiffs' motion for judgment in the action on the ground that the defendant had not complied with the order and on the defendant's motion for extension of time if the order had not been complied with:—

Held, (1) that an order made under R.S.C., Ord. 24, r. 3, requiring discovery of documents to be verified by affidavit, imposed upon a principal a personal duty to swear the affidavit; that the power of an attorney under section 7 of the Powers of Attorney Act 1971 to execute an instrument and “do any other thing” in his own name, properly construed, merely provided an alternative procedure to enable an attorney to act in his own name on behalf of his principal in respect of such things as the principal could lawfully do by that attorney; and that, since the affidavit concerned matters about which only the defendant as principal was competent to depose, the defendant’s duty could not be delegated (post, pp. 496G, 498C–G).

S. 10(1): see post, p. 497B.

(2) That, since the defendant’s non-compliance had arisen out of a bona fide mistake and the plaintiffs would not suffer any inconvenience or hardship, the court would exercise its discretion to grant the defendant’s application for further time to comply with the order of the master (post, p. 499B–D).

No cases are referred to in the judgment and none were cited in argument.

MOTION

On 12 June 1986, Master Munrow made an order in a probate action requiring, inter alia, that lists of documents verified by affidavit be served on or before 26 June 1986 and inspection of the documents disclosed within seven days thereafter. The defendant, Qamar-Ud-Din Pir, did not comply with that order and, by summons dated 11 July 1986, the plaintiffs, Horst Clauss and Eva Maria Loise Daniels, applied to the master for further directions. Master Munrow made an order dated 29 July 1986, which by paragraph (2) stated that unless the defendant do on or before 4 p.m. on 19 August 1986 serve his list of documents verified by affidavit he be debarred from defending the action.

By notice of motion dated 19 September 1986 the plaintiffs sought judgment on the ground that the defendant had failed to comply with the order of 29 July and also an order that letters of administration of the estate of Ruth Aloisia Pir, deceased, late of 26, Cheniston Gardens, Kensington, London W.8 be granted to the plaintiffs’ lawful attorney, Rudolph Graupner.

By notice of motion dated 3 October 1986 the defendant sought an order that if the court decided that he had failed to comply with paragraph (2) of the order of 29 July then paragraph (2) be varied so as to grant an extension of time for compliance with the order of 29 July to six weeks from the hearing of the notice to enable the solicitors acting on behalf of the defendant to contact the defendant personally and have the affidavit sworn in Pakistan. In the alternative that if the defendant’s solicitors were to swear the affidavit and exhibit thereto and thereby comply with the order of Master Munrow that the order be varied so as to grant an extension of time for compliance of the same to 24 hours from the hearing of the notice to enable the defendant’s solicitors to swear and serve the same.

The facts are stated in the judgment.

Ian Karsten for the plaintiffs.

Steven Whitaker for the defendant.

FRANCIS FERRIS Q.C. I have before me two motions in this action. The first is a motion on behalf of the plaintiffs, whereby they seek judgment in the action on the ground that the defendant has not

3 W.L.R.

Clauss v. Pir (Ch.D.)

Francis Ferris Q.C.

A complied with an order that in default of doing certain things in relation to discovery which I will mention later he should be debarred from defending the action. The second motion is on behalf of the defendant and it is put on the following basis. The defendant denies that he has failed to comply with the order I have just mentioned, but if he be wrong about that he asks for further time for compliance.

B The action is a probate action. The plaintiffs claim to be the next of kin of a Mrs. Pir and they claim that she died intestate and that they are entitled to a grant. The defendant claims to be the adopted son of Mrs. Pir and, though I have not seen his defence and counterclaim, I understand the nature of his contentions in the action is that he claims, in the event of intestacy, to be entitled to a grant of letters of administration in priority to the plaintiffs. Alternatively, he relies upon
C an instrument which apparently relates to his adoption as being a will, in which event presumably he will be entitled either to probate of the will or to letters of administration with the will annexed.

D The action was commenced by a writ on 5 December 1985 and it proceeded in the normal way down to the close of pleadings, which happened on 17 March 1986. Neither side then gave discovery in accordance with R.S.C., Ord. 24, r. 2, but at the instance of the defendant a summons for directions was taken out and came before Master Munrow on 12 June 1986, when he made an order, amongst other things, that lists of documents verified by affidavit be served on or before 26 June 1986 and that there be inspection within seven days thereafter.

E That order was drawn up and, although the defendant seems to complain of some delay, it was in fact served on the defendant's solicitors under cover of a letter of 23 June 1986. On 24 June the plaintiffs' list of documents was served on the defendant's solicitors, accompanied by a verifying affidavit in the form required by the rules, to which I shall refer, that affidavit being sworn by the plaintiffs' solicitors.

F The defendant's solicitors were in some difficulty about giving discovery, partly because some of the documents of which discovery had to be given were in Germany and when received were in the German language and had to be translated before it could be determined whether they were, in truth, discoverable; and partly because the defendant, who is, I understand, an officer in the Pakistan Army, was not resident in this country and was resident in Pakistan.

G Mindful of that difficulty, the defendant's solicitors indicated in a letter of 15 July 1986 that they proposed that the verifying affidavit should be sworn not by the defendant but by his attorney. They did not identify the attorney at that stage, but it appears that the defendant had given a statutory general power of attorney to his wife on 19 July 1985. The plaintiffs' solicitors did not at that stage protest that a verifying affidavit sworn by the attorney for the party giving discovery would not
H comply with the order.

In view of the fact that the time for giving discovery specified in the order of 12 June 1986 had expired on the 26 June and that discovery had still not been given some weeks later, the plaintiffs' solicitors applied to Master Munrow on 29 July 1986 for further orders. The relevant part of the order which Master Munrow made on 29 July was that unless the defendant on or before 4 p.m. on 19 August 1986 serve his list of documents verified by affidavit he would be debarred from defending this action. That order was duly drawn up and, no doubt, served. A

The defendant's solicitors then on, I think, 19 August served on the plaintiffs' solicitors a list of documents in the usual form, dated 18 August, accompanied by an affidavit sworn by the defendant's wife on 18 August. That affidavit is substantially in the form prescribed by the rules, except that an additional paragraph was added to that form in which the deponent stated: "I am the wife of the defendant in this action and hold a valid power of attorney." B

On receipt of that affidavit and the list, the plaintiffs' solicitors wrote on 20 August acknowledging receipt, but asserting that the defendant had not complied with the order of Master Munrow as the verifying affidavit was neither sworn by the defendant nor by his solicitor. They said: "We shall therefore treat the defendant as being debarred from defending this action." C

In a letter of 27 August the defendant's solicitors took issue with the plaintiffs' solicitors on this matter and on 19 September the plaintiffs' solicitors issued a notice of motion, seeking judgment on the grounds of non-compliance with Master Munrow's order of 29 July. That is the first application which I have to consider.

On 3 October the defendant's solicitors served a notice of motion seeking, as I say, an extension of time for complying with Master Munrow's order in case the defendant should be held not to have complied with it. D

The first question which I have to consider is whether it is in fact in compliance with Master Munrow's order for a verifying affidavit to be sworn by an attorney for a party and not by the party himself. The rule under which Master Munrow's order was made was R.S.C., Ord. 24, r.3, under which the court may order any party to a cause or matter to make and serve on any other party a list of the documents which are or have been in his possession, custody or power relating to any matter in question in the cause or matter and may, at the same time or subsequently, also order him to make and file an affidavit verifying such a list and to serve a copy thereof on the other party. E F

By Ord. 24, r.5, it is provided that a list of documents made in compliance with rule 3 of that order must be in form no. 26 in Appendix A; and by Ord. 24, r.5(3) an affidavit made as aforesaid verifying a list of documents must be in form no. 27 in Appendix A. If one looks at the form no. 27 one finds that the prescribed form is as follows: "I, the above mentioned plaintiff [or defendant] . . . make oath and say as follows" and then follow some paragraphs relating to "statements made by me" in various paragraphs of the list. G

In my judgment there cannot really be any doubt that Ord. 24, r. 5, imposes an obligation on the relevant party personally and when there is provision for an affidavit to be made "by him" that means that the order requires an affidavit to be made by that party. Of course, by implication or otherwise these provisions have to be modified in relation to companies which have no persona which would enable the company to swear an affidavit, but I do not think the need for a modification in relation to artificial persons affects the principle. H

Up to this point, as I understand it, both sides are really at one. The argument which has been put before me by Mr. Whittaker, on behalf of the defendant, is that although an order against a party, in this case the defendant, personally requires the defendant to do something, a party is

3 W.L.R.

Clauss v. Pir (Ch.D.)

Francis Ferris Q.C.

A at liberty to do that thing by an attorney. He says that the apparently not unusual practice under which solicitors swear verifying affidavits on behalf of their clients is contrary to the rule, but there is a difference between a solicitor in his capacity as agent of a party and an attorney who is appointed formally.

B He referred me to two sections of the Powers of Attorney Act 1971. First to section 10(1), which created for the first time a statutory general power of attorney and provides:

C “Subject to subsection (2) of this section, a general power of attorney in the form set out in Schedule 1 to this Act, or in a form to the like effect but expressed to be made under this Act, shall operate to confer—(a) on the donee of the power; . . . authority to do on behalf of the donor anything which he can lawfully do by an attorney.”

D If the matter rested there, that subsection would not, I apprehend, suffice for Mr. Whittaker’s purposes because although the defendant’s wife had a statutory general power of attorney the section creates in the donee power merely to do on behalf of the donor “anything which he can lawfully do by an attorney.” It is necessary to go further and ask:

E “Can the principal in this case lawfully by an attorney discharge his obligation to swear a verifying affidavit?”

F What a principal can lawfully do by an attorney is summarised in Halsbury’s Laws of England, 4th ed., vol. 1 (1973), p. 420, para. 703:

G “It may be stated as a general proposition that whatever a person has a power to do himself he may do by means of an agent. The converse proposition similarly holds good that what a person cannot do himself he cannot do by means of an agent. It is, in general, necessary to ascertain who is legally competent to act or contract in order to know who is competent to be a principal. There are, however, two exceptions to the general rule that a person may do by means of an agent whatever he has power to do himself, and these are . . .”

F and then there is an exception where statute requires the evidence of a signature of the principal. The second exception is:

G “where the competency to do the act arises by virtue of the holding of some public office or by virtue of some power, authority, or duty of a personal nature and requiring skill or discretion for its exercise . . .”

and then the paragraph goes on with an example which is not material.

It appears from that passage that a party cannot do by an attorney some act the competency to do which arises by virtue of some duty of a personal nature requiring skill or discretion for its exercise.

H It might be thought that the obligation to swear a verifying affidavit which requires the deposing party to apply his mind to matters which are or should be within his own knowledge (and, amongst other things, to make the very important statement on oath that there are not and have not been in his possession, custody or power any documents relevant to the action apart from those which are disclosed) is a clear example of a duty of a personal nature requiring skill or discretion for its exercise. But Mr. Whittaker says that that does not apply in the present case because section 7 of the Act of 1971 provides the very widest power for the donee of a power of attorney to do things on behalf of his principal. Section 7(1) reads:

“The donee of a power of attorney may, if he thinks fit—
(a) execute any instrument with his own signature and, where sealing is required, with his own seal, and (b) do any other thing in his own name, by the authority of the donor of the power; . . .”

and then it goes on to deal with documents, which I do not read.

Mr. Whittaker relies upon the words in section 7(1)(b): “do any other thing in his own name” and, as I understand Mr. Whittaker’s argument, he says that these words constitute statutory authority for the proposition that an attorney can do anything which the principal can do.

In my judgment that is not correct. Properly understood, I think section 7 is very much more limited. Apart from section 7, as I understand the law, the correct mode in which a donee of a power of attorney should act is to express himself to be acting in the name of his principal and to sign, where signing is required, not the donee’s name but the principal’s name.

What section 7 does is to provide an alternative procedure for the attorney to act on behalf of the principal. The procedure is as follows. Where the act requires the execution of an instrument the attorney is empowered to use his own signature instead of his principal’s signature. Where a seal is needed he may use his own seal not his principal’s seal. And where some other thing is to be done he may do it not in the name of his principal but, as an alternative, in his, the donee’s name. That, in my judgment, is all that section 7 does. It does not enlarge the scope of the things which may be done by the donee of a power of attorney on behalf of his principal: it is merely procedural.

Just as section 10 gives the donee of a power authority to do only such things as the principal can lawfully do by his attorney, so the procedure made available by section 7 is a procedure which is available only to enable the donee to do things which the principal can do by his attorney.

Accordingly, if, as I think, an order under R.S.C., Ord. 24, r. 3, on the face of it requires the principal to do what is mentioned in the order, that is a personal duty which he alone can perform because of the personal knowledge which is required. After all, he is being compelled to give a particular form of evidence and in no other field would it be possible to say that a party may give evidence through an attorney. If the obligation under Ord. 24, r. 3(3), must be performed personally, there is nothing in the Act of 1971 to change that. The order which was made by Master Munrow in this case on 29 July 1986 required the defendant to serve a list of documents verified by affidavit. The requirement that he should serve his list verified by affidavit is not something which can be delegated. It required the defendant to do something personally which cannot be done by means of an attorney.

It follows that, in my judgment, the defendant has failed to comply with the order of Master Munrow and that, on the face of it, the debarring order has had effect. There is, however, no doubt that I can extend the time for compliance with the order to serve a list of documents verified by affidavit even though the original time for compliance has expired and Mr. Whittaker asks me to extend that time.

At the end of the day this application was not seriously opposed by Mr. Karsten, subject to the question of costs, so I do not feel I have to

3 W.L.R.

Claus v. Pir (Ch.D.)

Francis Ferris Q.C.

A discuss the various grounds to any great extent. It seems to be abundantly clear that this is a case where the discretion to extend the time ought to be exercised. There is a reason for non-compliance, namely, the difficulty in contacting the defendant personally, coupled with what I have now held to be the erroneous belief that it was not B necessary to do so because the affidavit of the attorney sufficed. On the other side, it is not possible to point to any inconvenience or hardship which the plaintiffs would suffer if time was extended and it would clearly be wrong to drive the defendant from the judgment seat once and for all because of what I have taken to be a bona fide mistake as to what the order of Master Munrow required.

C Accordingly, I have no hesitation in exercising my discretion so as to extend the time for compliance. The defendant asks for six weeks, which might perhaps be thought to be a rather long time having regard to the time which has already elapsed, but I recognise that during that time there was a dispute as to whether there has been compliance or not. It seems to me that it really is not going to make much difference whether I give the defendant six weeks or four weeks, as I might otherwise have been inclined to do. The better course is to grant the application as D asked and to allow six weeks. Of course, that carries with it the implication that if there is not compliance within that period, being a period which is the defendant's own suggestion, the consequences may be serious.

Accordingly, the conclusion which I reach is to extend the time for the defendant's compliance with paragraph 2 of the order of Master Munrow of 29 July to six weeks from today.

E The only other matter is the question of costs, on which I would in the ordinary way have invited further submissions from counsel, but as they have already made their submissions to me I propose to indicate my views now. Although I can see the force of the argument that this is a very technical matter, I have to look at it in the context that the defendant has chosen to stand pat on a contention which I rejected as being wrong: that there had been compliance. If the defendant had F decided to take the more cautious line of immediately applying for an extension of time for verifying the list of documents by means of an affidavit sworn by his solicitor, which is what the plaintiffs impliedly invited him to do (though it was in my view an erroneous invitation), then I would have seen more readily that today's application by the plaintiffs was of technical merit only. But it seems to me that as the G result of the defendant having chosen to stand pat on a contention, which I have held to be wrong (namely that he complied with the order)
I ought to say that the costs of both motions before me should be paid by the defendant in any event.

Order accordingly.

PEREZ-ADAMSON v. PEREZ-RIVAS AND ANOTHER

1987 March 26

Dillon, Stephen Brown and Nicholls L.JJ.

Husband and Wife—Property—Adjustment order—Registration of pending action—Property not specified in application for adjustment order—Registration by wife as pending action in respect of matrimonial home—Husband obtaining bank loan secured by charge on matrimonial home—Whether wife's claim taking priority over charge to bank—Land Charges Act 1972 (c. 61), s. 5(7)

B

Following the break down of the parties' marriage, the wife left the matrimonial home, which was owned solely by the husband. In her petition for the dissolution of the marriage, she sought ancillary relief, including a property adjustment order but without specifying any particular property. Thereafter she registered her claim as a pending action pursuant to section 5 of the Land Charges Act 1972,¹ describing the former matrimonial home as the property to be charged. A few weeks later the husband applied to the bank for a bridging loan, falsely stating that he required it for the purpose of purchasing a property for his wife as part of the divorce settlement, and he offered the bank a legal charge on the former matrimonial home as security. The bank was unaware of the wife's claim and moreover, failed to make a search at the Land Charges Registry. The bank granted the husband the loan which was secured by a first legal charge on the matrimonial home. Thereafter the husband realised all his assets in the United Kingdom and left the jurisdiction without repaying the bank's loan. He took no further part in the proceedings. On the wife's application, the bank having been made party to the proceedings, the judge made an order setting aside the bank's mortgage on the matrimonial home.

E

On appeal by the bank:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that the purpose of particularising the property to be charged was for the protection of those dealing with the owner of the property, and that purpose was fulfilled if the property was particularised at the time of registration of the charge; that the wife had identified the property to be charged by registering her lis pendens under section 5 of the Act of 1972, and that, accordingly, her claim took priority over all other subsequent transactions in respect of that property, including the bank's charge, notwithstanding that the property adjustment order was sought in general terms and that the bank had acted in good faith without notice of the wife's claim (post, pp. 504A–C, F, 506D–H, 507C–E).

 Grantham, Lincolnshire, dated on or about 1 July 1985 be set aside. On 5 December 1985 the bank was granted leave at the Family Division of Lincoln District Registry to be joined as a party to the proceedings. On 12 September 1986 Judge Hutchinson sitting as a High Court judge in the Family Division at Lincoln District Registry, ordered that the legal financial relief within the meaning of section 37 of the Matrimonial

- G DILLON L.J. This is an appeal by the third party, Barclays Bank Plc., against an order of His Honour Judge Hutchinson, sitting as a judge of the High Court, made on 12 September 1986. It arises in relation to proceedings in the Family Division between Mrs. Juliet Mary Perez-Adamson, the petitioner, and Mr. Leobardo Perez-Rivas, the respondent, formerly husband and wife.

- H The husband came from abroad but had, until the matters in question, made his home with the wife in this country, latterly at a property called Heydour Priory, Heydour, near Grantham in Lincolnshire.
 The husband and wife had been married in December 1970, and since January 1974 the husband had been a customer of the bank at its Grantham branch. The marriage, however, unfortunately broke down.
 The wife left Heydour Priory, and on 4 June 1985 she presented a petition in the Lincoln County Court whereby she prayed for the dissolution of the marriage and to be granted custody of the four children of the marriage. She also asked, in the usual general terms, for ancillary relief, which included, without specifying any particular property, a property adjustment order.

Having issued her petition, she applied to the court on the next day for various injunctions which are not directly relevant to these proceedings, but, in addition, she also applied through her solicitors to the Land Charges Registry for the registration of a pending action under section 5 of the Land Charges Act 1972 in respect of her claim for ancillary relief. The registration was effected on 7 June 1985, and the property charged is described as Heydour Priory, Heydour, Grantham. That was obviously defined by the application for the registration.

On 18 June 1985 notice to proceed with the application for ancillary relief was duly issued by the wife's solicitors returnable on 9 July 1985. That, for present purposes, is franked by the prayer in the petition. Then on 21 June the husband went to see the bank's manager at the Grantham branch, a Mr. Sargeant, and he sought a loan from the bank on the security of the property Heydour Priory. Mr. Sargeant regarded the husband as a reliable businessman and a blue-chip customer, and his evidence is that at his meeting with the husband, the husband told him that the husband and the wife had decided to separate; that their affairs were being sorted out amicably; and that the husband wished to purchase a property for the wife as part of the settlement of their affairs. He asked, therefore, for a bridging loan of £50,000 (later increased to £60,000) to purchase such a property. He said he had not yet found a suitable property, but he wanted the cash to be available to facilitate a speedy purchase when the right property was found. A bridging loan was therefore arranged for a period of 12 months to be secured by a first legal charge on the property. The husband was the sole legal owner of the property. The husband apparently told the bank manager that he had about £100,000 worth of investments, but that there might be disadvantages in realising investments to repay the bank's loan because they had been recently purchased and realisation would result in a loss.

It was a plausible explanation; it was untrue. What the husband was in fact doing was realising as many of his assets as he possibly could and sending the money, via another bank account of which the wife did not know, out of the jurisdiction of this court. In this he was successful.

On 4 July 1985 a legal charge on Heydour Priory in favour of the bank was duly executed by the husband. On 8 July £50,000 of the agreed advance of £60,000 was drawn down by the husband. The balance of the advance was drawn out shortly afterwards. The bank accepted the legal charge and made the advance without making any search in the Land Charges Registry. Consequently, the bank did not actually know that the wife had effected the registration of the lis pendens under section 5 of the Act of 1972.

The bank found out, however, not very long afterwards, that the husband was not acting honestly. It was, of course, by that time too late to recall the money which the husband had had. I need not go further into the history of the husband's misdoings; he has played no part in the proceedings before the judge or in this court; he remains outside the jurisdiction with the money which he has succeeded in taking outside the jurisdiction and also, in breach of orders of the court, with the children of the marriage.

What came before the judge on the occasion on which he made his order were the wife's applications for ancillary relief, including application for a property adjustment order in respect of Heydour Priory and another property, and also an application by the wife to set aside the

A mortgage in favour of the bank under section 37 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973. That section starts with a definition of "financial relief" as including relief under any of certain provisions of the Act which are referred to in the section and which include the statutory provision for making property adjustment orders. Section 37 provides:

“(2) Where proceedings for financial relief are brought by one person against another, the court may, on the application of the first-mentioned person—(a) if it is satisfied that the other party to the proceedings is, with the intention of defeating the claim for financial relief, about to make any disposition or to transfer out of the jurisdiction or otherwise deal with any property, make such order as it thinks fit for restraining the other party from so doing or otherwise for protecting the claim; (b) if it is satisfied that the other party has, with that intention, made a reviewable disposition and that if the disposition were set aside financial relief or different financial relief would be granted to the applicant, make an order setting aside the disposition; (c) if it is satisfied, in a case where an order has been obtained under any of the provisions mentioned in subsection (1) above by the applicant against the other party, that the other party has, with that intention, made a reviewable disposition, make an order setting aside the disposition; . . . (4) Any disposition made by the other party to the proceedings for financial relief in question (whether before or after the commencement of those proceedings) is a reviewable disposition for the purposes of subsection (2)(b) and (c) above unless it was made for valuable consideration (other than marriage) to a person who, at the time of the disposition, acted in relation to it in good faith and without notice of any intention on the part of the other party to defeat the applicant's claim for financial relief.”

It is common ground in these proceedings, in so far as it is material, that the legal charge in favour of the bank was made for valuable consideration and that the bank acted in relation to it in good faith. It is also clear that the bank had no express notice of any intention on the part of the husband to defeat the wife's claim for financial relief. The case turns on the effect of the registration under section 5 of the Act of 1972.

The first point that is taken by Mr. Lightman for the bank is that there was nothing capable of being registered under section 5 because the land in respect of which the wife was seeking a property adjustment order had not been identified in the proceedings between the wife and the husband at the time the registration was effected. He refers to some observations by Sir Robert Megarry V.-C. in Sowerby v. Sowerby (1982) 44 P. & C.R. 192, where the Vice-Chancellor considered at the end of his judgment that where the claim in the matrimonial proceedings was not particularised it could not be said that there was an action or a proceeding relating to land within the meaning of section 5. He said that a lis pendens must involve a claim in relation to specific property. But, having expressed his doubts and expressed, further, the view that, if a procedure was adopted in the Family Division for obtaining an order requiring a proper specification of the property in question, the doubts would be resolved, he left the matter there, recognising that he had not heard the matter fully argued out.

If it is open to a wife, for instance, who has in the usual form sought a property adjustment order without indicating what property she has in mind in the petition for divorce, to particularise in the divorce proceedings by specifying the particular property, whether in response to a demand from her husband's advisers or not, it seems to me that what one has got in the petition is a general claim to a property adjustment order in respect of any property the husband might own, which the wife has in this case particularised, so far as Heydour Priory is concerned, in her application to the Land Charges Registry to register the lis pendens in respect of that property. I see no need for any further particularisation. The need that the property should be particularised arises for the protection of those dealing with the owner of the property and it is satisfied if there is a registration in respect of a particular property. Because of the provisions of the Land Charges Act 1972, persons dealing with the owner will not be prejudiced if they are dealing in respect of a property which has not been the subject of any registration. Therefore I would reject that point of Mr. Lightman's which would indeed, if valid, seem to upset the established practice in the Family Division. I see no reason why more should be required of an applicant wife in that respect.

Then comes the question: what is the effect of a registration under section 5 of the Land Charges Act 1972? It is referred to as a registration in the register of pending actions, and it seems that registration of pending actions by the term lis pendens goes back as far as the Judgments Act 1839. Section 5(7) of the Act of 1972 provides that "A pending land action"—that is the description of what is to be registered—"shall not bind a purchaser without express notice of it unless it is for the time being registered under this section." Section 198(1) of the Law of Property Act 1925 provides:

"The registration of any instrument or matter under the provisions of the Land Charges Act 1925, or any enactment which it replaces, in any register kept at the land registry or elsewhere, shall be deemed to constitute actual notice of such instrument or matter, and of the fact of such registration, to all persons and for all purposes connected with the land affected, as from the date of registration . . . and so long as the registration continues in force."

The clear implication, as it seems to me, from section 5(7) is that a pending land action does bind a purchaser, even if he has no express notice of it, if it is for the time being registered under the section. The term "pending land action" is defined in section 17 of the Act of 1972 as meaning "any action or proceeding pending in court relating to land or any interest in or charge on land." "Land" is widely defined, but does not include an undivided share in land. That definition was considered by Megarry J. in Calgary and Edmonton Land Co. Ltd. v. Dobinson [1974] Ch. 102. He said, at p. 107:

"As for more general considerations, it seems to me that once it is accepted (as it has been) that some restriction must be placed on the wide statutory language, the question becomes one of what restriction is most consonant with the language and general purposes of the statute, and with common sense and practicability. The rights made registrable under the Land Charges Act 1972, as under the Land Charges Act 1925, are in general substantive rights in the land. Those with specified rights or claims to the land or any

Perez-Adamson v. Perez-Rivas (C.A.)

Dillon L.J.

A interest in it must register those rights or claims (and so give warning to purchasers) or else suffer the consequences of failure to register. What is protected is some substantive right adverse to the owner, rather than a mere fetter on the owner's rights of disposition.
... What is registrable as a pending land action is an action or proceeding which claims some proprietary right in the land, and not B an action merely claiming that the owner should be restrained from exercising his powers of disposition." (Emphasis added).

The effect of that, because otherwise there is no point in having registration to give warning to purchasers, seems to me to be that the claim, if it be a claim rather than a present right which is being protected, will bind the purchaser once registration has been effected, so long as the registration subsists.

C The position of registration of claims for ancillary relief was considered by the courts in Whittingham v. Whittingham (National Westminster Bank Ltd., intervenor) [1979] Fam. 9. What that case actually decided was that, where a wife had applied in divorce proceedings for an order that a certain property be transferred to her but she had not effected any registration of the claim as a pending D action and her husband subsequently charged the property in favour of a bank, the wife could not apply to set aside the charge because her claim under section 24 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973 for the transfer of the property was not binding on the bank. Of course registration of such a claim for a property adjustment order could only arise after a divorce petition has been presented, and there may well be cases in which the avoidance transaction, or, as it is put in section 37, "the reviewable E disposition," has been made before the petition was presented. In those cases all that will have to be considered where a third party is concerned is whether the third party gave valuable consideration and at the time of the disposition acted in relation to it in good faith and without notice of any intention on the part of the other party to defeat the applicant's claim for financial relief. Where, however, there has been a registration, F the position is not quite the same. Balcombe J., having given his reasons in Whittingham v. Whittingham [1979] Fam. 9 at first instance for concluding that on the facts of that case the wife's claim for ancillary relief was not binding on the bank, said, at p. 18:

"I do not believe that the practical effect of this judgment will be seriously to prejudice the ability of a spouse, usually a wife, to set aside a reviewable disposition of land under section 37. Where a G party has applied for a transfer of property order, registration of that application as a pending land action should afford an effective protection against any future disposition."

When that case came to this court the decision of Balcombe J. was affirmed. Stamp L.J. giving the leading judgment of this court said, at H p. 21:

"I am bound to say that considering the matter without the aid of authority I would not feel much hesitation in holding that a summons to obtain the transfer of a specified property under section 24 does relate to that property. Furthermore, it appears to me desirable that a wife who has issued such a summons should be able to safeguard the property, pending hearing of the application, by registering a lis. If this is not so, she is placed in the unenviable position of having to establish that a transaction which subsequently takes place by way of sale or mortgage is a reviewable disposition within section 37, involving litigation in which the good faith of the purchaser or mortgagee and the question whether he had notice of the wife's intention fall to be considered. Such questions are not usually at all easy to decide; in fact it was because of the difficulties involved in establishing whether a purchaser or mortgagee had or had not constructive notice of a particular dealing with land that the policy of registration of interests in land was brought into force by the effect of the Land Charges Acts. The right of a wife or husband to apply for a transfer of property under section 24 is of recent origin, and I can see no good reason for not regarding a summons to obtain a transfer of a particular property as one which does relate to that property."

Orr L.J. agreed.

The position therefore is that the long-established procedure for the registration of a lis pendens has to be married with the code under the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973 for property adjustment as between spouses. The Land Charges Act 1972 also includes provisions for the registration of various other property rights or interests which have in some cases been previously the subject of registrations under quite different statutes.

Taking the whole together, I would accept the view of Stamp L.J. that the code, as we now have it, has the effect that the registration of the lis pendens in respect of the wife's claim for property adjustment gives her priority over any subsequent conveyance or mortgage of the property executed by the husband. Mr. Lightman urges that that is only so if the other party to the transaction, being supposed to know of the claim for ancillary relief and the property adjustment order, is to be held to have had notice of intention on the part of the husband to defeat the wife's claim for financial relief. If the bank or other third party, not having actual knowledge of the registration and of the existence of the claim for ancillary relief, did not ask any questions, it might be difficult to establish that it had notice of an intention on the part of the husband to defeat the claim for ancillary relief. If the bank or third party did ask but was given a specious but untruthful answer, it would be well nigh impossible for a court to hold that the bank or other third party had the requisite notice of the husband's intention. There would be a very serious lacuna in the protection for the wife which Stamp L.J. thought so desirable.

In my judgment there is no such lacuna, and so, for these reasons which are substantially the same as those which the judge in the court below gave, I would dismiss the appeal because the wife's claim for a property adjustment order has priority to the bank's charge and the wife has obtained, from the order of the judge now under appeal an order for the transfer of the proceeds of the property to her. The property was sold pending the hearing, it being common ground that neither spouse was then occupying it.

I would dismiss the appeal.

STEPHEN BROWN L.J. I agree, for the reasons given by Dillon L.J. that this appeal should be dismissed.

NICHOLLS L.J. I agree. In Whittingham v. Whittingham [1979] Fam.

3 W.L.R.

Perex-Adamson v. Perez-Rivas (C.A.)

Nicholls L.J.

A 9, this court decided that proceedings in which a property adjustment order is sought under section 24 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973 are, to the extent to which they relate to land, a pending land action within section 5 of the Land Charges Act 1972. The court reached that conclusion notwithstanding that until the property adjustment order is made, the applicant under section 24 has not, or may not have, a subsisting proprietary interest in the land in question.

B The effect of registration of a pending land action in the register of pending actions is, as provided in section 198(1) of the Law of Property Act 1925, that the registration is "deemed to constitute actual notice of [the] . . . matter . . . to all persons and for all purposes connected with the land affected . . ." In this case the "matter" consists of the proceedings in which the property transfer order is being claimed.

C In my view the effect of these statutory provisions is that, when the bank took a charge over the property after the registration of a pending land action had been made in the present case in respect of the property, that charge ranked behind the claims made by the wife with regard to that property in the pending petition. Any other view would fly in the face of the purpose intended to be achieved by registration. If what is registrable is, as here, a subsisting claim under a statute which D enables the property or an interest therein to be transferred to the petitioner or to others, it seems to me to follow that what is intended to be protected by that registration, by means of all persons being deemed to have actual notice, is that claim. Accordingly, if that claim ultimately results in a property transfer order, a person who was deemed to have actual notice of that claim when he acquired his interest ranks behind E the interest in the land which the court orders to be transferred to the petitioner or other person in accordance with section 24 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973. Accordingly, in this case the bank's charge ranks behind the interest in the property ordered to be transferred to the wife, and it does so without any recourse needing to be had to section 37 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973.

F I too would dismiss this appeal.

Company—Receiver—International organisation—Organisation created by treaty—Headquarters of organisation in United Kingdom—Organisation insolvent—Whether jurisdiction in court to appoint receiver by way of equitable execution over organisation's rights against member states—Supreme Court Act 1981 (c. 54), s. 37(1)

C

Between 29 August and 23 October 1985, the applicants, who were dealing members of the London Metal Exchange, entered into contracts with the International Tin Council (the "I.T.C."), an international organisation set up by treaty between Great Britain and a number of foreign sovereign states, which was currently constituted under the Sixth International Tin Agreement (the "Agreement") for the purchase and sale of tin. The I.T.C. defaulted. In an arbitration to which the I.T.C. submitted, the applicants obtained an award in their favour of £6,000,000 with taxed costs of £7,116. The award was not satisfied. Having obtained leave pursuant to section 26 of the Arbitration Act 1950 to enforce the award, the applicants, on 25 November 1986, entered judgment against the I.T.C. for £6,024,376, inclusive of interest. That judgment remained unsatisfied. By a notice of motion dated 9 December 1986, the applicants sought the appointment, under section 37¹ of the Supreme Court Act 1981 and R.S.C., Ord. 51, r. 1, of a receiver by way of equitable execution over the relevant assets of the I.T.C., which consisted of the right which it was said to have to be indemnified by or demand contributions from member states for its liabilities incurred to the applicants, for the purpose of satisfying the amounts due to them under the judgment which they had obtained. The notice of motion further sought an order that the receiver appointed be empowered, in the I.T.C.'s name, to make formal demands on the member states and to enforce payment, if necessary, by litigation in the English courts. By a notice of motion, as amended, dated 12 February 1987, the I.T.C. applied for the motion of 9 December 1986 to be struck out on the grounds, inter alia, that the court had no jurisdiction to determine the existence or otherwise of the alleged assets over which receivership was sought, namely rights of action against the I.T.C.'s member states, which would involve the interpretation and construction of a treaty between sovereign states, namely the Agreement.

On the hearing of the motions:—

Held, that while the court in principle possessed jurisdiction, not being debarred by any technical objection, to appoint a receiver by way of equitable execution over the relevant assets of the I.T.C., namely its possible claims to be indemnified by or to receive contributions from its member states, and while any such receiver could be given power to bring proceedings in the I.T.C.'s name, the applicants had failed to show any arguable case for contending that the I.T.C. had any cause of action

MOTIONS

By a notice of motion dated 9 December 1986, the applicants, Maclaine Watson & Co. Ltd., sought against the respondents, the International Tin Council (the "I.T.C.") the following relief, viz. (1) An order that Michael Anthony Jordan of Shelley House, 3 Noble Street, London E.C.2 or some other fit and proper person might be appointed receiver by way of equitable execution over those assets of the I.T.C. comprising the right of the I.T.C. to be indemnified by contributions from member governments for its liabilities incurred to the applicants, for the purpose of satisfying the amounts due to them under the judgment entered in the Queen's Bench Division (Commercial Court), (1986 M. No. 5388) on 13 November 1986; (2) an order that the receiver be empowered to make formal demand on the member states of the I.T.C. to demand contributions from and/or to indemnify it for the liabilities incurred to the applicants; (3) an order that the receiver be granted liberty to apply for such further or other directions and orders as he might be advised; (4) all necessary or consequential directions and orders, including directions as to the hearing of the applications by the I.T.C. for orders that the applicants' motion be struck out and costs. D E F

By a notice of motion dated 12 February 1987 (as amended), the I.T.C. moved that the application of 9 December by the applicants, be struck out or dismissed on the following grounds: (1) that it required determination of issues that were not justiciable in that the court, which had no jurisdiction to determine the existence or otherwise of the alleged assets over which receivership was sought, namely an alleged right or rights of action against member states of the I.T.C., which determination would involve the interpretation and construction of a treaty made between sovereign states. (2) The I.T.C. was immune from suit and legal process and, on the true construction of article 6(1) of the International Tin Council (Immunities and Privileges) Order 1972, not subject to the receivership jurisdiction of the court. (3) The appointment of a receiver of any such assets as alleged in the applicants' notice of motion would involve interference with the rights, privileges and functions of the I.T.C. whose status was that of an international organisation established by sovereign states and recognised under international law. (4) The appointment of a receiver would involve G H

3 W.L.R.

Maclaine Watson & Co. v. I.T.C. (Ch.D.)

A interference with and/or the interpretation of and/or adjudication upon international treaty-based transactions between, and the rights and obligations of, independent sovereign states. (4A) The court had no jurisdiction in any event to appoint a receiver either for the purpose of creating an asset (as by making a demand for contribution or indemnity) or in respect of an alleged right to exercise a power to make such a demand. (4B) Further, in any event the court had no jurisdiction to

B appoint a receiver by way of equitable relief except where the interest of the judgment debtor in the alleged asset was an equitable interest only which, if it had been a legal interest, could have been reached by execution at law. (5) Further, the relief sought was in respect of money alleged to be due or accruing due from the Crown and accordingly, by virtue of R.S.C., Ord. 77, r. 16, no order for the appointment of a

C receiver under R.S.C., Ord. 30 or Ord. 51 could be made. (6) In these circumstances the relief sought would never be granted by the court in any event. The I.T.C.'s motion further sought an order that the costs of their application be paid by the applicants.

By a notice of motion dated 24 March 1987 the applicants sought an order pursuant to R.S.C., Ord. 77, r. 16 restraining the I.T.C. from receiving the amount of the debt due or accruing due from the

D Department of Trade and Industry to the I.T.C. or so much thereof as would satisfy the debt due under the judgment entered in the Queen's Bench Division (Commercial Court) (1986 M. No. 5388) on 25 November 1986 for £6,024,376.40 and costs in the action in which the judgment was in favour of the applicants, and directing payment thereof and of the costs of this application by the Department of Trade and Industry to the E applicants.

The facts are stated in the judgment.

Mark Littman Q.C., Richard Aikens Q.C., Richard McCombe and Adrian Hughes for the applicants.

Robert Alexander Q.C., Richard Sykes Q.C., Nicholas Chambers Q.C., Rosalyn Higgins Q.C., Peter Irvin and Leslie Kosmin for the

F respondent, International Tin Council.

Sir Maurice Bathurst Q.C., Anthony Grabiner Q.C., John Mummery, Nicolas Bratza and David A. S. Richards for the Attorney-General.

Cur. adv. vult.

G 13 May. MILLETT J. read the following judgment. This is another application resulting from the failure of the International Tin Council ("the I.T.C.") to meet its obligations. For the factual background and for the relevant provisions of the Sixth International Tin Agreement ("the Agreement") under which the I.T.C. is presently constituted and of the International Tin Council (Immunities and Privileges) Order 1972, (S.I. 1972 No. 120), reference may be made to the previous application:

H In re International Tin Council [1987] 2 W.L.R. 1229.

The present applicants, Maclaine Watson & Co. Ltd., are ring dealing members of the London Metal Exchange. Between 29 August and 23 October 1985 they entered into contracts with the I.T.C. for the purchase and sale of tin. The I.T.C. defaulted on those contracts. The applicants' claims were referred to arbitration. The I.T.C. submitted to the jurisdiction of the arbitrators in all respects and participated fully in the arbitration. On 6 November 1986 the applicants obtained an award in their favour of £6,000,000, together with the costs of the award which were taxed and settled in the sum of £7,116.25.

The award was not satisfied. On 13 November 1986 the applicants obtained leave, pursuant to section 26 of the Arbitration Act 1950, to enforce the award in the same manner as a judgment or order to the same effect. On 25 November 1986 the applicants entered judgment against the I.T.C. for a total amount, inclusive of interest, of £6,024,376.40. The judgment remains unsatisfied.

The total debts of the I.T.C. to unsatisfied creditors amount to several hundred million pounds. It has assets in the United Kingdom, but its only substantial assets appear to consist of such rights, if any, as it may have to be indemnified by, or demand contributions from, its member states. It has to date made no demand upon them. In an endeavour to discover what other assets the I.T.C. may have against which their judgment could be enforced, the applicants have made an application under R.S.C., Ord. 48, r. 1. That application was refused by the master, whose decision is under appeal.

On 9 December 1986 the applicants made the application which is now before me for the appointment of a receiver by way of equitable execution over those assets of the I.T.C. which consist of the right which it is said to have to be indemnified by or demand contributions from its members for the purpose of satisfying the judgment. The applicants seek orders authorising the receiver, in the name of the I.T.C., to make formal demands upon the member states and to enforce payment if necessary by litigation in the English courts. One of the members is Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, and in the case of any claim of the I.T.C. to be indemnified by or demand contributions from the Crown the applicants seek an appropriate form of relief under R.S.C., Ord. 77, r. 16.

Meanwhile on 3 December 1986 the applicants, trying a different approach, issued a writ directly against the Department of Trade and Industry, as representing Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, claiming payment of the sum due. I shall call that action "the direct action." On 10 April 1987 the defendant served a notice of motion to strike out the writ in the direct action. That motion is due to be heard before me on 20 July. In the meantime, I understand that other creditors with arbitration awards in their favour have brought similar direct claims against the member states, and these claims are due to be heard in the Commercial Court later this month.

In the direct action, as in all the direct claims, the status of the I.T.C. in English law is likely to be of crucial importance. The commercial contracts for the sale and purchase of tin entered into by the I.T.C. were governed by English law, and the identity of the persons who can sue and be sued on such contracts must also be determined by that law: Maspons y Hermano v. Mildred, Goyeneche & Co. (1882) 9 Q.B.D. 530, 539. The I.T.C. was able to enter into the contracts in question, incur liabilities and suffer the arbitration award against it because paragraph 5 of the Order of 1972 provides that it shall have the legal capacities of a body corporate. If, however, as a matter of English law it has no sufficient legal personality of its own distinct from that of its members, then the liabilities which have resulted from those contracts may be the liabilities of its members enforceable directly against them. If, on the other hand, the I.T.C. has a sufficient legal personality of its own distinct from that of its members, not merely in international law

A but in English domestic law also, then the contracts in question were entered into by the I.T.C. and not by its members, and the resulting liabilities were the liabilities of the I.T.C. and not of its members. It is, of course, at least theoretically possible that even in these circumstances the members may be liable for the debts of the I.T.C., but that is another question.

B It is common ground in the present application that, as I said in the previous application (see [1987] 2 W.L.R. 1229, 1237–1238), the I.T.C. is an international organisation created by treaty with legal personality in international law on which the Order of 1972 has conferred the legal capacities of a body corporate; but it is not incorporated in the United Kingdom or anywhere else. At this point, however, the two sides part company. The applicants contend that the I.T.C.'s status in English law is exhaustively defined by the Order of 1972, under which it is an unincorporated organisation or association of member states with the legal capacities, but not the legal status, of a body corporate, and with no separate legal existence of its own. Mr. Alexander, who appeared for the I.T.C., contended that the existence of the I.T.C. with its own separate legal personality in international law is recognised by the Order of 1972 and that the English court must give effect to this. Since this would not be sufficient to avoid the liability of the members, Mr. Alexander presumably meant, although he did not in terms say, that the English court must give effect to the Order of 1972, not merely by recognising that the I.T.C. has legal personality in international law, but by according it similar personality in English domestic law. One obvious difficulty in the way of such an argument, of course, is that it would seem to be inconsistent with the express conferment on the I.T.C. of the legal capacities of a body corporate, a provision which would be unnecessary if it already had separate legal existence of its own.

E I did not find it necessary to decide this question on the previous application, and I deliberately left it open: see [1987] 2 W.L.R. 1229, 1239D–G. It is no more necessary now. Since it is likely to be crucial in the direct action and in the other direct claims, and has not been fully argued before me, I propose to say no more about it. I shall approach the present application simply on the basis of what is expressly stated in paragraphs 4 and 5 of the Order of 1972, namely, that the I.T.C. is an organisation which may or may not have its own separate legal existence in English law, of which Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom and the governments of foreign sovereign powers are members, and that it has the legal capacities of a body corporate.

G To succeed in the present application, the applicants must satisfy four conditions. They must show, first, that the court has jurisdiction to appoint a receiver by way of equitable execution over the relevant assets of the I.T.C.; secondly, that if a receiver were appointed he could be given power in the name of the I.T.C. to bring proceedings in the English courts against member states; thirdly, that there is at least an arguable case that the I.T.C. has an identifiable cause of action against its members; and, fourthly, that the relevant cause of action is justiciable by these courts. The argument in fact has centred largely on the first and third of these requirements.

(1) Jurisdiction to appoint a receiver by way of equitable execution

It was conceded before me that in a proper case the appointment of a receiver by way of equitable execution would represent a process for the enforcement of an arbitration award and thus fall within one of the exceptions from the immunity of the I.T.C. conferred by paragraph 6 of the Order of 1972. A number of technical grounds were put forward in the pleadings for contending that, even in the absence of the special features which the nature of the I.T.C. presents, this would not be a proper case for the appointment of a receiver; but in the end only two were relied on before me. It was submitted that the court has no jurisdiction to appoint a receiver by way of equitable execution except where the interest of the judgment debtor in the alleged asset is an equitable interest only which, if it had been a legal interest, could have been reached by execution at law. Alternatively, it was said that there must be some other difficulty, arising from the nature of the property, which precludes execution at law but which can be overcome by the appointment of a receiver. For the reasons which will appear, I reject the first but accept the second of these submissions.

The court's jurisdiction to appoint a receiver by way of equitable execution derives from section 37(1) of the Supreme Court Act 1981, which gives the court power to appoint a receiver "... in all cases in which it appears to the court to be just and convenient to do so." That subsection re-enacts in virtually identical terms section 45 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act 1925, which in turn replaced section 25(8) of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873; but it is well established that, despite the width of the language used, these statutory provisions did not confer on the court power to appoint a receiver by way of equitable execution in a case where prior to the Judicature Acts no court could have granted such relief.

In Bourne v. Colodense Ltd. [1985] I.C.R. 291, the plaintiff brought a test case against the defendants. After a hearing which lasted for 42 days, the trial judge dismissed the action with costs. The judge understood that the litigation was financed by the plaintiff's union. The union refused to pay the costs, and the plaintiff refused to ask it to do so. The Court of Appeal held that there was an arguable case that the plaintiff was entitled to an indemnity from his union against his liability to pay the defendants' costs, and that defendants were entitled to have a receiver appointed by way of equitable execution in order to make the necessary demand and take over the plaintiff's rights of action against the union.

In my judgment, on the present question that case is on all fours with the present. There, as here, the debtor's asset was a legal chose in action, namely, a claim to be indemnified on demand. The debtor refused to make the necessary demand or to enforce his claim. Execution at law was not available, for a claim to be indemnified is not an attachable debt and cannot be made the subject of a garnishee: Johnson v. Diamond (1855) 24 L.J.Ex. 217. This difficulty was overcome by the appointment of a receiver. In the course of his judgment, Dillon L.J. said in Bourne v. Colodense Ltd. [1985] I.C.R. 291, 302:

"The appointment of a receiver by way, as it is traditionally called, of equitable execution is a form of equitable relief to enforce payment of a judgment debt which the court may grant in the special circumstances of a particular case if, as in the present case, the recovery of the judgment debt by the more usual processes of execution or attachment of debts is not practicable. The remedy is, however, discretionary and it is plain that the court would not

Millett J.

- A appoint a receiver if the court were satisfied that the appointment would be fruitless because there was nothing for the receiver to get in."

- Mr. Alexander submitted that this passage states the law too widely. There is certainly abundant Court of Appeal authority for the propositions: (i) that the court has no jurisdiction to appoint a receiver by way of equitable execution merely because in all the circumstances it would be a more convenient mode of obtaining satisfaction of a judgment than the usual modes of execution: In re Shephard (1889) 43 Ch.D. 131 and Harris v. Beauchamp Brothers [1894] 1 Q.B. 801, 806–807; and (ii) that the special circumstances which would justify the making of an order must be such circumstances as would have enabled the Court of Chancery before the Judicature Acts to have intervened by way of injunction or the appointment of a receiver at the suit of the judgment creditor: Holmes v. Millage [1893] 1 Q.B. 551; Harris v. Beauchamp Brothers [1894] 1 Q.B. 801, 810; Edwards & Co. v. Picard [1909] 2 K.B. 903 and Morgan v. Hart [1914] 2 K.B. 183. These authorities show that what is required is that there should be some hindrance arising from the nature of the property which prevents the judgment creditor from obtaining execution at law, but which the appointment of a receiver can overcome. In In re Shephard, 43 Ch.D. 131, 135 Cotton L.J. said:

- E "But what he gets by the appointment of a receiver is not execution, but equitable relief, which is granted on the ground that there is no remedy by execution at law; it is a taking out of the way a hindrance which prevents execution at common law."

Citing this passage with approval in Morgan v. Hart [1914] 2 K.B. 183, 188, Buckley L.J. added:

- "Perhaps the expression 'hindrance' requires some explanation. The learned judge meant, I think, hindrance arising from the nature of the property."

- F In Edwards & Co. v. Picard [1909] 2 K.B. 903, 910 Buckley L.J. said:

"Equitable execution is relief given on the ground that there is no remedy by execution at law: it operates by removing a hindrance which prevents execution at law."

- G The principle was stated somewhat more widely by Vaughan Williams L.J. in Goldschmidt v. Oberrheinische Metallwerke [1906] 1 K.B. 373, 375:

"he must shew that the circumstances are such as to render it practically very difficult, if not impossible, to obtain any fruit of his judgment, unless what has been called equitable execution be granted to him."

- H It is not necessary for me to express any view whether this more liberal formulation is correct, since I am not concerned with a case where execution at law is merely difficult or impractical. It is impossible, for a claim by a judgment debtor to be indemnified by a third party is not susceptible to any process of legal execution.

Is it susceptible to equitable execution? Mr. Alexander's contention that a receiver by way of equitable execution cannot be obtained over property in which the judgment debtor has a legal, and not merely an equitable, interest was based almost entirely on a passage in the judgment of Lindley L.J. in Holmes v. Millage [1893] 1 Q.B. 551 where, giving the judgment of the court, he said, at p. 555:

“We have simply to deal with a case in which an ordinary judgment creditor sought the aid of a court of equity to enforce his judgment against property not capable of being reached by any common law process. The only cases of this kind in which courts of equity ever interfered were cases in which the judgment debtor had an equitable interest in property which could have been reached at law, if he had had the legal interest in it, instead of an equitable interest only.”

This was said to be supported by a passage in the judgment of Buckley L.J. in Edwards & Co. v. Picard [1909] 2 K.B. 903, to which I will come later.

In Holmes v. Millage [1893] 1 Q.B. 551 the plaintiff sought the appointment of a receiver over the future salary of the judgment debtor. The application was refused, not on the ground that the judgment debtor was entitled to his salary at law, but because a man's future salary is not attachable at law or in equity. The ratio of the case is to be found at p. 555:

“the existence of a legal right is essential to the exercise of this jurisdiction. The judgment creditor here has a legal right to be paid his debt, but not out of the future earnings of his debtor; and the Court of Chancery had no jurisdiction to prevent him from earning his living or from receiving his earnings, unless he had himself assigned or charged them.”

And at p. 557:

“In [Manchester and Liverpool District Banking Co. v. Parkinson (1888) 22 Q.B.D. 173] an order for a receiver was discharged, because there was no difficulty in enforcing payment of a judgment by the ordinary legal methods. In this case there is such a difficulty; but it does not arise from any impediment which the old Court of Chancery had jurisdiction to remove. The difficulty arises from the fact that future earnings are not by law attachable by any process of execution direct or indirect.”

In my judgment, the passage on which Mr. Alexander relied forms no part of the ratio of the case, and as a historical exposition is too narrowly stated. As Davey L.J. pointed out in Harris v. Beauchamp Brothers [1894] 1 Q.B. 801, 808, the most common case for the appointment of a receiver by way of equitable execution before the Judicature Acts was that described by Jessel M.R. in Anglo Italian Bank v. Davies (1878) 9 Ch.D. 275, but it was not the only case.

In Edwards & Co. v. Picard [1909] 2 K.B. 903 the plaintiffs sought the appointment of a receiver by way of equitable execution over a patent, but there was no evidence that the patent was being exploited or that the judgment debtor was in receipt of any royalties. The application was dismissed on the ground that there was no property of the judgment debtor for the receiver to receive. Buckley L.J. said, at p. 910:

“I fail to grasp what is meant by a receiver of a patent or of the profits of a patent which is not being worked. There is nothing receivable. A receiver could not sue for infringement, nor could he, I think, bring an action to enforce any right to use the patentee's

3 W.L.R.

Millett J.

A name to sue for infringement, nor could he work the patent and thus produce profits.”

A little earlier in his judgment, speaking of the patent, Buckley L.J. said, at p. 910:

B “It creates in him a right of action to prevent anyone else manufacturing. It creates in him a right to bring an action for infringement with resultant remedy by way of injunction, or damages, or both. This right is a legal right. There is no question of equity in the matter. This right must either be amenable to execution at law, or not at all. Equitable execution is relief given on the ground that there is no remedy by execution at law: it operates by removing a hindrance which prevents execution at law. There is here no hindrance for equity to remove. It is not a case in which the debtor has an equitable interest only in property which could have been reached at law if he had had the legal interest in it. The property is property in which he has the legal interest.”

D Mr. Alexander relied upon that passage, but, in my judgment, it provides no support for the thesis for which he was contending. Buckley L.J. was speaking of the right to bring an action for infringement. As he pointed out in the later passage which I have quoted from his judgment, a receiver could not sue for infringement. It was for that reason that the right in question “must either be amenable to execution at law or not at all.” It was, perhaps, not so much a case where there was no hindrance for equity to remove, but rather a case where there was a hindrance which even equity could not remove. In this context, it is clear that the last two sentences of the passage merely deal by way of contrast with the typical case; they are not intended to describe the only possible one.

E The test stated by Chitty J. in Westhead v. Riley (1883) 25 Ch.D. 413 is that there should be no way of getting at the fund except by the appointment of a receiver.

F No case has been cited to me in which a receiver has been refused on the ground that the judgment debtor had a legal interest in the property sought to be attached; and two cases, Goldschmidt v. Oberrheinische Metallwerke [1906] 1 K.B. 373 and Bourne v. Colodense Ltd. [1985] I.C.R. 291, have been cited in which a receiver was appointed over property in which the debtor had such an interest. In every case where the appointment has been refused, it has been either on the ground that there was no legal impediment to execution at law (G Manchester and Liverpool District Banking Co. Ltd. v. Parkinson (1888) 22 Q.B.D. 173 and Morgan v. Hart [1914] 2 K.B. 183), or on the ground that the nature of the property was such that it could not be reached by either law or equity: Holmes v. Millage [1893] 1 Q.B. 551 and Edwards & Co. v. Picard [1909] 2 K.B. 903.

H In the present case, the property in question cannot be reached by any process of legal execution for three reasons: first, because with the exception of Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom all the indemnifying parties are out of the jurisdiction; secondly, because the I.T.C. has not made, and it is reasonable to infer that it does not intend to make, any formal demand upon its members; and, thirdly, because a claim to be indemnified by a third party is not amenable to garnishee. I have the authority of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Bourne v. Colodense Ltd. [1985] I.C.R. 291 for holding that the second and third of these impediments can be overcome by the appointment of a receiver by way of equitable execution with power to make the demand and to bring proceedings if necessary; and the first obviously can. In my judgment, therefore, there is no technical objection to the appointment which is sought. A

(2) The power of the I.T.C. to sue its own members

It is common ground between the parties, although for different reasons, that, if a justiciable cause of action exists, the I.T.C. can maintain an action against its members in the English courts. The I.T.C. says that this is because it is a juristic person. The applicants say that it is because, although the I.T.C. is not a juristic person but merely a collective name for its members, the Order of 1972 has conferred on it the capacities of a body corporate. These include the power to contract with its members, to demand performance from them, and to maintain proceedings and obtain judgments against them. This is not an empty process since, even if the I.T.C. is not a legal person distinct from its members, it has the capacity to hold property with the result that such property is distinct from that of its members, so that a judgment obtained against it in its own name is recoverable only from its own funds: see Bonsor v. Musicians' Union [1956] A.C. 104. The purpose of the present application is to compel payment by the member states into the funds of the I.T.C., against which alone the applicants' existing judgment is recoverable. B C D

(3) The existence of a cause of action

It is at this stage that the applicants' real difficulties arise. They must show that the I.T.C. has an arguable cause of action against the member states capable of being taken over by the receiver and which the court can entertain. Mr. Littman, who appeared for the applicants, accepted that for the reasons stated in the previous application (see [1987] 2 W.L.R. 1229, 1241H to 1242D) a cause of action based on an alleged breach of the Agreement would not be justiciable in these courts. Accordingly, he embarked on a quest for an arguable cause of action which does not depend on the Agreement and does not require the court to interpret the terms of an international treaty or enforce the obligations arising thereunder. In my judgment, the quest was hopeless. E F

Mr. Littman put the case in various ways. First, he submitted that as a matter of English law the I.T.C. is simply an unincorporated association of member states engaged in trade, with the legal capacities of a body corporate but without any separate existence of its own: in other words, a partnership; that every member of such a partnership is liable as principal for the debts and liabilities of the firm, and is entitled to contribution from his co-partners, for the debts and liabilities of the firm are as much theirs as they are his; and that this right of contribution can be enforced by the I.T.C. or by the receiver in its name. Alternatively, he submitted that even if the I.T.C. falls to be treated as having its own legal personality distinct from that of its members, nevertheless it is not incorporated and is still a trading partnership, like a Scottish partnership, with a right, like that of a Scottish partnership, to call upon the members to put it in funds to meet its liabilities. As a further alternative, he submitted that even if the I.T.C. is not a partnership of any kind, nevertheless the contracts which give rise to the liability were entered G H

3 W.L.R.

Maclaine Watson & Co. v. I.T.C. (Ch.D.)

Millett J.

A into by the I.T.C. as agent for its members or alternatively at their request, and on either footing the I.T.C. is entitled to be indemnified by them.

B In my judgment, all these alternative ways of putting the case involve the same three fallacies: (i) that because the contracts which the I.T.C. entered into with the applicants were governed by English law, therefore the mutual rights and obligations of the I.T.C. and its members, including the right of the I.T.C. to be indemnified by or demand contributions from its members, must be governed by the same law; (ii) that because the liability of the members to third parties cannot be excluded or cut down by any private agreement between the members, such an agreement cannot be the source of the mutual rights and obligations of the I.T.C. and its members; and (iii) that because no relevant rights of indemnity or contribution can in fact be found in the Agreement or would be enforceable in the English courts if they could be found, such rights must derive from some other source.

C That may readily be allowed that there is an arguable case for saying that, in English law, the relationship between the member states is that of partners, and that the relationship between each of the member states and the I.T.C. is that of principal and agent. If so, then the member states are directly liable as principals on any contracts entered into by the I.T.C. and governed by English law, and their liability cannot be excluded or cut down by any agreement among themselves, for the rights of the creditors are extrinsic to any such agreement: see In re Sea Fire and Life Assurance Co., Greenwood's case (1854) 3 De G.M. & G. 459, 475–476. But the receiver would not be enforcing the liability of the member states to the applicants, but their liability to the I.T.C.; and while the liability of the principal to the third party is governed by the proper law of the contract into which his agent has entered, the mutual rights and obligations of the principal and agent, and any liability of the principal to indemnify his agent, arise from the contract between them and must be governed by the proper law of that contract.

D Accordingly, to succeed in his claim against the member states, the receiver would have to establish the existence of some agreement, express or implied, between the member states under which the right of indemnity or contribution could be said to arise and which is justiciable in these courts. Since the I.T.C. was established to trade in England and has done so, some agreement by the members to this effect may readily be inferred. Unfortunately for the applicants, there is no room for inference; the existence of the relevant treaty can be proved as a fact. It was the Sixth International Tin Agreement. That is the treaty by the member states which established the I.T.C., conferred international legal personality upon it, and authorised it to trade in England. That is the treaty under which the mutual rights and obligations of the member states and the I.T.C. arise; there is not a scrap of evidence to suggest that there was any other agreement, and no conceivable reason to infer one. The fact that the Agreement is not enforceable by the English courts does not entitle the courts to pretend that it does not exist, or to cast around for some other and fanciful source of the I.T.C.'s rights against its members. Its rights derive from the treaty and nowhere else, and, as the Order of 1972 acknowledges, the treaty is not a contract of partnership or agency but of membership. The relationships it creates are not those of partners or of principal and agent but of an organisation and its members.

Mr. Littman submitted that, given the existence of 33 principals each with its own system of law, the proper law of the contract of agency must in the absence of some other agreement be the law of the country where the agent is to transact his principals' business. That would no doubt be so if the principals were ordinary individuals or trading companies who are bound to subject their agreement with each other to some national system of law. But here the members are independent sovereign states with the power to enter into an international treaty which is governed by the law, and enforceable by the national courts, of no single country. That is what they have done and, on the evidence before me, all that they have done.

Mr. Littman submitted that the I.T.C.'s rights of indemnity or contribution from its members cannot derive from the Agreement because the I.T.C. is not a party to the treaty, and because in fact no such rights can be found in it. The Agreement is, of course, not only the agreement between the members which established the I.T.C., but also the I.T.C.'s constitutional instrument. Whether it creates rights between the members only, or whether it creates rights also between the I.T.C. and the members, and if so whether its express provisions need to be augmented by further implied terms, are questions upon which, as a judge of the national courts of one of the member states only, I have no authority to pronounce. But let it be assumed that, for whatever reason, no right of indemnity or contribution, express or implied, is given to the I.T.C. by the treaty. What follows? What follows is not that the right must derive from some other source, but that there is no such right.

Mr. Littman's reliance on the Scottish law of partnership was equally unproductive. A Scottish firm is not a body corporate, but, as is well known, it possesses a separate legal personality of its own distinct from that of its members. Any liabilities which it incurs are the liabilities of the firm and not of the members, but the members are liable as guarantors of the firm, and in some circumstances—such as winding up—can apparently be sued not only by the creditors of the firm but by the firm itself. As I understood his argument, Mr. Littman contended that this is a feature which is inherent in the very nature of any non-corporate trading organisation which has its own legal personality. That may be so, for all I know, at least under some systems of law; but it is still necessary to identify the source of the members' obligation, not to pay the creditors but to indemnify the organisation. In my judgment, that can only be the agreement between the members or the law under which the organisation is established. Once again, the applicants are driven back to the treaty.

Mr. Littman submitted that in demanding payment from the members, the receiver would not be enforcing the claims of the I.T.C., but setting in motion machinery to enforce the claims of the applicants. For this proposition he relied on In re Royal Bank of Australia, Robinson's Executor's Case (1856) 6 De G.M. & G. 572. That was a case of an unregistered company which was being wound up under the Winding-up Acts 1848–1849, at a time when even the shareholders of registered companies did not enjoy the benefit of limited liability. The question for decision was whether a call made on the contributories by the master gave rise to a specialty or a simple contract debt. In the course of his judgment Lord Cranworth L.C. said, at p. 587:

3 W.L.R.

Maclaine Watson & Co. v. I.T.C. (Ch.D.)

Millett J.

A “Every shareholder, as a partner, is liable to every creditor to the full amount of his demand, and the sum raised by the master represents not any demand of the shareholders inter se, but the aggregate demand of all the creditors on the partnership.”

B But the case was one in which the contract with the creditor, the constitution of the company and the winding up were all governed by English law, and the power of the master to make the call arose under an express statutory provision, the Joint Stock Companies Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 45), section 83, the distant ancestor of section 74 of the Insolvency Act 1986, which authorised the master to levy calls on the members, not for what they had agreed inter se to pay into the common pool, but for such amount as might be necessary to pay the debts and liabilities of the company and the costs and expenses of the winding up.

C That power was exercisable only in a winding up, and the result of the previous application is that the modern statutory counterpart is not available. So the essential machinery is missing. Mr. Littman submitted that the appointment of a receiver, coupled with the Order of 1972, would supply alternative machinery. But this alternative machinery works on a different principle, and is defective. It works on a different principle by vesting in the receiver not the statutory right of a liquidator, and not the claims of the applicants against the members, but those of the I.T.C. It is defective, because the appointment does no more than vest in the receiver whatever rights the I.T.C. may have, while the Order of 1972 does no more than give the I.T.C. the capacity to enter into arrangements to obtain the necessary rights. Unlike the Winding-Up Acts 1848–1849, neither of them actually creates the rights themselves. The source, and the only source, of those rights remains the treaty.

F Finally, it was submitted that, if necessary, the receiver would contend that the trading activities carried out at the material time by the buffer stock manager of the I.T.C., including the contracts giving rise to the judgment debt, although carried out with the full knowledge, authority and at the request of the member states, were outside the scope of the Agreement. I entirely fail to understand how the contention, even if true, could help the receiver. As between the I.T.C. and the member states, the scope, extent and meaning of the Agreement are not justiciable in the English courts, which could not make the necessary findings. But even if they could, what would follow? The implied agreement to indemnify the I.T.C. which is said to follow would be an agreement between independent sovereign states in augmentation of the treaty, and would still be governed by international law and not enforceable in these courts.

G

(4) Conclusion

H In my judgment, the applicants have failed to show any arguable case for contending that the I.T.C. has a cause of action against its members which is not derived from the treaty. It is rightly conceded that these courts cannot entertain a cause of action which is so derived, and accordingly I must dismiss the application.

Mental Disorder—Mental health review tribunal—Discharge of patient—Tribunal's decision to defer conditional discharge of patient—Whether tribunal having power to reconsider decision—Mental Health Act 1983 (c. 20), s. 73(2)(7)

D

A patient applied to a mental health review tribunal for a review of an order restricting his discharge from a mental hospital. On 12 February 1985 the tribunal, acting under section 73(2) and (7) of the Mental Health Act 1983,¹ directed that the patient be conditionally discharged but deferred the direction until 28 June. The Secretary of State, who had not been informed of the date of the tribunal hearing, applied for judicial review. Woolf J., on the ground that the tribunal could reconsider the order to defer discharge made under section 73(7) of the Act of 1983, refused the application. On appeal by the Secretary of State, the Court of Appeal allowed the appeal.

On appeal by the patient:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that the provisions of section 73(2) were mandatory and once the tribunal were satisfied that a patient should be conditionally discharged they were obliged to make the order, which was final, and they could only defer it under section 73(7) for the necessary arrangements for the patient's discharge to be made; that, accordingly, mental health review tribunals had no power to reconsider their decisions, and that, therefore, it was right that the Secretary of State's application for judicial review had been granted, since the order had been made without the Secretary of State having the opportunity to be heard (post, pp. 526G—527C, 528H—529C).

F

Per Lord Bridge of Harwich. There is no authority in the Act of 1983 or the Mental Health Review Tribunal Rules 1983 for “a deferred direction for conditional discharge in accordance with section 73(7) of the Act” to be deferred to a fixed date. In the nature of the case it is impossible for a tribunal in making a deferred direction for conditional discharge to predict how long it will take to make the necessary arrangements. The decision should simply indicate that the direction is deferred until the necessary arrangements have been made to the satisfaction of the tribunal and specify what arrangements are required (post, p. 528E—G).

Campbell v. Home Secretary (H.L.(E.))

A APPEAL from the Court of Appeal.

This was an appeal by leave of the House of Lords (Lord Keith of Kinkel, Lord Templeman and Lord Griffiths) dated 5 November 1986, by the appellant, Ernest Campbell, a patient in Broadmoor Hospital, Crowthorne, Berkshire, from the judgment dated 23 April 1986 of the Court of Appeal (Lawton and Stephen Brown L.JJ. and Sir John Megaw) allowing an appeal by the respondent, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, from the judgment dated 8 November 1985 of Woolf J. dismissing an application by the respondent for judicial review of the decision dated 12 February 1985 of the Oxford Regional Mental Health Review Tribunal to direct the conditional discharge of the appellant.

The facts are stated in the opinion of Lord Bridge of Harwich.

C David Sullivan Q.C. and Oliver Thorold for the appellant.
Nigel Fleming for the respondent.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

D 29 July. LORD BRIDGE OF HARWICH. My Lords, the appellant, who is now 46 years old, suffers from psychopathic disorder as defined in section 1 of the Mental Health Act 1983. When he was 17 years old he sexually abused and strangled a 6-year-old boy. He was acquitted of murder, but convicted of manslaughter on the ground of diminished responsibility. There being no power at that time to make a hospital order, he was sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment. He was released in 1965. In 1969 he became a voluntary patient at the West Middlesex Hospital and shortly thereafter was admitted to and detained at Broadmoor Hospital pursuant to section 26 of the Mental Health Act 1959. He disclosed that he had committed certain burglaries of which he was in due course convicted and he was thereupon made subject to a hospital order under section 60 of the Act of 1959 and a restriction order without limit of time under section 65. Those orders continue in force under the corresponding sections 37 and 41 of the consolidating Act of 1983.

The Secretary of State has power under section 42 of the Act of 1983 to order the discharge of a patient subject to a hospital order and a restriction order either absolutely or subject to conditions. Upon absolute discharge both the hospital order and the restriction order cease to have effect. A conditional discharge leaves the patient liable to recall by the Secretary of State, which, in effect, reactivates the hospital order and the restriction order. Under the Act of 1959 it was only by the exercise of this executive discretion that such a patient could secure his discharge. But now such a patient (a "restricted patient" within the definition of that phrase in Part V of the Act of 1983) enjoys the benefit of one of the changes in the law effected by the Mental Health (Amendment) Act 1982 in that a mental health review tribunal is empowered to order his discharge under section 73 of the Act of 1983.

The provisions of section 73 of the Act of 1983 upon which this appeal depends, if written out in full to include in subsection (1)(a) the words incorporated by reference from section 72(1)(b), read as follows:

"(1) Where an application to a mental health review tribunal is made by a restricted patient who is subject to a restriction order, or where the case of such a patient is referred to such a tribunal, the tribunal shall direct the absolute discharge of the patient if satisfied—

(a) [(i) that he is not then suffering from mental illness, psychopathic disorder, severe mental impairment or mental impairment or from any of those forms of disorder of a nature or degree which makes it appropriate for him to be liable to be detained in a hospital for medical treatment; or (ii) that it is not necessary for the health or safety of the patient or for the protection of other persons that he should receive such treatment;] and (b) that it is not appropriate for the patient to remain liable to be recalled to hospital for further treatment.

“(2) Where in the case of any such patient as is mentioned in subsection (1) above the tribunal are satisfied as to the matters referred to in paragraph (a) of that subsection but not as to the matter referred to in paragraph (b) of that subsection the tribunal shall direct the conditional discharge of the patient.

“(7) A tribunal may defer a direction for the conditional discharge of a patient until such arrangements as appear to the tribunal to be necessary for that purpose have been made to their satisfaction; and where by virtue of any such deferment no direction has been given on an application or reference before the time when the patient's case comes before the tribunal on a subsequent application or reference, the previous application or reference shall be treated as one on which no direction under this section can be given.”

The effects of absolute and conditional discharge by order of a mental health review tribunal are the same as those respectively of absolute and conditional discharge by the Secretary of State under section 42. In addition, the Secretary of State may add to the conditions imposed by the tribunal and may, from time to time, vary any conditions, whether imposed by the tribunal or by himself.

In June 1984 the appellant applied to the Oxford Regional Mental Health Review Tribunal for his discharge. The procedure in relation to such an application is governed by the Mental Health Review Tribunal Rules 1983 (S.I. 1983 No. 942) (“the rules”). I need not refer to them in any detail. In accordance with the rules, reports on the appellant by Dr. Tidmarsh, the consultant psychiatrist who had been responsible for the care and treatment of the appellant at Broadmoor since 1981, were submitted to the tribunal. These were to the effect that discharge would be quite inappropriate. The Secretary of State, who is clearly the only party capable of representing any interest the public may have in opposing an application for discharge, notified the tribunal of his opposition. The tribunal heard and determined the application on 12 February 1985. In breach of the rules the Secretary of State was not given notice of the hearing. A report commissioned by the appellant's solicitor from Dr. Russell Davis, a consultant psychiatrist who had seen the appellant for an aggregate of one and a half hours on two visits in January 1985 was put before the tribunal. This supported the application for discharge on the ground that the appellant's disorder was not “of a nature or degree which makes it appropriate for him to be liable to be detained.” A copy of this report, dated 1 February 1985, was sent to the Secretary of State, as the rules require, but did not reach him until the very day of the tribunal's determination. Dr. Tidmarsh, your Lordships

A were told, attended the hearing and was cross-examined by the solicitor appearing for the appellant. Dr. Russell Davis did not attend.

The determination of the tribunal is recorded in a document headed "Decision of the Oxford Regional Mental Health Review Tribunal." The operative part reads as follows:

B "The tribunal has considered the patient's application relating to the above named and hereby directs that:— This patient shall be conditionally discharged, such discharge to be deferred to Friday, 28 June 1985, for proposals to meet the conditions to be prepared. The conditions shall be that:— 1. The patient reside at and abide by the rules of a suitably supervised hostel which has an active rehabilitation programme. 2. The patient shall be placed under the supervision of a suitable probation officer or suitable social worker, who shall report from time to time as requested to the Home Office and the hospital referred to in condition 3. 3. The patient shall attend a psychiatric out-patient clinic as directed by a consultant psychiatrist yet to be nominated.

C "The tribunal is satisfied about these reasons because:— They were satisfied that this patient continues to suffer from psychopathic disorder but not of a nature or degree which makes it appropriate for him to be liable to be detained in a hospital for medical treatment but were satisfied that this patient should remain liable to recall."

D It has always been common ground that this decision was made in breach of the rules. What is more important is that there was here a breach of the most fundamental rule of natural justice, in that the Secretary of State, as a vitally interested party, was denied a hearing. That is not in dispute.

E On receiving notice of the tribunal's decision, the Secretary of State promptly applied by way of judicial review to have it quashed. On 8 November 1985 Woolf J. refused the remedy sought on the ground that it was unnecessary and that the appropriate alternative remedy was for the tribunal to re-open the issue to the extent of considering the representations of the Secretary of State before finally determining the appellant's application under section 73(7). The Secretary of State's appeal against this decision was allowed by the Court of Appeal (Lawton and Stephen Brown L.JJ. and Sir John Megaw) [1986] 1 W.L.R. 1180, who on 23 April 1986 quashed the tribunal's decision. The appellant now appeals by leave of your Lordships' House.

G My Lords, whatever view be taken, as a matter of construction, of the interaction between subsections (2) and (7) of section 73, as to which Woolf J. and the Court of Appeal differed, I find it difficult to see how the tribunal's decision made in February 1985 can properly stand. Such a fundamental flaw as vitiated the proceedings leading to that decision must surely call for a complete rehearing de novo. If every issue remains open for decision under subsection (7) and that provides the appropriate occasion for the rehearing, the earlier purported decision is at best irrelevant, at worst an embarrassment which the tribunal would have to do their best to put out of mind but which would make it difficult for justice to be seen to be done at a rehearing before the tribunal constituted as it was in February 1985. If the construction adopted by the Court of Appeal is right and there is no power under subsection (7) to re-open any issue already decided under subsection (2)

the earlier decision must, of course, be quashed and that will enable the rehearing to take place, as the Court of Appeal thought that it should, before a differently constituted tribunal.

Counsel for the appellant was unable to suggest any avenue of escape from this dilemma. There is an inherent inconsistency in the argument advanced which, on the one hand, accepts that the 1985 proceedings were defective and relies on a rehearing under subsection (7) to cure that defect, but, on the other hand, claims that the appellant is entitled to rely on the earlier decision in his favour which, though reversible, should be the point from which the rehearing ought to start. Though the earlier decision was made in breach of the rules of natural justice, which in a word means unfairly, it would nevertheless be unfair to the appellant, so it is said, to deprive him of the benefit of that decision, provisionally made in his favour, when the tribunal which made that decision reconsider it under subsection (7). I am not persuaded by this argument.

I turn now to the question of the true construction of section 73 which your Lordships have to decide. The first issue which a mental health review tribunal must address on an application falling for determination under section 73 is whether they are satisfied as to one or other of the matters referred to in paragraph (a) of subsection (1). If they are so satisfied and also satisfied that the patient need not remain liable to recall it is mandatory under subsection (1) that they shall direct his absolute discharge.

If the tribunal think the patient should remain liable to recall, they can only contemplate a conditional discharge under subsection (2). Here the tribunal's satisfaction or lack of satisfaction as to one or other of the paragraph (a) matters will, I think, inevitably be coloured by the conditions they have in mind to impose. Thus the answers to the questions (a)(i) whether or not the patient's disorder is "of a nature or degree which makes it appropriate for him to be liable to be detained in hospital for medical treatment," or (a)(ii) whether or not it is necessary for his own health or safety or for the protection of others "that he should receive such treatment," which must here mean treatment under detention, may be vitally influenced by the conditions which are to be imposed to regulate his life style upon release into the community. To take obvious examples suggested by the decision of the tribunal in this case, the tribunal may perfectly properly be satisfied that hospital detention is no longer necessary provided that the patient can be placed in a suitable hostel and required to submit to treatment as an out-patient by a suitable psychiatrist. These are matters to be secured by imposing appropriate conditions.

Once satisfied under subsection (2) as to one or other of the matters referred to in paragraph (a) of subsection (1), it is mandatory that the tribunal "shall direct the conditional discharge of the patient." But if the tribunal are only able to be so satisfied by the imposition of conditions to which the patient will be subject on release, it is obvious that in many, perhaps most, cases some time must elapse between the decision that conditional discharge is appropriate and the effective order directing discharge of the patient, for the purpose of making the necessary practical arrangements to enable the patient to comply with the conditions, e.g. securing a suitable hostel placement for him and finding a suitable psychiatrist who is prepared to undertake his treatment as an out-patient. This seems to me to be the common sense of the matter and

Lord Bridge

A it is, I think, precisely for this purpose that the tribunal, being satisfied as required by subsection (2), are given the option either to direct the immediate discharge of the patient under subsection (2) or to defer that direction under subsection (7). Unless a decision has first been reached under subsection (2) that discharge on certain conditions is appropriate,
I find it difficult to see what is envisaged by the words in subsection (7)
B “such arrangements as appear to the tribunal to be necessary for that purpose.” The purpose contemplated must surely be that of enabling the patient to comply with the conditions which the tribunal have already decided to impose. Conversely, when the tribunal have deferred a direction for the conditional discharge of the patient, the words of subsection (7) which reserve to the tribunal the further decision as to whether the necessary arrangements “have been made to their C satisfaction” are wholly inapt to indicate a deferment of the decision as to whether the tribunal can be satisfied, as required under subsection (2), of the matters on which a decision in favour of conditional discharge depends.

The contrary argument is that no direction for the conditional discharge of the patient can ever be given unless the tribunal are satisfied as required by subsection (2) at the moment when the direction D is given. Having deferred a direction under subsection (7) the tribunal, it is submitted, not only may, but must, examine the whole issue afresh before the direction for discharge is given. If this were right, the two stage procedure, which seems to be contemplated by subsections (2) and (7) and which, as it appears to me, is designed to serve the purpose I have suggested in the foregoing paragraph, would not seem to serve any useful purpose at all. Moreover, for reasons indicated earlier in this E opinion this construction of section 73 would not avail the appellant in resisting an order to quash the decision of the tribunal in this case. But, to my mind, the conclusive refutation of this suggested construction is to be found in the second part of subsection (7) following the semi-colon.
This provision contemplates: (1) an application or reference leading to a deferred direction for conditional discharge; (2) a further application or F reference relating to the same patient coming before the tribunal before any direction for his conditional discharge has actually been given. In this situation it is provided that no direction may be given pursuant to the first application or reference. The effect of this is that the whole issue must be re-opened pursuant to the second application or reference.
If, as submitted on behalf of the appellant, the whole issue always G remains at large following a deferred direction for conditional discharge, this provision would be otiose. Its evident purpose is to ensure that, in the situation to which it applies, it will not be open to the tribunal when the second application or reference comes before them to say: “We decided on the first application or reference in favour of conditional discharge but deferred giving the direction; being now satisfied that the necessary arrangements have been made for the purpose we now direct the conditional discharge of the patient pursuant to that application or H reference and there is no necessity for us to consider the matter afresh pursuant to the new application or reference.”

I think this provision, so interpreted, also meets the point, of which much was made in the argument, that if the tribunal, having deferred a direction under subsection (7) have no power to re-open the issue under subsection (2), they may be compelled to discharge a patient whose condition has deteriorated since the tribunal first considered the matter and made a deferred direction for conditional discharge. It may well be, I think, that the second part of subsection (7) is designed to meet this very contingency. But, whether that is so or not, it certainly enables the Secretary of State, when a deterioration in the condition of the patient is brought to his attention, to forestall the patient's discharge by exercising his power under section 71 of the Act of 1983 to refer the patient's case to the tribunal afresh.

My Lords, the conclusion I have expressed on the true construction of section 73 is one I have reached by considering the statute without reference to the rules. Both Woolf J. at first instance and Sir John Megaw in the Court of Appeal relied substantially on the rules in support of the respective conclusions which they reached on the meaning of the statute. I doubt, with respect, whether the rules are strictly available as an aid to construing the statute. But, on turning to the rules, I am comforted to find, as I think and as Sir John Megaw thought, that they have been drafted in a way which is wholly consistent with the interpretation of the Act which I prefer and inconsistent with that urged on behalf of the appellant.

Apart from the substantive issue, there was some discussion in argument of the form of the decision made by the tribunal on 12 February 1985. The members of the tribunal were not, of course, in any way responsible for the administrative failure to notify the Secretary of State of the hearing date, which vitiates their decision. If it had been made after the Secretary of State had had the opportunity to be heard, I should be minded to criticise its form in only one substantial respect. Leaving aside pedantic quibbles over terminology, the document recording the decision in writing, as required by rule 24(1), makes clear in substance that it is what the rules call "a deferred direction for conditional discharge in accordance with section 73(7) of the Act" (rule 2), and properly sets out the conditions to be imposed and the reasons for the tribunal's decision which show that they have applied their minds to and determined the issues arising under section 73(2). My criticism is of the deferment to a fixed date. There is no authority for this in the Act or the rules and in the nature of the case it is impossible for a tribunal in making a deferred direction for conditional discharge to predict how long it will take to make the necessary arrangements. The decision should simply indicate that the direction is deferred until the necessary arrangements have been made to the satisfaction of the tribunal and specify what arrangements are required, which can normally be done, no doubt, simply by reference to the conditions to be imposed. Whoever is responsible for making the arrangements should then proceed with all reasonable expedition to do so and should bring the matter to the attention of the tribunal again as soon as practicable after it is thought that satisfactory arrangements have been made. Pursuant to rule 25 the tribunal may then decide that the arrangements are to their satisfaction without a further hearing.

I would dismiss the appeal.

F Court of Appeal (Civil Division)—Jurisdiction—Criminal cause or matter—Order made by circuit judge for production of documentary evidence to police during course of investigation—High Court's refusal of judicial review of order—Whether order made in "criminal cause or matter"—Whether appeal from High Court to Court of Appeal (Civil Division)—Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (c. 60), s. 9, Sch. 1, para. 4—Supreme Court Act 1981 (c. 54), s. 18(1)(a)

G A circuit judge, sitting at the Central Criminal Court, made orders under section 9 of, and Schedule 1 to, the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984¹ for the production by the applicants of various documents relating to the accounts of a youth association. The documents were "special procedure material" within the definition in section 14 of the Act. The applicants applied for judicial review by way of certiorari to quash the orders. The Divisional Court refused relief and determined as a matter of law that the orders made by the circuit judge had been made in a criminal cause or matter, so that any appeal from the Divisional Court lay to the House of Lords. The applicants appealed to the Court of Appeal.

On the preliminary point whether the court had jurisdiction to entertain the appeal:—

Held, declining jurisdiction, that the nature of an order made or refused in judicial review proceedings depended on the order sought to be reviewed; that an order (or a refusal of an order) under Schedule 1 to the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 relating to excluded or special procedure material was made in a criminal context in aid of a criminal investigation, notwithstanding that proceedings had not been started; and that, accordingly, it was "a criminal cause or matter" and by virtue of section 18(1)(a) of the Supreme Court Act 1981 the Court of Appeal had no jurisdiction to entertain an appeal from such a decision (post, pp. 532D, 533E–G, 535F–536D).

APPEAL from Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division.

The applicants, Errol Ellis Carr, Memzie Kiffin, Victor Adegbesan and Lea Jack, sought judicial review by way of certiorari to quash orders for the production of documents constituting "special procedure material" made under Schedule 1 to the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 by Judge Kenneth Machin Q.C. sitting at the Central Criminal Court on 3 July 1986. The orders had been made on the application of Detective Chief Inspector Atkins of the Company Fraud Department at New Scotland Yard. On 27 February the Divisional Court (Glidewell L.J. and McCullough J.) refused the application for judicial review and determined as a matter of law that the orders made by Judge Machin had been made in a criminal cause or matter, so that an appeal from the Divisional Court's decision lay to the House of Lords.

The applicants sought to appeal on the grounds, inter alia, that (1) in dismissing the application the Divisional Court had misdirected itself in law as to the proper construction and interpretation of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984; (2) in deciding that the orders had been

A made in a criminal cause or matter the court had misdirected itself in law. The Court of Appeal heard as a preliminary point the question whether the orders had been made in a criminal cause or matter.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Sir John Donaldson M.R.

Geoffrey Shaw for the applicants.

B Nicholas Coleman for the respondent.

C SIR JOHN DONALDSON M.R. On 3 July 1986 Judge Machin, sitting as a circuit judge at the Central Criminal Court, made orders under Schedule 1 to the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 upon the application of Detective Chief Inspector Atkins of the Company Fraud Department at New Scotland Yard requiring the four applicants in the proceedings to produce documents to a constable within seven days or within 28 days of their proposed application for judicial review. The particular documents were specified in a written information laid before the judge by the detective chief inspector, each applicant was given advance notice of the documents which were required to be produced, and those documents related to the accounts of the Broadwater Farm Youth Association.

D On 27 February 1987 a Divisional Court consisting of Glidewell L.J. and McCullough J. heard applications for judicial review designed to quash those orders of Judge Machin. The Divisional Court dismissed the applications for judicial review on their merits, and went on to determine as a matter of law that the original production orders made by the circuit judge had been made in a criminal cause or matter, thereby indicating that so far as they were concerned any appeal must be to the House of Lords. They were not asked at that moment to certify that a matter of public importance was involved and nor were they asked to give leave to appeal. If they had been asked, they might well have given a certificate but they might not have given leave to appeal as the general practice is to leave it to their Lordships' House to decide which appeals they will hear. They adjourned any further consideration in order to enable the applicants, if they were so minded, to explore the possibility of appealing to the Civil Division of the Court of Appeal. We have been dealing with such an application that we hear such an appeal as a preliminary point limited to the question of whether we have jurisdiction to do so.

G Under section 16 of the Supreme Court Act 1981, appeals lie to this court from the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division unless excluded by other provisions. The only potential exclusion so far as this case is concerned is contained in section 18(1)(a) of the Act of 1981, which provides:

H "No appeal shall lie to the Court of Appeal—(a) except as provided by the Administration of Justice Act 1960,"—which relates to contempt—"from any judgment of the High Court in any criminal cause or matter; . . ."

So we have to decide whether any appeal to this court from the order of the Divisional Court could properly be described as an appeal in a criminal cause or matter.

Mr. Shaw, in an extremely helpful skeleton argument, has been good enough to draw to our attention the fact that the phrase "criminal cause or matter” arises not only in the context of section 18 of the Act of 1981 but also under R.S.C., Ord. 53, r. 3(4), which provides that applications for leave to apply for judicial review, if refused in the first instance, can be renewed to a Divisional Court if the cause or matter is criminal, but otherwise to a single judge. Again under Ord. 53, r. 5(1), where leave has been granted, an application for judicial review is made to a Divisional Court, not to a single judge, if the cause or matter is criminal. Also, under section 5(1) of the Costs in Criminal Cases Act 1973, which has now been repealed and replaced by the Prosecution of Offences Act 1985 using rather different wording, a Divisional Court used to have power to order the payment out of central funds of the costs of any party to proceedings before the Divisional Court in a criminal cause or matter.

It is quite clear that the legislature uses the phrase “in a criminal cause or matter” as being a convenient description of matters which are not civil. It is very unfortunate that that phrase has given rise to a considerable conflict of judicial opinion as to its meaning, since if the legislature, by a simple form of words like this, is unable to divide the sheep from the goats, the criminal from the civil, great difficulties are created. But that is the position at the moment.

Given that difficulty, I have to consider the current proceedings. One thing is quite clear. The nature of an order made or refused in judicial review proceedings must depend not upon that order but upon the order that is sought to be reviewed. What was being reviewed in this case was an order under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. That is an Act which has a long title, reading:

“An Act to make further provision in relation to the powers and duties of the police, persons in police detention, criminal evidence, police discipline and complaints against the police; to provide for arrangements for obtaining the views of the community on policing and for a rank of deputy chief constable; to amend the law relating to the Police Federations and Police Forces and Police Cadets in Scotland; and for connected purposes.”

For our purposes, it is sufficient only to look at Schedule 1 and Part II of the Act. Part II, which is headed “Powers of entry, search and seizure,” deals in section 8 with the “Power of justice of the peace to authorise entry and search of premises.” But that section contains what amounts to an exception in cases where the application relates to items described as “excluded material” or “special procedure material.” One finds what those latter materials are in section 14. They are materials of a specially sensitive nature either as being journalistic material or as being material which is subject in one way or another to an obligation of confidentiality. Applications to obtain access to excluded material or special procedure material are governed by section 9. That provides:

“(1) A constable may obtain access to excluded material or special procedure material for the purposes of a criminal investigation by making an application under Schedule 1 . . . (2) Any Act (including a local Act) passed before this Act under which a search of premises”—and I stress these words—“for the purposes of a criminal investigation could be authorised by the issue of a warrant to a constable shall cease to have effect so far as it relates to the authorisation of searches” as I have summarised above.

A I then turn to Schedule 1, which provides:

"1. If on an application made by a constable a circuit judge is satisfied that one or other of the sets of access conditions is fulfilled, he may make an order under paragraph 4 below."

Paragraph 4 provides:

B "An order under this paragraph is an order that the person who appears to the circuit judge to be in possession of the material to which the application relates shall—(a) produce it to a constable for him to take away; or (b) give a constable access to it . . ."

C The access conditions are complex, but for present purposes it is sufficient to say that there have to be reasonable grounds for believing that a serious arrestable offence has been committed and that the material is likely to be of substantial value, whether by itself or together with other materials, to the investigation in connection with which the application is made.

I ought also to refer to paragraph 15 of the Schedule, which provides:

D "(1) If a person fails to comply with an order under paragraph 4 above, a circuit judge may deal with him as if he had committed a contempt of the Crown Court. (2) Any enactment relating to contempt of the Crown Court shall have effect in relation to such a failure as if it were such a contempt."

E So disobedience of the circuit judge's order is being treated as if it were a contempt of the Crown Court, and of course the Crown Court is a court with a largely criminal jurisdiction.

F It is to my mind clear beyond argument that the order which was made in this case was made in a criminal context, but it is right to note, as Mr. Shaw has stressed, that there are no proceedings in existence. In the limited time that has been available I have not been able to find out whether this Act could or would be used where criminal proceedings have begun, but it does not really matter for Mr. Shaw's purposes. It is sufficient to note that no criminal proceedings have been begun here and, indeed, in most cases there is no doubt that orders would be sought under this Act where a decision had not yet been reached whether or not to prosecute. It is essentially a statutory provision in aid of a criminal investigation designed, if the evidence will stand it, to lead to a criminal prosecution. But unless it is to be said that an order under the Act is either never or very rarely one which is by its nature a criminal cause or matter merely because of the stage at which the order is made, then the fact that there are no criminal proceedings does not, in my judgment, matter. That fact stems purely from the nature of the Act and the statutory provisions and does not affect the criminal characters of the proceedings.

H As I have said, countless problems have arisen as to what is meant by a "criminal cause or matter." I can shorten this judgment by saying that all the authorities are summarised—at any rate, up to that date—in my own judgment in Day v. Grant [1985] R.T.R. 229. That concerned two cases in which witness summonses had been issued out of the Central Criminal Court in one and out of the Manchester Crown Court in the other. In one there was an application to a High Court judge asking him to vary order. In the other there was an application to the Divisional Court to quash the order. [His Lordship read his judgment starting from the reference to section 18 of the Supreme Court Act 1981, at pp. 303G—306A (see post, pp. 11H—14A), and continued:] Since then, and before the judgment of the Divisional Court which we are considering, another Divisional Court considered a case which was, I think, indistinguishable from the present under the Act of 1984, Reg. v. Bristol Crown Court, Ex parte Bristol Press and Picture Agency Ltd. (unreported), 7 November 1986, and it held that it constituted a criminal cause or matter. Glidewell L.J. was following that decision when he reached his decision in the present case. I do not think that I need refer to that decision because we have to consider the matter de novo. Nevertheless, I should refer to the subsequent decision of the House of Lords in In re Smalley [1985] A.C. 622. In that case Mr. Smalley had entered into a recognisance conditioned upon his brother attending his (the brother's) trial at the Warwick Crown Court. His brother failed to attend. The question then arose as to whether the recognisance of £100,000 which Mr. Smalley had entered into should be estreated in whole or in part. It was held by the Crown Court judge that the whole amount of the recognisance should be estreated. Being dissatisfied, Mr. Smalley applied to the High Court for that decision to be judicially reviewed and quashed. The Divisional Court held that they had no jurisdiction in the matter since the judge's order was one relating to a trial on indictment within the meaning of section 29(3) of the Supreme Court Act 1981. Section 29 provides:

“(1) The High Court shall have jurisdiction to make orders of mandamus, prohibition and certiorari in those classes of cases in which it had power to do so immediately before the commencement of this Act. (2) Every such order shall be final, subject to any right of appeal therefrom. (3) In relation to the jurisdiction of the Crown Court, other than its jurisdiction in matters relating to trial on indictment, the High Court shall have all such jurisdiction to make orders of mandamus, prohibition or certiorari as the High Court possesses in relation to the jurisdiction of an inferior court.”

So what was being held by the Divisional Court was that it had no jurisdiction because this related to a trial on indictment.

Smalley's case went to the House of Lords where the Divisional Court's decision was reversed. Lord Bridge of Harwich, giving the leading judgment, held that a decision in a bail case relating to recognisances was not sufficiently closely connected with the trial on indictment to be caught by this exception to the jurisdiction of the Divisional Court. But more relevant for present purposes, he adverted to a plea that their Lordships' House should consider Reg. v. Southampton Justices, Ex parte Green [1976] Q.B. 11, which is the fons et origo of much of the difficulty of what is meant by a “criminal cause or matter.” Lord Bridge said, at p. 633:

“In Reg. v. Southampton Justices, Ex parte Green [1976] Q.B. 11, the applicant was a surety for her husband's bail. Upon his failing to surrender as required, the wife's recognisance was ordered by justices to be estreated.”

He dealt with the history of the case and then quoted from the judgment of Lord Denning M.R. saying, at pp. 633–634:

““A recognisance is in the nature of a bond. A failure to fulfil it gives rise to a civil debt. It is different from the ordinary kind of

3 W.L.R.

Carr v. Atkins (C.A.)

Sir John
Donaldson M.R.,

- A civil debt, because the enforcement is different. It is enforceable like a fine. . . . But that method of enforcement does not alter the nature of the debt. It is simply a civil debt upon a bond and as such it is not a criminal cause or matter.' In the instant case Kerr L.J. found it impossible to reconcile that decision with the conclusion which he nevertheless felt himself bound by Brownlow's case [1980] Q.B. 530 to reach that the order estreating the appellant's recognisance was here made in 'a matter relating to trial on indictment.' Conscious that Green's case [1976] Q.B. 11 presents a formidable obstacle to his arguments for the respondents, Mr. Laws invited us to overrule it. He drew our attention to the doubts expressed in Reg. v. Lambeth Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate, Ex parte McComb [1983] Q.B. 551, by Sir John Donaldson M.R., at p. 563, and by May L.J., at p. 567 as to whether Green's case had been rightly decided."
- B
- C

Then he said this, which is important, at p. 634:

- "In Green's case [1976] Q.B. 11, 15, Lord Denning M.R. relied on a passage from the speech of Viscount Simon L.C. in Amand v. Home Secretary and Minister of Defence of Royal Netherlands Government [1943] A.C. 147, 156 in support of his conclusion. Sir John Donaldson M.R. and May L.J., in the passages referred to above, thought that the speeches of Viscount Simon L.C. and Lord Wright in Amand's case [1943] A.C. 147, 156, 162-163 pointed the other way."
- D

- E Then he dealt with Amand's case. He concluded by saying:

- "I must frankly confess that I can find nothing in the speeches in that case which throws any light one way or the other on the totally different question whether an order estreating the recognisance of a surety for a defendant admitted to bail in criminal proceedings is covered by the same language. I do not find it necessary for present purposes to give a concluded answer to that question. It follows that I am not prepared to hold that Green's case [1976] Q.B. 11 was wrongly decided."
- F

- That produces a very interesting situation, because Lord Denning M.R., with the concurrence of those who were sitting with him, was quite clearly founding himself on Amand's case [1943] A.C. 147. What Lord Bridge is saying—obiter, I grant—is that Green's case [1976] Q.B. 11 may well have been rightly decided but not on the basis of Amand's case. If that is right, then the position is as it appeared to the court in Day v. Grant (Note), post, p. 537, although it was at that stage precluded from saying so, namely that Green's case [1976] Q.B. 11 is really a decision that questions of the estreatment of bail are so collateral to a criminal trial that they do not themselves constitute a criminal cause or matter. So it does seem to me in that rather tangled situation that we are freed from the authority of Green's case. It may just be that we are nevertheless left with the slight difficulty that McComb's case [1983] Q.B. 551, which concerns the Director of Public Prosecutions' conduct, might be thought to inhibit us in some way, but McComb's case was of course based on Green's case without the benefit of Lord Bridge's advice, and it was also based on Brownlow's case [1980] Q.B. 530, which was not wholly approved in In re Smalley [1985] A.C. 622. So, with all respect to the doctrine of stare decisis, I think that the time has come when we should look at this afresh. Looking at it afresh, I have no doubt whatsoever that an order or a refusal of an order under Act of 1984 and all subsequent proceedings relating to such an order or refusal are properly to be characterised as orders in a criminal cause or matter, and it would follow from that that we have no jurisdiction.

Accordingly I would decline to hear the proposed appeal.

STEPHEN BROWN L.J. I agree. The whole foundation of an application under Schedule 1 to the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 is that it should be made for the purpose of a criminal investigation. As Sir John Donaldson M.R. has pointed out, paragraph 12 of Schedule 1 to the Act provides: "If a person fails to comply with an order under [the Schedule], a circuit judge may deal with him as if he had committed a contempt of the Crown Court." The criminal investigation is, in my judgment, the basis of the application in the instant case. This is undoubtedly, in my view, a criminal cause or matter, and to hold otherwise would render the administration of this Act well nigh impracticable.

I would accordingly decline jurisdiction.

CROOM-JOHNSON L.J. I agree.

Jurisdiction declined.

[COURT OF APPEAL]

DAY AND ANOTHER v. GRANT

REGINA v. MANCHESTER CROWN COURT, Ex parte WILLIAMS

1985 Jan. 25

Sir John Donaldson M.R., Kerr and Lloyd L.JJ.

Court of Appeal (Civil Division)—Jurisdiction—Criminal cause or matter—Witness summonses issued in Crown Court—Orders made in connection with summonses in High Court and Divisional Court—Whether orders of High Court and Divisional Court made in “criminal cause or matter”—Whether appeal to Court of Appeal (Civil Division)—Criminal Procedure (Attendance of Witnesses) Act 1965 (c. 69), s. 2 (as amended by Courts Act 1971 (c. 23), s. 56(1), Sch. 8—Supreme Court Act 1981 (c. 54), s. 18(1)(a)

DAY v. GRANT

APPEAL from Sir Neil Lawson sitting as a judge of the Queen’s Bench Division.

On 20 December 1984, on an application by Mr. Reginald Day and the Department of Trade and Industry, Sir Neil Lawson, sitting as a judge of the Queen’s Bench Division, directed that a witness summons issued on behalf of a defendant in criminal proceedings at the Central Criminal Court, Mr. Alexander Grant, should be of no effect concerning the production of any documents requested in the summons.

The defendant, Mr. Grant, appealed on the grounds, inter alia, that (1) the proceedings could not or should not have been determined by the judge but should have been determined by the trial judge in the criminal proceedings due to commence on 7 January 1985; (2) the judge exercised his discretion to hear the action upon the wrong principles, thereby causing injustice to the defendant; (3) in determining the action the judge failed to balance the two competing issues of public interest correctly, namely balancing any harm that might be done to the public service against ensuring that administration of justice and a fair trial might not be frustrated; (4) the judge was wrong in holding that the documents were not material, relevant or admissible at the criminal trial as he had neither afforded himself nor had he been afforded the opportunity of viewing their contents prior to reaching his decision; (5) in the circumstances the order constituted a breach of natural justice.

REGINA v. MANCHESTER CROWN COURT, Ex parte WILLIAMS

APPEAL from the Divisional Court of the Queen’s Bench Division.

On 21 December 1984 the Divisional Court of the Queen’s Bench Division [1985] R.T.R. 49 granted an application by the applicant, Dr. Paul Williams, for judicial review by way of an order of certiorari to quash a witness summons issued in the Manchester Crown Court under the provisions of section 2 of the Criminal Procedure (Attendance of Witnesses) Act 1965, as amended. The summons had been issued at the request of a defendant, Mr. Dennis Dicks, who was appealing to the Crown Court against conviction by Manchester City Magistrates’ Court of a driving offence.

The defendant, Mr. Dicks, appealed on the grounds, inter alia, that, a witness summons having been issued requiring a non-party to produce a thing or document and that non-party having made an application to the Divisional Court to quash the summons, the court wrongly held that the burden was on the defendant to prove (a) that the thing or document was likely to be material evidence; (b) that there was a burden on the defendant to prove that such evidence would or was likely to provide a complete defence; and (c) that section 2 of the Act of 1965 could not apply to a document where it was intended to become admissible evidence not by reason of the testimony of the person producing it but by reason of the testimony of the defendant or his witnesses.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Sir John Donaldson M.R. Both appeals were heard together.

The following cases are referred to in the judgment of Sir John Donaldson M.R.:

Amand v. Home Secretary and Minister of Defence of the Royal Netherlands Government [1943] A.C. 147; [1942] 2 All E.R. 381, H.L.(E.)

Reg. v. Lambeth Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate, Ex parte McComb [1983] Q.B. 551; [1983] 2 W.L.R. 259; [1983] 1 All E.R. 321, C.A.

Reg. v. Secretary of State for the Home Department, Ex parte Dannenberg [1984] Q.B. 766; [1984] 2 W.L.R. 855; [1984] 2 All E.R. 481, C.A.

Reg. v. Sheffield Crown Court, Ex parte Brownlow [1980] Q.B. 530; [1980] 2 W.L.R. 892; [1980] 2 All E.R. 444, C.A.

Reg. v. Southampton Justices, Ex parte Green [1976] Q.B. 11; [1975] 3 W.L.R. 277; [1975] 2 All E.R. 1073, C.A.

No additional cases were cited in argument.

Stuart Stevens and Pamela Chegwidden-Radcliffe for the defendant, Mr. Grant.

John Mummery for the applicant, Mr. Day, and the Department of Trade.

Christopher Limb for the defendant, Mr. Dicks.

H. M. Boggis-Rolfe for the applicant, Dr. Williams.

SIR JOHN DONALDSON M.R. These two appeals have been called on together because they have two factors in common. First, both relate, directly or indirectly, to summonses issued under section 2 of the Criminal Procedure (Attendance of Witnesses) Act 1965; and, secondly, both raise an issue as to the jurisdiction of this court.

I shall refer first to Reg. v. Manchester Crown Court, Ex parte Williams. In that case the Manchester Crown Court issued a witness summons, acting under the powers contained in section 2(1) of the Criminal Procedure (Attendance of Witnesses) Act 1965, requiring Dr. Williams to give evidence in an intoximeter case. Dr. Williams is, I think, a director or is associated with the Lion Intoximeter company.

Section 2(1) (as amended by section 56(1) of, and Schedule 8 to, the Courts Act 1971) provides:

"For the purpose of any criminal proceedings before the Crown Court a witness summons, that is to say, a summons requiring the person to whom it is directed to attend before the court and give evidence or produce any document or thing specified in the summons, may be issued out of the Crown Court or out of the High Court."

The summons was issued at the request of Mr. Dicks, who had been convicted before a magistrates' court and was appealing to the Crown Court.

Dr. Williams might have been expected, if he objected to the summons, to have applied under section 2(2) of the same Act. That section provides:

"If any person in respect of whom a witness summons has been issued applies to the Crown Court or to the High Court, and satisfies the court that he cannot give any material evidence or, as the case may be,

3 W.L.R.

Day v. Grant (C.A.)

Sir John
Donaldson M.R.

A produce any document or thing likely to be material evidence, the court may direct that the summons shall be of no effect."

In fact, what he did was to apply to the High Court for judicial review in the nature of certiorari to quash the witness summons.

B I think from what we have been told in this court that all concerned with those proceedings recognised that they had—to put the matter charitably—some degree of irregularity: because, where there is a statutory right of this nature, one would not have thought that it was open to the Divisional Court to make an order by way of judicial review. However, both parties consented and, I apprehend, must have encouraged the Divisional Court to rule on the matter, the reason being that the Divisional Court was seized of various other Intoximeter problems, which it was thought could conveniently be dealt with at the same time, and because Dr. Williams was being besieged by witness summonses from all points of the compass, and it was thought that a more authoritative ruling would be given by the Divisional Court than by a single judge. For our purposes, I think we have to assume that the order of the Divisional Court was effective, and that order was that the witness summons be set aside. Mr. Dicks now seeks to appeal to this court in order to have the summons restored.

D In Day v. Grant a witness summons was issued out of the Central Criminal Court exercising its power under section 2(1) of the Act requiring Mr. Day to attend to give evidence and to produce documents at the trial of Mr. Grant.

Mr. Grant is charged with certain offences which might generally be described as company fraud offences. At an earlier stage Mr. Day had been appointed by the Department of Trade and Industry to conduct an inquiry into the activities of the company concerned, a company called Axair Ltd.

E The Department and Mr. Day applied to the High Court to have this summons varied. It might perhaps have been more convenient if they had applied to the court which had issued it, but the statute gives them the alternative right.

F The summons was heard by Sir Neil Lawson, sitting as a deputy High Court judge. He allowed the summons to stand in so far as it required Mr. Day to attend and give evidence if required so to do, but he set it aside in so far as it required Mr. Day to produce documents at the trial. The relevant document, we are told, was Mr. Day's report to the Secretary of State following his inquiry. The reason why Sir Neil set it aside is clear from the papers, namely that there was a claim to public interest immunity.

G Mr. Grant now appeals to this court. Mr. Stevens on his behalf says that this report is essential to Mr. Grant's defence in that if Mr. Day is called to give evidence on behalf of the defence, the prosecution, who have this report, will be in a position to cross-examine Mr. Day, and Mr. Stevens, appearing in his defence, will not have a similar advantage. Mr. Stevens says that under the Attorney-General's guidelines, where a witness has given a proof of evidence to the prosecution and the prosecution does not intend to call that witness, it is customary for the prosecution to make the proof of evidence available to the defence. This report, he says, is to be regarded as analogous to a proof of evidence.

H However that may be—and there may be distinctions between a proof of evidence and a general report—the answer here is the claim to public interest immunity and the fact that, in the light of that claim, prosecuting counsel does not feel able to make the document available.

We are not concerned with that unless we have jurisdiction to consider the appeal itself. So I turn to this preliminary point applying to both appeals, namely, have we any jurisdiction?

The starting point must be section 18 of the Supreme Court Act 1981. Section 18(1) provides: "No appeal shall lie to the Court of Appeal—(a) . . . from any judgment of the High Court in any criminal cause or matter."

Mr. Stevens also referred us to section 53(3) of the same Act, which provides: "The civil division of the Court of Appeal shall exercise the whole of the jurisdiction of that court not exercisable by the criminal division." He argued that if the criminal division has no jurisdiction, then this division has; and if this division has no jurisdiction, then no division has. That may well be right.

The meaning of this section in its earlier form, where it is contained in section 31 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1925, was authoritatively considered by the House of Lords in Amand v. Home Secretary and Minister of Defence of the Royal Netherlands Government [1943] A.C. 147. I need only cite from the speeches of Lord Wright and Viscount Simon L.C. If I might take first Lord Wright, who said, at pp. 159-160:

"The words 'cause or matter' are, in my opinion, apt to include any form of proceeding. The word 'matter' does not refer to the subject-matter of the proceeding, but to the proceeding itself. It is introduced to exclude any limited definition of the word 'cause.' In the present case, the immediate proceeding in which the order was made was not the cause or matter to which the section refers. The cause or matter in question was the application to the court to exercise its powers under the Allied Forces Act and the order, and to deliver the appellant to the Dutch military authorities. It is in reference to the nature of that proceeding that it must be determined whether there was an order made in a criminal cause or matter. That was the matter of substantive law. The writ of habeas corpus deals with the machinery of justice, and is essentially a procedural writ, the object of which is to enforce a legal right."

Again, he said, at p. 162:

"The principle which I deduce from the authorities I have cited and the other relevant authorities which I have considered, is that if the cause or matter is one which, if carried to its conclusion, might result in the conviction of the person charged and in a sentence of some punishment, such as imprisonment or fine, it is a 'criminal cause or matter.' The person charged is thus put in jeopardy. Every order made in such a cause or matter by an English court, is an order in a criminal cause or matter, even though the order, taken by itself, is neutral in character and might equally have been made in a cause or matter which is not criminal. The order may not involve punishment by the law of this country, but if the effect of the order is to subject by means of the operation of English law the persons charged to the criminal jurisdiction of a foreign country, the order is, in the eyes of English law for the purposes being considered, an order in a criminal cause or matter, as is shown by Ex parte Woodhall, 20 Q.B.D. 832 and Rex v. Brixton Prison (Governor of), Ex parte Savarkar [1910] 2 K.B. 1056."

So Lord Wright was saying that you look not to the particular order under appeal, but to the underlying proceedings in which that order was made, and those are the proceedings which have to be characterised as either criminal or non-criminal.

Viscount Simon L.C. said, at p. 156:

"It is the nature and character of the proceedings in which habeas corpus is sought which provide the test. If the matter is one the direct outcome of which may be trial of the applicant and his possible punishment for an alleged offence by a court claiming jurisdiction to do so, the matter is criminal. This is the true effect of the 'two conditions' formulated by Viscount Cave in In re Clifford and O'Sullivan [1921] 2 A.C. 570, 580."

So Lord Simon is saying precisely the same thing. Habeas corpus as such cannot be a criminal cause or matter; it is either neutral or civil. What Lord

3 W.L.R.

Day v. Grant (C.A.)

Sir John
Donaldson M.R.

A Simon is saying is that you look to see what is the nature or character of the proceedings in which habeas corpus is sought, and that provides the test.

B Applying Amand's case, it is quite clear that these witness summonses were issued or varied in criminal causes or matters. But this appeal has been argued on the basis that there are two decisions of this court which suggest that Amand's case has a narrower meaning. I think, on analysis, that there is probably only one case, namely Reg. v. Southampton Justices, Ex parte Green [1976] Q.B. 11, but reference is also made to Reg. v. Sheffield Crown Court, Ex parte Brownlow [1980] Q.B. 530.

C In Green's case Mrs. Green was complaining of an order by magistrates estreating her bail. The matter went to the Divisional Court for judicial review, and then came to this court, presided over by Lord Denning M.R. Lord Denning M.R. with the agreement of Browne L.J. and Brightman J. sitting with him, held that it was within the jurisdiction of this court, and he cited the passage from Lord Simon, which I have already cited, but unfortunately he did not cite the first sentence from that passage, namely, "It is the nature and character of the proceedings in which habeas corpus is sought which provide the test." He cited [1976] Q.B. 11, 15 only the succeeding sentence:

D "If the matter is one the direct outcome of which may be trial of the applicant and his possible punishment for an alleged offence by a court claiming jurisdiction to do so, the matter is criminal."

And he said that the outcome of the order to estreat bail could not be the punishment or conviction of Mrs. Green, and therefore this court had jurisdiction.

E Both I and May L.J., with whom I was sitting, in the case of Reg. v. Lambeth Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate, Ex parte McComb [1983] Q.B. 551, expressed our personal view that Green's case [1976] Q.B. 11 involved a misinterpretation of Amand's case [1943] A.C. 147, but both of us of course recognised that we were bound by Green's case unless we could distinguish it. We did not think that we could distinguish it in McComb's case [1983] Q.B. 551 for reasons to which I shall return in a moment. Equally, I do not consider that sitting on this occasion I could do other than follow Green's case if it is indistinguishable; but, in my judgment, it quite plainly is distinguishable. Of Green's case it can be said that the proceedings in relation to Mrs. Green were collateral to the criminal cause or matter. In this case the summonses were both issued by the court which was itself charged with the criminal cause or matter and in that matter. If there is to be a distinction, that must be it; and, in my judgment, it is a valid distinction, assuming that Green's case validly interprets Amand's case.

F Brownlow's case was slightly different. It was concerned with jury vetting, and the court held that it had no jurisdiction because of section 10 of the Courts Act 1971. It was only Lord Denning M.R. who expressed a firm view on the jurisdiction of this court in terms of section 18. Shaw L.J., who was sitting with him, said that the matter had not been fully argued, and Brandon L.J. treated the remarks of the then Master of the Rolls as being unnecessary for the decision of the case.

G That leaves McComb's case [1983] Q.B. 551, to which I have already referred. There proceedings were brought which, at the time when they came to the Court of Appeal, involved only a claim to a declaration as to the duties of the Director of Public Prosecutions in relation to a criminal cause or matter. That is quite clearly rather further removed from the criminal cause or matter than was the situation in Green's case [1976] Q.B. 11, although, as I say, both I and May L.J. expressed the view that but for Green's case we would have held that that arose from a criminal cause or matter and that accordingly we had no jurisdiction.

H The latest case in this line of cases is Reg. v. Secretary of State for the Home Department, Ex parte Dannenberg [1984] Q.B. 766, in which this

Sir John
Donaldson M.R.Day v. Grant (C.A.)*[1987]

court on appeal from the Divisional Court was concerned with the propriety of a recommendation for deportation. This court seems to have held that the recommendation was made in a criminal cause or matter and that there could be no appeal against the refusal of the Divisional Court to quash it. However, this court itself quashed the recommendation upon the basis that it was invalid, having been made without referral. This appears to be a further refinement.

For my part, I cannot think of a case in which the order appealed from arises more clearly in a criminal cause or matter than this, and I would decline jurisdiction. It is right to say that the distinction which is made in Green's case [1976] Q.B. 11 from the general line that this court has no jurisdiction in a criminal cause or matter has caused a great deal of difficulty, and if a convenient opportunity occurred for their Lordships' House to consider Amand's case [1943] A.C. 147 and the subsequent cases and either reaffirm or vary or clarify Amand's case, I cannot help thinking that it would be an exercise which would be applauded both by the judiciary and perhaps even more so by practitioners. But, for the reasons I have given, I would decline jurisdiction in these appeals.

KERR L.J. I agree.

LLOYD L.J. I also agree.

Landlord and Tenant—Option to extend term—Conditions—Option to take further lease conditional upon observance of covenants—Breaches of positive and negative covenants—Breaches of positive covenants remedied—Whether breaches of negative covenants remediable—Whether breaches precluding exercise of option—Whether notice exercising option specifying correct date

C By a lease dated 20 September 1982, the plaintiffs granted the defendants a term of 15 years from 1 April 1982 and, by clause 9 of the lease, the defendants had the option to take a further lease for a period of 125 years “from the date of the term hereby granted” provided that not later than 29 September 1985 the defendants gave the plaintiffs written notice of their desire to exercise the option and they had performed and observed the tenant’s covenants contained in the lease. Those covenants included a requirement to pay the rent in the manner prescribed, to pay rates and not to apply for planning permission for the demised premises without the plaintiffs’ written consent. In 1984 the defendants, without the consent of the plaintiffs, made two unsuccessful applications for outline planning permission and fell into arrears in payment of the rent and the water rates. The plaintiffs re-entered the demised premises but, in 1985, the defendants obtained from the court relief from forfeiture and paid off the arrears of rent and water rates. Subsequently by letter dated 19 September 1985, the defendants purported to exercise the option “to take a further term . . . for 125 years from 1 April 1982 . . .” The plaintiffs brought proceedings for declarations that the purported exercise of the option was invalid and the option could no longer be exercised.

F On the trial of preliminary issues as to the validity of the exercise of the option Scott J. held that the expression “from the date of the term hereby granted” was to be construed as referring to 1 April 1982 and not to the date when the lease was executed and thus the terms of the letter of 19 September 1985 were effective to constitute an exercise of the option in accordance with the provisions of clause 9 of the lease, and the defendants were not precluded under clause 9 of the lease from exercising the option if they had remedied their past breaches of covenants but that, although a breach of a positive obligation was capable of remedy, once an act resulting in the breach of a negative covenant had been done the covenant had been broken and its breach could not be remedied so that while the defendants had remedied their breaches of the positive covenants by paying the rent and the water rates, their action in applying for planning permission, without the plaintiffs’ consent, albeit unsuccessfully, could not be remedied thus preventing fulfilment of the condition precedent and precluding the defendants from exercising the option contained in clause 9 of the lease.

H On appeal by the defendants and cross-appeal by the plaintiffs:—

Held, (1) allowing the defendants’ appeal, that the option in favour of the defendants to take a further lease was in common form and was not to be construed as requiring the defendants to have duly observed and performed all the covenants so that the exercise of the option was limited to so strict an observance of the covenants that it would be unlikely that any tenant would be in a position to exercise the option; that the common form of option required that at the time the option was exercised no breach subsisted that had not been remedied or for which the landlords had an unsatisfied cause of action; that where there had been a breach that had ceased or had been remedied, the breach of covenant was spent and a spent breach of covenant, whether of a negative or positive covenant, did not affect the exercise of the option; and that, accordingly, the unsuccessful applications for planning permission, being breaches of a negative covenant which were spent at the material time, did not affect the defendants' right to exercise the option (post, pp. 549D-H, 557F-G, 559E-G, 564D-F, 565B-F).

Grey v. Friar (1854) 4 H.L.Cas. 565, H.L.(E.) and Finch v. Underwood (1876) 2 Ch. D. 310, C.A. applied.

Bassett v. Whiteley (1982) 45 P. & C.R. 87, C.A. considered.

(2) Dismissing the cross-appeal, that the words "from the date of the term hereby granted" were apt to refer to the beginning of the term of the lease and were not a natural way of referring to the date of the expiry of the original term and since that was the most likely date the parties had in mind the defendants' letter of 19 September 1985 complied with the formal requirements for the exercise of the option contained in clause 9 of the lease (post, pp. 558B, 566A-C, E-F).

APPEAL from Scott J.

B By a lease dated 20 September 1982, the plaintiffs, Bass Holdings Ltd., demised to the defendants, Morton Music Ltd., premises known as the Queen's Hotel, Hamlet Court Road, Westcliff-on-Sea, Essex, for a term of 15 years computed from 1 April 1982 at a yearly rent of £15,000, payable on the usual quarter days. There was provision for three yearly rent reviews. The lease contained covenants by the tenant to pay the rent, rates and taxes, etc. and to keep the demised premises in good and substantial repair, order and condition. There was also a negative covenant by the tenant not to apply under the provisions of the planning law for planning permission in respect of the demised premises without the lessors' prior written consent, such consent not to be unreasonably withheld. Clause 9 of the lease contained an option that the defendants could take a further lease for a term of 125 years "from the date of the term hereby granted" provided they were not in breach of any of the tenant's covenants contained in the lease.

D The defendants failed to pay the rent and the water rates and it also twice unsuccessfully applied for outline planning permission without the plaintiffs' consent. The plaintiffs re-entered and forfeited the lease but the defendants successfully applied for relief against forfeiture and paid off the arrears.

E By a letter dated 19 September 1985, the defendants sought to exercise the option contained in clause 9, to ask for a further term of 125 years from 1 April 1982. The plaintiffs contended that the notice was ineffective because "the date of the term hereby granted" was either 20 September 1982 or 31 March 1997, and that in any event the defendants' breaches of covenant precluded them exercising the option. The plaintiffs by originating summons dated 7 November 1985, sought (1) a declaration that the letter of 19 September 1985 was invalid and ineffective for the purpose of exercising the option; (2) further or alternatively that by reason of breaches of covenant the defendants were not entitled to the grant of a further lease pursuant to clause 9; and (3) a declaration that the option could no longer be exercised. By an order of Master Cholmondeley Clarke the following questions were directed to be tried as preliminary issues (a) whether the option notice dated 19 September 1985 was a valid notice to exercise the option contained in clause 9, and (b) whether the defendants were precluded from exercising the option by virtue of past breaches of covenant.

G Scott J. decided that the terms of the letter of 19 September 1985 were effective to constitute an exercise of the option in accordance with clause 9 of the lease, but that the breaches of covenant committed by the defendants in applying for planning permission could not be remedied so that the defendants were not entitled to the grant of a further lease pursuant to clause 9 of the lease and that the option contained in the clause could not be exercised by the defendants.

H By a notice of appeal dated 20 August 1986 the defendants appealed from the judge's decision on the second preliminary issue on the grounds that (i) the judge was wrong in law in holding that by reason of the making of two applications for outline planning permission without the consent of the plaintiffs the defendants were not entitled to exercise the option contained in clause 9 of the lease and (2) the judge ought to have held that on the true construction of clause 9 and in the events which had happened the defendants were entitled to exercise the option and were entitled to be granted a further lease pursuant to the clause. A

By a respondent's notice dated 28 August 1986 under R.S.C., Ord. 59, r. 6 the plaintiffs sought the judge's decision on the second preliminary issue to be affirmed on the following additional grounds that (1) the letter dated 19 September 1985 was invalid and ineffective for the purpose of exercising the option contained in clause 9 of the lease; (2) the defendants were not entitled to the grant of a further lease pursuant to clause 9 by reason of breaches of covenant committed by the defendants and by reason of the defendants' failure to pay rent reserved by the lease prior to the date of the letter dated 19 September 1985. B

The facts are stated in the judgment of Kerr L.J. C

Robert Pryor Q.C. and Nicholas Dowding for the defendants.
Paul Morgan for the plaintiffs.

Cur. adv. vult.

19 March. The following judgments were handed down. D

KERR L.J. This is an appeal from a judgment of Scott J. [1987] 2 W.L.R. 397 given on 30 July 1986. It arises from the trial of a number of preliminary issues concerning the validity of the exercise by the defendant tenants of an option for a further lease from the plaintiff landlords. The main controversy turns on the materiality, if any, of past breaches of covenants by the defendants, both positive and negative, whose effect was spent before the exercise of the option. This raises a point of considerable general importance. There is also a relatively minor issue on the validity of the wording of the letter which purported to exercise the option. The plaintiffs issued an originating summons claiming declarations that on all these grounds there had been no valid exercise of the option. The judge agreed on the ground of the defendants' past breaches of one of the negative covenants in the lease, but he rejected the plaintiffs' other contentions. The defendants now appeal to reverse this decision, and the plaintiffs cross-appeal to uphold it on all the grounds raised by their summons. E

The leased premises are the Queen's Hotel, Hamlet Court Road, Westcliffe-on-Sea, Essex. The plaintiff freeholders form part of the well known brewery group, and the premises include a tied public house as well as a hotel. By a lease dated 20 September 1982 the plaintiffs let the premises to the defendants for "15 years computed from 1st April 1982" at a yearly rent of £15,000 "for the first three years of the said term." Thereafter the rent was to be subject to upward adjustments in accordance with a rent review procedure. The lease contained the usual types of covenants to be found in lettings of commercial premises, as well as a series of further covenants specifically designed for tied public houses. The covenants were both positive and negative without any purported distinction between them. Some contained both positive and negative obligations in the same provision, and the effect of others was put both positively and negatively in different provisions, e.g. a covenant to deal exclusively with the plaintiffs and not to purchase any supplies from anyone else, or not to do anything which might cause the licence F G H

A for the premises to lapse on the one hand, and to use best endeavours to ensure that it was regularly renewed on the other. There was also a provision for re-entry for any breach of covenant in the normal form.

Clause 9 contained the option which has given rise to the dispute:

B “If the tenant shall be desirous of taking a further lease of the demised premises for a further term of 125 years from the date of the term hereby granted and shall not later than 29 September 1985 give to the lessors notice in writing of such its desire and if it shall have paid the rent hereby reserved and shall have performed and observed the several stipulations on its part herein contained and on its part to be performed and observed up to the date thereof then the lessors will on payment to them by the tenant of the sum of £300,000 let the demised premises to the tenant for a further term of 125 years from the date of the term hereby granted at a rent of one peppercorn per annum (if demanded) subject in all other respects to the same stipulations as are herein contained except this clause for renewal and save for the alterations referred to in Part III of the schedule hereto.”

D By a letter of 19 September 1985 from the defendants’ then solicitors, which the plaintiffs received on the following day, the defendants purported to exercise this option in the following terms:

E “We act for Morton Music Ltd. the tenant of the above premises under a lease granted by you on 20 September 1982. We hereby give you notice of our client’s desire under clause 9 of the lease to take a further term of the demised premises for 125 years from 1 April 1982 and otherwise upon the terms referred to in the lease. We are sending a copy of this letter to Messrs. Nabarro Nathanson your solicitors and we look forward to hearing from them in connection with the new lease accordingly.”

F The plaintiffs deny that this letter constituted an effective exercise of the option. First, they challenge the wording of the letter because it referred to the commencement of the new term as from 1 April 1982 whereas they contend that it should have been either from 20 September 1982, the date of the lease, or from 31 March 1997, the date of the expiry of the 15 year term. Secondly, and mainly, the plaintiffs rely on a number of breaches of covenants on the ground that these preclude the right to exercise the option in any event. One of these is disputed and its determination remains in issue, viz., whether the premises complied with the repairing and decorating covenants throughout the period from 20 September 1982 to 20 September 1985 inclusive. In that respect the defendants are said to have been in breach of covenant at the time when they purported to exercise the option. This is disputed by the defendants but it is common ground that if the defendants were in breach at the time when they purported to exercise the option, then it must necessarily follow that it could not have been exercised validly. However, in order to avoid possibly needless proceedings to decide this issue of disputed fact, it was agreed that there should be a trial of the other two issues which I have mentioned, the form of the exercise of the option and the materiality, if any, of past breaches of covenant. I will deal first with the latter and main issue, which raises questions of principle.

H The defendants’ past breaches of covenant fall into two groups, one positive and the other negative, and all of them are undisputed. The course of events was briefly as follows. By September 1984 rent due under the lease was in arrears to the extent of about £18,000 and the defendants were also in default in payment of water rates. These were breaches of positive covenants. On 11 September 1984 the plaintiffs re-entered the premises and forfeited the lease on account of the rent arrears. On 9 October 1984 the defendant issued a summons seeking relief from forfeiture. In reply to this application the plaintiffs relied on two breaches of a further negative covenant:

“The tenant will not apply under . . . the planning law for planning permission in respect of the demised premises without the lessors’ prior written consent (such consent not to be unreasonably withheld).”

In that connection it is agreed that in March and again in October or November 1984 respectively two applications for outline planning permission relating to the premises were made on behalf of the defendants without the plaintiffs’ consent. Both were rejected by the local planning authority, and it is common ground that neither has caused any quantifiable loss or damage to the plaintiffs. When the plaintiffs relied upon these breaches of covenant as an additional ground for forfeiting the lease, the defendants applied for relief in relation to these breaches as well. Their application was granted by Master Dyson by an order made on 12 March and slightly varied on 1 April 1985. This recited an undertaking by the defendants at all times thereafter to comply with the covenant not to apply for planning permission without the plaintiffs’ written consent. It also granted the defendants relief from forfeiture both in respect of the arrears of rent and water rates and in respect of these breaches of covenant, but subject to certain conditions. These required the defendants to pay the arrears of rent and water rates together with interest and the plaintiffs’ taxed costs. Each of these conditions was complied with, so that the defendants’ lease had been reinstated unconditionally before the purported exercise of the option.

The relief from forfeiture and reinstatement of the lease could obviously not undo any of the breaches of covenant in the sense that it could not be said that they had never taken place. On the other hand, the breaches lay wholly in the past and their effect was spent. It was not contended that any cause of action based upon them subsisted at the time of the purported exercise of the option other than a possible theoretical claim for nominal damages on the ground that the planning applications had been made without the plaintiffs’ consent. But this is a submission without any commercial or other sensible reality, and the judge rightly did not base himself upon it. Moreover, these admitted breaches of covenant, like the others, became subject to the proceedings between the parties and were dealt with in the resulting order. It follows that their effect was then spent.

This brings me to the classification of breaches of covenants by reference to the time of their occurrence and subsistence, on which the present issues turn. As explained below, there is clearly a long standing conveyancing practice, going back more than two centuries, whereby tenants’ options in leases are made subject to provisos dealing with the observance of the tenants’ covenants, similar to the option in the present case, whether the option be for a new lease as here, or for premature termination of an existing lease (a “break” option), or for the purchase of the freehold. In all such cases the provisos link the required

A observance of the covenants to a point of time in the nature of a terminus ad quem. This may be either the date of the exercise of the option as here, or the date of the expiry of the option, or—in cases of options for renewals or for the purchase of the freehold—the date of the expiry of the lease. For present purposes the particular date referred to in the proviso (“the operative date”) does not matter. What matters is B whether the breach (or breaches) of covenant on which the plaintiffs rely as precluding the exercise of the option has only occurred in the past, so that its effect is spent by the operative date in question, or whether there is still a breach—or at any rate a cause of action based upon a breach, whether for forfeiture or damages or both—which subsists on the operative date. I will refer to the breaches of covenant in these two situations respectively as “spent breaches” and “subsisting C breaches.” The present appeal is concerned exclusively with spent breaches.

In my view the position on the authorities and on the issues raised by the present case can be summarised as follows.

(1) The first question is whether, on the true construction of the proviso in question, the absence of any material breaches of covenant by the defendants is a condition precedent to the exercise of the option, as D well as the giving of the requisite notice purporting to exercise the option.

Generally, and admittedly in the present case, the proviso contains a double condition precedent, viz. (i) the absence of any material breaches of covenants and (ii) compliance with the requirement as to notice.

(2) That, however, leaves the crucial question whether the condition precedent (i), that there must be no material breaches of covenant by E the defendants, applies to spent as well as to subsisting breaches. This question is covered by dicta in numerous cases, going back in particular to Grey v. Friar (1854) 4 H.L.Cas. 565, and by the decision of Clauson J. in Simons v. Associated Furnishers Ltd. [1931] 1 Ch. 379. The upshot of these authorities is that spent breaches will not destroy the tenant's F right to exercise the option, but subsisting breaches will. As shown by the passages to which I refer below, the reasoning is in effect as follows.
First, it must be accepted that absolute and precise compliance by the tenant with every single covenant throughout the period of the lease prior to the operative date is virtually impossible of attainment. If this were required as a condition precedent, then the option would in practice be worthless or merely at the mercy of the landlord. Therefore G the parties cannot have intended that the absence of spent breaches should be a condition precedent. Secondly, however, it is natural and sensible that the landlord should require the tenant not to be in breach of any covenant on the operative date and that all outstanding claims for breach of covenant should have been previously satisfied, so that the lease is then effectively clear. The proviso is therefore to be construed as intended to apply to subsisting breaches, with the result that the H relevant condition precedent is the absence of any subsisting breach.

(3) The only suggestion that spent breaches might be able to preclude the exercise of the option is to be found in the judgment of Griffiths L.J. in Bassett v. Whiteley (1982) 45 P. & C.R. 87. But this lies in a different line of authority, as explained below, and cannot properly be applied to the present case.

(4) Subject to the question whether the wording of any particular proviso imposes a condition precedent to the exercise of the option, which was the issue in Grey v. Friar, 4 H.L.Cas. 565, the precise words used in such provisos in relation to the observance of the covenants have played no part in the conclusions summarised in (2) above. While it would of course be possible to formulate a proviso which is sufficiently explicit to cause spent breaches to preclude the exercise of the option, there appears to be no reported case in which this was so; and the wording of the proviso in the present case is in a form similar to, and effectively indistinguishable from, the formulations adopted in all the cases subsequent to Grey v. Friar. Accordingly, in mentioning some of these cases below, it would serve no purpose to set out the precise terms of the particular provisos.

(5) The reasoning summarised in (2) above, which has led to the generally accepted conclusion that the condition precedent imposed by provisos like the present was intended to apply only to subsisting breaches, is of course particularly cogent in relation to “break” options. In such cases it will obviously be of great importance to the landlord that the demised land or premises should be surrendered to him free from any subsisting breaches of covenant. In cases of options for renewals it may also be of some importance to the landlord that the slate should be clean before the new lease takes effect. In cases of options to buy the freehold, the absence of subsisting breaches may be less important to the landlord. However, the authorities suggest no distinction between these types of option in relation to the conclusions summarised in (2) above. Admittedly, Grey v. Friar in 1854, 4 H.L.Cas. 565, and Porter v. Shephard (1796) 6 Durn. & E. 665, which was followed in Grey v. Friar, both involved “break” options. But their reasoning has been followed and applied in relation to tenants’ options generally. Accordingly, there is nowadays no reason for imposing any different or special construction on the familiar forms of provisos governing any particular type of tenants’ option, such as the option for a further lease in the present case.

(6) Strong arguments can admittedly be raised in extreme cases against the construction that the effect of the condition precedent is to be limited to the absence of subsisting breaches. For instance, what about a tenant who has persistently broken his covenants and only puts matters right just before the operative date? As mentioned below, this troubled Griffiths L.J. in Bassett v. Whiteley, 45 P. & C.R. 87, albeit in a different context. But it must also be borne in mind that the condition requiring the absence of any subsisting breach on the operative date involves not only that any breach should have ceased, but also that there should be no subsisting cause of action in respect of any breach. Thus, a landlord may perhaps take advantage of the latter condition, in order to defeat a tenant’s option, by postponing any claim for forfeiture or damages in respect of an earlier breach until after the operative date. Anomalies on both sides are inevitable on any construction. But the consensus to be found in the authorities is that the anomaly which must be rejected as too great to be acceptable is that any spent breach should disqualify.

(7) The upshot, in cases such as the present, is that we are nowadays dealing with what has become a standard conveyancing formula imposing a condition precedent concerning the absence of (material) breaches of covenant in relation to the exercise of virtually any tenants’ option in leases. The unanimous consensus on the authorities in relation to a proviso such as the present is as summarised in (2) above, viz. that the

A condition applies to subsisting breaches and not to spent breaches. There is no reported case in which any tenant's option has been defeated by a spent breach, and virtually none in which this has even been suggested. In these circumstances it is in my view of great importance that this accepted long standing interpretation of provisos such as the present should be respected and upheld, since it must have been relied upon and applied in countless transactions.

B (8) Up to this point my conclusions accord entirely with those of the judge. But I regret that at this juncture there comes a parting of the ways between our views. He points out, entirely correctly, that the jurisprudence leading to the accepted interpretation which I have summarised above, that spent breaches are irrelevant to the exercise of tenants' options, has been concerned throughout with spent breaches of positive covenants, such as failures to pay rent, to repair, etc. The issue has never arisen in the context of a spent breach of a negative covenant. Admittedly, none of the authorities contains any suggestion that there is any difference between breaches of positive and negative covenants for present purposes, whether the breaches be spent or subsisting. But the judge nevertheless concluded that there was a material difference between them. He appears to have based this on the consideration that a breach of a positive covenant can be remedied in the sense, or to the extent, of belated performance. In effect, the tenant can take some positive action to put things right. But a breach of a negative covenant, albeit "spent" in the sense in which I have used this term, is irremediable. It cannot be undone, any more than Omar Khayam's "moving finger . . . having writ," or an indelible stain on the tenant's escutcheon. The judge accordingly concluded that while the defendants' failure to pay the rent and water rates did not disqualify them from exercising the option, their applications for planning permission without the plaintiffs' consent did have this effect. The reason was that the former were breaches of positive covenants whereas the latter were breaches of a negative covenant. The judge therefore granted the plaintiffs' application for a declaration that the defendants' option had not been validly exercised.

F (9) With all due respect, I cannot agree with this analysis or with the conclusion to which it leads. It is not based on any commercial or other practical consideration. Its effect would be entirely fortuitous. Thus, as mentioned at the beginning of this judgment, many of the covenants in this lease in common form contain both positive and negative obligations in one provision, and other obligations to the same or similar effect have been expressed in the form of both positive and negative covenants. I do not see on what realistic grounds it could be said that the intention of the parties was that spent breaches of positive covenants should be irrelevant, but that any breach of any negative covenant, albeit equally "spent" in its practical effect, should disqualify.

H This is a summary of the reasons why, while agreeing with the judge on the main part of his analysis of the authorities, I respectfully differ from his ultimate conclusion.

I must now briefly review the authorities. Although I agree with the judge about their effect, I must do so because Mr. Morgan challenged the judge's analysis as a whole. He did not abandon reliance upon the distinction which he drew between the different effect of spent positive and negative covenants. But his primary submission was that any breach of any covenant during the currency of the lease prior to the operative date, whether spent or subsisting, disqualified the tenant from exercising the option. In relation to the present case he therefore placed equal reliance on the defendants' failures to pay the rent and water rates in due time as on their unsuccessful planning applications without the plaintiffs' consent.

In reviewing the authorities one must necessarily start with Grey v. Friar, 4 H.L.Cas. 565. Although of great importance for present purposes, it was a remarkably unattractive case which occupied the courts repeatedly between July 1848 and August 1853. "Bleak House" was published in instalments between March 1852 and September 1853, and "Jarndyce v. Jarndyce" must have appeared familiar to the parties. There were two successive actions by the landlords for breaches of covenants contained in a mining lease for 42 years with a "break" option in favour of the tenants after eight years, and every third year thereafter, subject to 18 months' prior notice and the following proviso, at p. 568:

"then in such case (all arrears of rent being paid, and all and singular the covenants and agreements on the part of the lessees having been duly observed and performed,) this lease and every clause and thing herein contained shall, at the expiration of the first eighth year and thereafter at the expiration of any such third year . . . cease, determine, and be utterly void . . . But nevertheless without prejudice to any claim or remedy which any of the parties hereto . . . may then be entitled to for breach of any of the covenants or agreements hereinbefore contained."

As pointed out in the headnote to the first action (1850) 15 Q.B. 891, "the covenants on the part of the lessees . . . were very numerous, and some . . . were negative covenants." The landlords sued for arrears of rent due in the ninth year and alleged breaches of covenant. The tenants pleaded that they had validly exercised the "break" option so as to determine the lease at the end of the eighth year and that there were then no subsisting breaches. The landlords replied to the effect that they put the tenants to proof of due compliance with all covenants at the end of the eighth year. This was held to be a good replication by the Court of Exchequer but bad by the Exchequer Chamber on a writ of error, holding that the landlords had to limit their joinder of issue to particularised breaches. In addition, the Exchequer Chamber 15 Q.B. 901, 912 held, obiter, that in view of the last sentence of the proviso, performance of the covenants "could never have been meant to be a condition precedent to the power to terminate the lease."

But the landlords were undeterred and brought a fresh action. On this occasion their replication relied, inter alia, on a breach of a particular covenant which gave a right of re-entry "if any thing should be done, or neglected to be done, whereby the colliery might be drowned with water, or otherwise damnified" 4 H.L.Cas. 565, 566. It is interesting to note that this covenant was both positive and negative in its terms. There was then a demurrer joining issue on the question whether due performance of all the covenants throughout the period of the lease was a condition precedent to the tenants' right to exercise the option.

That issue does not directly affect the subsequent cases, including the present, since it turned largely on the last sentence of the proviso which thereafter fell out of use. But the division of opinion which followed was supported on both sides by comments which are of great relevance, and the history of the action was remarkable. The Court of Exchequer held

3 W.L.R.

Bass Ltd. v. Morton Ltd. (C.A.)

Kerr L.J.

A that the proviso was not a condition precedent to the exercise of the option. This was unanimously reversed by the judges of the Exchequer Chamber, having evidently changed their minds about the obiter passage in the first action mentioned above. The case then went to the House of Lords who called on the judges for assistance. There were eleven reported judgments, eight in favour of the view that the proviso contained a condition precedent and three against. The Judicial Committee consisted only of Lord Cranworth L.C. and Lord Brougham, but Lord Cranworth L.C. gave the only judgment, since Lord Brougham was absent due to illness. Lord Cranworth L.C. had been a party to the decision of the Court of Exchequer (as he pointed out), and was in favour of allowing the appeal. But he said that Lord Brougham had told him that he took the opposite view and agreed with the Exchequer Chamber. Lord Cranworth L.C. added that he derived some comfort (but evidently little conviction) from the fact that there was such a large majority of the judges who took the same view. Accordingly, since the House of Lords was equally divided, the decision of the Exchequer Chamber stood.

D For present purposes, it is not the outcome but the reasoning which is important. None of the judgments supported the conclusion that spent breaches barred the exercise of the option. There was general consensus that the parties could not have intended to make it a condition precedent that none of the covenants should ever have been broken in the slightest degree during the currency of the lease. Both sides proceeded on the basis that the absence of any breach to which I have referred as a "spent" breach could not have been intended as a condition precedent.

E The division of opinion between them was accordingly on the following lines. The minority thought that, in view of this, the proviso could not have been intended as a condition precedent, particularly having regard to the concluding sentence. The majority, on the other hand, did take the view that the proviso as a whole was in the nature of a condition precedent, but then concluded that spent breaches did not bar the exercise of the option, provided that there were no subsisting breaches at the operative date, the end of the first eight years of the term. That was the outcome. But since all the proceedings were by way of demurrer, without any investigation of the facts, history does not relate whether Mr. Grey or Mr. Friar was ultimately successful.

G Many passages could be quoted from the judgments on both sides in support of the view summarised in paragraph (2) above, which Scott J. also accepted. But the clearest are four passages cited by him from those who were in the majority, as set out below. Talfourd J. said, at pp. 592-593:

H "the truth probably is, that in the framing of the proviso in question, the parties did not intend to use the words 'duly observed and performed' in their technical sense, as importing that no covenant during the eight years or longer period had ever been broken; in which sense they are certainly unreasonable; but in a sense in which they import a condition perfectly natural and just, namely, that before the expiration of the notice, the objects of the covenants should be attained, that is, that the works should be put into repair, the water pumped out of the mine, and everything done which the lessees were bound to do in order that they might deliver up the premises in a proper condition to their landlord."

Kerr L.J.

Bass Ltd. v. Morton Ltd. (C.A.)

[1987]

Alderson B. said, at p. 595:

"But I think that the condition precedent, even taking the words of it, may really mean that covenants broken, if the breach shall be compensated for before the expiration of notice, shall be considered as covenants duly performed within this proviso. For as rent in arrear, if paid before the expiration of the notice, clearly is within it, so the performance of the other covenants being found in conjunction with it, may bear the like interpretation."

Erle J. said, at pp. 599–600:

"It is said that there would be inconvenience in restricting the power of determining it to the event of all the covenants having been performed, which would be almost an impossibility. To this one answer is, that if the parties agree so to stipulate, the law must give effect to the stipulation. It may also be answered, that the stipulation does not mean that there should not have been any breach of covenant during the term, but that when the notice expires there should not exist any cause of action in respect of performance of covenants. The stipulation for arrears of rent being paid, refers to a covenant which had been broken; but all cause of action for the breach having been satisfied by subsequent accord, and the covenant for rent would, within the meaning of this clause, be observed and performed, if all arrears of rent were paid before the expiration of the notice. So the covenant for repair, though broken during the term, would be observed if all repairs were at last completed. So in respect of other breaches; if the damage had been settled by arbitration and the amount paid, or if an action had been brought and the judgment satisfied, the legal duty of the covenantor, by reason of his covenant, would have been so far observed and performed, that all liability in respect thereof would be at an end. In this sense, the stipulation would be free from any hardship towards the lessee, as he might obtain the privilege if he did his duty. This construction does not depend upon giving a peculiar effect to the words of this instrument, for it seems to me that the same principle is applicable to all contracts. The legal effect of the promise in every contract at common law is alternative, either to do the thing promised or make compensation instead. In some contracts the alternative is expressed when liquidated damages are stipulated for, in others the liability arises by implication of law, either to do or to compensate for not doing, according as may be settled by accord, or arbitration, or judgment. In all contracts the legal duty thereunder has been performed, and so the contract may be said in one sense to be performed, when either the thing contracted for has been done, or compensation instead thereof has been made."

Finally, Coleridge J. said, at pp. 608–609:

"The condition, thus expressed, I think it reasonable to understand as requiring that the account between the parties must, both as to rent and covenants, be clear; the rent need not have been always paid on the day; but all arrears, if any, must have been paid up; the covenants must have been strictly kept, or, if broken, must have been satisfied for. So understood, the words import a condition precedent neither impossible nor unreasonable; and where that is

A clearly the case, the mere difficulty of performance, from the number or nature of the covenants to be performed,—a fact which must have been perfectly within the knowledge of the party contracting,—seems to me a very unsatisfactory reason for holding it to be otherwise.”

B This is the reasoning which has in effect been adopted in the line of cases which followed. Scott J. referred to Finch v. Underwood (1876) 2 Ch. D. 310; Bastin v. Bidwell (1881) 18 Ch. D. 238 and the decision of Clauson J. in Simons v. Associated Furnishers Ltd. [1931] 1 Ch. 379. In Finch v. Underwood an obiter passage in the judgment of Mellish L.J. expresses the same view. In Bastin v. Bidwell, Kay J. did not have to decide the issue, but there is nothing in his judgment suggesting the contrary. But in Simons v. Associated Furnishers Ltd. Clauson J. decided it in the same sense, with references to Grey v. Friar in the following terms [1931] 1 Ch. 379, 386:

C “The next question is, what does the clause mean? Upon a possible construction, it may make it essential that the tenant should comply with all the covenants throughout the whole period of the five years or, in other words, that the tenant must be able to say that in no single instance during that period has rent been in arrear or a covenant broken. On that question there has been from time to time a certain amount of difference of judicial opinion. If the condition imports that it is unfulfilled if there has been any breach of covenant, even if it has been remedied, the condition may be a very hard one and such as can scarcely be supposed that parties would enter into; but here I am bound by a very heavy weight of judicial opinion to hold that the true meaning of that clause is this, that it will have been complied with, if at the end of the five years ‘there should not exist any cause of action in respect of performance of covenants:’ or, I may put it this way, the condition must be understood as ‘requiring that the account between the parties must, both as to rent and covenants, be clear; the rent need not have been always paid on the day; but all arrears, if any, must have been paid up; the covenants must have been strictly kept, or, if broken, must have been satisfied.’ In the language I have used I have ventured to quote the language in the first case of Erle J. [in Grey v. Friar, 4 H.L.Cas. 565, 599] and in the second case the language of Coleridge J. [at p. 608] in advising the House of Lords in the case to which I have already referred.”

G The only expression of judicial opinion the other way, but in a different context, is to be found in the judgment of Griffiths L.J. in this court in Bassett v. Whiteley in 1983, 45 P. & C.R. 87. A lease for eight years contained an option for renewal for a further term of the same length by giving to the landlord a written notice not more than 12 nor less than six months before the expiration of the term, provided that the tenants:

H “shall have paid the rent hereby reserved and shall have reasonably performed and observed the several stipulations herein contained and on their part to be performed and observed up to the termination of the tenancy hereby created . . .” see p. 88.

It will therefore be seen that the wording is virtually identical with the proviso in the present case, but subject to the addition of the important word "reasonably;" and whereas the "operative date" in the present case was the exercise of the option, in that case it was the termination of the original term. The tenants gave notice of their desire to exercise the option and this was accepted. Subsequently, however, they were twice late with their payments of rent, but by the operative date all the rent had been paid and there was no subsisting breach of covenant. The issue before the court, consisting of Waller and Griffiths L.J.J., was whether the condition precedent of the proviso had been satisfied on the ground that the tenants "shall have paid the rent hereby reserved and shall have reasonably performed and observed (the covenants up to the operative date)." The court unanimously upheld the exercise of the option. The ratio can be seen from the following passage towards the end of the judgment of Griffiths L.J., at p. 93:

"I agree with the approach of Waller L.J. I think this clause has to be read as a whole. It means that the whole of the rent must have been paid by the time that the eight-year term ended, and it further means that there must have been a reasonable performance of all the stipulations. For the reasons that he has given I think there was a reasonable performance of the stipulations, and in particular the one concerning the payment of rent."

But Mr. Morgan relied strongly on the following other passages in the judgment of Griffiths L.J. with reference to the citation by Mr. Maddocks for the tenants of Finch v. Underwood, 2 Ch. D. 310, and Bassett v. Bidwell, 8 Ch. D. 238. He said in that regard at the beginning of his judgment, at p. 92:

"Mr. Maddocks submitted that in construing an option of this kind the critical date at which to look was the termination of the tenancy, and he submitted that if, at that date, it could be seen, first, that all the rent had now been paid and, second, that any previous breaches of covenant, however troublesome, had now been remedied, then the tenants were, on a true construction of the clause, entitled to exercise their option. Now I emphatically disagree with that approach for it would mean this, that if throughout the whole of the eight-year term the tenants had continuously been woefully in arrears with their rent and had constantly had to be chased for it and were obviously late and poor payers, the landlord could, nevertheless, be saddled with them as tenants for another term if they paid up the arrears at the eleventh hour."

This highlights one of the anomalies to which I referred in paragraph (c) above flowing from the construction that spent breaches do not bar the exercise of an option. Nevertheless, and in agreement with the judge, I think that the current of judicial authority the other way is by now far too strong to be overcome by this short passage, and I cannot think that on a full consideration of the extracts from the judgments which I have cited Griffiths L.J. would have taken a different view. His remarks were obiter and concerned with a different point. My impression is that he was rejecting the argument of Mr. Maddocks in the context of the word "reasonably." He meant that unreasonable conduct throughout the term could not have been cured by late performance just before the operative date, since the stipulations in the proviso would in that event not have been "reasonably performed and observed."

3 W.L.R.

Bass Ltd. v. Morton Ltd. (C.A.)

Kerr L.J.

A Apart from placing great reliance upon that decision, Mr. Morgan also sought to rely on the unusual terms of the proviso in the present case. He pointed out that the option was exercisable at the beginning of the term, at any time within the first three years of a 15 year term, and he submitted that in these circumstances it was no hardship to require the tenants to perform all their covenants meticulously. He said that the purpose of the proviso was to enable the landlords to decide whether the tenants were satisfactory. But, in the same way as the judge, I cannot accept that this proviso, which is otherwise in common form and covered by all the authorities to which I have referred, should for those reasons receive some different and special construction in the present case.

B
C I then come to the point where I differ from the judge. While agreeing that spent breaches of positive covenants did not bar the option, he took a different view about spent breaches of negative covenants. I have already explained in paragraphs (8) and (9) above why I cannot accept this distinction. I can see no basis for it from the point of view of the sensible commercial construction of the clause. Nor is there any support for it to be found in the authorities. On the contrary, it seems to me that the policy line, if one may so call it, which has prevailed ever since Grey v. Friar, 4 H.L.Cas. 565, must logically apply in precisely the same way both to positive and negative covenants. Indeed, it is very often pure chance how a particular obligation is worded.

D
E The judge appears to have been influenced by some of the cases dealing with relief from forfeiture under section 146 of the Law of Property Act 1925. He referred to passages in Rugby School (Governors) v. Tannahill [1934] 1 K.B. 695; Scala House & District Property Co. Ltd. v. Forbes [1974] Q.B. 575 and Expert Clothing Service & Sales Ltd. v. Hillgate House Ltd. [1986] Ch. 340. These cases contain discussions about the irremediability of negative as opposed to positive covenants. But this issue does not go to the substance of the rights and obligations of the parties; but merely to the form of the notices which must be given pursuant to the section. As illustrated by the present case, in appropriate circumstances a tenant will obtain relief from forfeiture following breaches of negative covenants just as readily as for non-compliance with positive covenants. In both cases the effect of the breach becomes spent in the same way. Accordingly I cannot accept the judge's conclusion that the breaches of covenant in relation to rent and rates did not preclude the defendants from exercising the option to renew, but that the applications for planning permission without the plaintiffs' consent had this effect.

F
G This only leaves the plaintiffs' cross-appeal against the judge's conclusion that the form of wording in the letter of 19 September 1985 from the defendants' then solicitors complied with the formal requirements for the exercise of the option. It will be remembered that the lease was for "15 years computed from 1 April 1982," that the option was "for a further term of 125 years from the date of the term hereby granted," and that the letter referred to a further term "for 125 years from 1 April 1982." I entirely agree with the judge's conclusion on this part of the case. As regards the plaintiffs' alternative date of 31 March 1997, the judge pointed out the improbability that the parties could have intended that the new term should run from then, when the option had to be exercised more than 12 years earlier and the condition precedent requiring compliance with the covenants ceased to have effect thereafter. Moreover, 31 March 1997 was not “the date of the term hereby granted,” but the date on which it expired. As regards the other alternative date, 20 September 1982, when the lease was executed, this cannot have been of any particular materiality to the parties and may well have been unpredictable at the time when the proviso was negotiated. Moreover, as the judge pointed out, if this had been intended, then the proviso would no doubt have said simply “from the date hereof” or words to that effect. In my view the words “from the date of the term hereby granted” are perfectly apt to refer to 1 April 1982, and this is the most likely date which the parties had in mind. On behalf of the defendants Mr. Pryor additionally submitted that in any event the terms of the letter were sufficiently clear to constitute a valid exercise of the option even if there had been a mistake in regard to the date, and he relied in particular on Germax Securities Ltd. v. Spiegel (1978) 37 P. & C.R. 204. If it had been necessary to decide this point I would have been inclined to follow that decision in the present case, but in the circumstances I express no concluded opinion about it.

It follows that I would allow this appeal and refuse the plaintiffs’ application for declarations that, on the basis of the preliminary issues before the court, the defendants’ exercise of the option to renew was invalid.

NICHOLLS L.J.

The defendants’ appeal: the condition precedent

Leases frequently contain a clause entitling the tenant at his option to determine the lease prematurely or, conversely, to extend his interest in the demised property by obtaining a further lease. Such “break” or “renewal” clauses often, although by no means always, include a provision to the effect that the exercise by the tenant of his option is conditional upon his having paid his rent and performed and observed his covenants and agreements under the lease up to a specified date. Typically the specified date is either the date upon which the tenant gives notice of his intention to exercise his option or the date from which the notice would take effect: for example, in the case of a break clause, the date on which, if the option is exercised, the lease will determine.

Clauses in this form have been widely used in leases for a long time. Speaking in 1930, Clauson J. said that this “exceedingly familiar form” of clause had been in common use “for more than a century past:” Simons v. Associated Furnishers Ltd. [1931] 1 Ch. 379, 384. Shortly stated, the question of general importance, which arises on this appeal is whether in these clauses a condition to the effect I have mentioned requires for its fulfilment that throughout the whole term of the lease up to the specified date there shall have been no breach of any of the tenant’s covenants and agreements, or whether the condition is fulfilled if at the specified date there is no subsisting breach of any of these covenants or agreements. By the shorthand expression “no subsisting breach” I mean that in respect of the rent, covenants and agreements there is at the specified date no outstanding cause of action. I shall call the first of these two alternatives the “never any breach” construction, and the other alternative the “no subsisting breach” construction.

A I preface my observations by noting that, although each lease falls to be construed having regard to its own particular language and terms, the degree of similarity of language in break clauses and renewal clauses in common use is sufficiently marked in crucial respects for it to be possible and sensible to consider the matter, initially, in fairly general terms.

B The two alternative constructions have only to be stated for it to be apparent that the “never any breach” construction would mean that in practice the condition would be impossible of fulfilment in almost all cases of leases of buildings containing a full range of repairing and other covenants by a tenant. However diligent or even punctilious a tenant may be in carrying out his obligations under his lease, in such cases there will in practice inevitably be occasions when there will be
C outstanding some dilapidations which would, strictly, constitute breaches of the repairing or re-decorating covenants. Thus the practical consequence of the “never any breach” construction in such cases would be that the break or renewal option would seldom, if ever, be exercisable by a tenant.

D Even in the case of other leases, where the tenant’s covenants might be less far-reaching, this construction would lead to much uncertainty for tenants and their assigns. Break options and renewal options may be valuable but, on this construction, after a few years and particularly if there have been assignments or sublettings, the current tenant or a would-be assignee of the lease would be unable in many cases to discover whether or not a break option or a renewal option had already lapsed by reason of a breach of covenant. Indeed, short of a positive
E answer from a co-operative landlord, it is difficult to see how in this type of situation a tenant or would-be assignee could ever be sure that there had not been a breach, maybe trifling, of one covenant or another in the history of the lease.

F It is considerations of this nature that have led the court, for well over a century, to reject the “never any breach” construction. When parties to a lease include an option for the tenant to determine or renew the lease, their intention must be, adopting the words of Martin B. in his advice to the House of Lords in Grey v. Friar, 4 H.L.Cas. 565, 582, that “this was meant to be a real power, and not a merely delusive one.” On this question of construction there was a divergence of view in 1854, but thereafter there have been judicial dicta, of long standing, preferring the “no subsisting breach” construction. For many years that
G has been the conventional construction. The underlying rationale is that, whilst it is open to parties to agree that the exercise of a break option or a renewal option shall be subject to a condition as onerous and difficult to fulfil as a “never any breach” condition, where the language used is capable of another, more sensible, meaning, that meaning is to be preferred.

H I turn to the authorities. In Grey v. Friar the House of Lords considered a break clause in a 42 year lease of a colliery and a farm. The material part of the break clause provided that upon the lessees giving 18 months’ notice expiring on certain dates,

“then in such case (all arrears of rent being paid, and all and singular the covenants and agreements on the part of the lessees having been duly observed and performed,) this lease . . . shall . . . cease . . . But nevertheless without prejudice to any claim or remedy which any of the parties hereto . . . may then be entitled to for breach of any of the covenants or agreements hereinbefore contained:" see p. 568.

The issue before the House of Lords was whether the words in parentheses constituted a condition precedent to the exercise of the right of termination. The Court of Exchequer held not. The Court of Exchequer Chamber reversed that decision. The House of Lords was equally divided, and so the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber stood. An important feature in that case, not found in the present case, was the "without prejudice" proviso at the end of the clause. On the one hand, it could be said, the terms of this proviso were inconsistent with the right of termination being exercisable only if the covenants and agreements had all been duly observed. On the other hand, if the words in parentheses did not constitute a condition precedent, they were wholly inoperative.

Of the 11 judges who attended the House of Lords to advise their Lordships, three were of the view that the words in parentheses did not create a condition precedent and eight were of the contrary view. In reaching their conclusions each of the three judges in the minority placed some reliance on the view that to construe the words as creating a condition precedent would be likely to defeat the purpose of the clause, because, as Martin B. stated, at p. 582, "the slightest deviation from any covenant would put an end to the power." Crompton J. made the same point, at pp. 585-586, as did Parke B. at pp. 612-613. Thus these judges supported the literal, "never any breach" construction.

In coming to the contrary conclusion, that the words created a condition precedent, some of the eight judges favoured the "no subsisting breach" construction of these words, a construction assisted in that case by the reference to "arrears of rent." This phrase assumed that the rent had not always been paid punctually and this, in turn, assisted in giving a liberal meaning to the words "duly observed and performed" in relation to the lessees' covenants. Nevertheless some of the observations made are of relevance. In particular, Talfourd J., at p. 592, thought that "probably" the words "duly observed and performed" were not intended to be used in their technical sense, "as importing that no covenant during the eight years or longer period had ever been broken," but in the sense that before the expiration of the notice

"the objects of the covenants should be attained, that is . . . everything done which the lessees were bound to do in order that they might deliver up the premises in a proper condition to their landlord."

Erle J., at p. 599, considered the argument that the words in parentheses did not mean that there should not have been any breach during the term but that when the notice expired "there should not exist any cause of action in respect of performance of covenants." He observed that the requirement of arrears of rent having been paid referred to a covenant which had been broken but in respect of which all cause of action for the breach had been satisfied by subsequent accord. From this starting point he was attracted by the view that, likewise, if all repairs were at last carried out, and damages paid or any judgment satisfied in respect of breaches of other covenants, the legal duty of the covenantor would have been observed and performed to the

3 W.L.R.

Bass Ltd. v. Morton Ltd. (C.A.)

Nicholls L.J.

A extent that "all liability in respect thereof would be at an end." He added:

"In this sense, the stipulation would be free from any hardship towards the lessee, as he might obtain the privilege if he did his duty."

B He regarded this construction as not depending upon giving a peculiar effect to the words of that lease, but as an application of a general principle applicable to all contracts whereby

"In all contracts the legal duty thereunder has been performed, and so the contract may be said in one sense to be performed, when either the thing contracted for has been done, or compensation instead thereof has been made:" see p. 600.

C Likewise Coleridge J., at p. 608, construed the words in parentheses as requiring that at the relevant time:

D "the account between the parties must, both as to rent and covenants, be clear; the rent need not have been always paid on the day; but all arrears, if any, must have been paid up; the covenants must have been strictly kept, or, if broken, must have been satisfied for."

E That case concerned a break clause. With such a clause the commercial purpose achieved by a condition construed as meaning "no subsisting breach" is readily apparent: before the lease can be ended prematurely all the rent due must have been paid, the property must have been put into a proper state of repair, and the other covenants must have been observed and performed in the sense that all liability in respect of any previous breaches must be at an end. What commercial purpose, in such a case, would be served by the "never any breach" construction of the condition precedent is not so readily apparent. In this respect an option to renew may not stand on precisely the same footing. Where a lease is being renewed a landlord may well be concerned not merely with the state of the account between the parties when the option is exercised, but with the tenant's conduct, at least in the recent past. Furthermore, as already noted, Grey v. Friar, 4 H.L.Cas. 565, was a case in which the "no subsisting breach" construction was aided by the presence of the reference to arrears of rent.

F However, 20 years later the Court of Appeal had to consider a clause which did not contain any mention of arrears of rent and which was concerned with renewal. In Finch v. Underwood, 2 Ch. D. 310, 311, a seven-year lease contained a covenant for renewal by the landlord at the expiration of the term thereby granted "(in case the covenants and agreements on the said tenants' part shall have been duly observed and performed)." Notice exercising the option was given shortly before the end of the term, and at that time and also when the lease expired the interior of the property was in need of repairs. The repairs were not major, for a builder was ready to undertake the necessary work for £13 10s. The court construed the material words as creating a condition precedent to entitlement to a new lease. Hence the tenants' claim to be entitled to a new lease failed. However, both James and Mellish L.JJ. firmly adopted the "no subsisting breach" construction of the condition. James L.J., having observed that no doubt every property must at times be somewhat out of repair, said, at p. 315:

“but where it is required as a condition precedent to the granting a new lease that the lessee’s covenants shall have been performed, the lessee who comes to claim the new lease must show that at that time the property is in such a state as the covenants require it to be.” (Emphasis added.)

Mellish L.J. added, even more explicitly, at pp. 315–316:

“Under the terms of the covenant in the present case the lease is to be granted only in case the covenants and agreements on the part of the tenants shall have been duly observed and performed. What does that mean? I think it does not mean that the tenants must have strictly observed and performed the covenants all through the term, for the expression is, ‘shall have been duly observed and performed;’ and I think that this is satisfied if they have been so observed and performed that there is no existing right of action under them at the time when the lease is applied for.” (Emphasis added.)

Those observations were obiter dicta, but they are clear and strong statements, made in a case in which there had been repeated failures to pay rent. On four occasions distress had been levied, and on two other occasions a bailiff had gone to distrain but the rent had been paid before the levy had actually been made. Despite this unattractive record the court was firm in its adoption of the “no subsisting breach” construction.

In 1930 Clauson J. in Simons v. Associated Furnishers Ltd. [1931] 1 Ch. 379, 380, had to consider the effect of a break clause in a 17 year repairing lease under which the tenant company had the right to determine the lease after five or ten years if they should give six months’ notice and if they “shall up to the time of such determination pay the rent and perform and observe the covenants and conditions on their part hereinbefore contained . . .”

In that case dilapidations existed when the notice was given but they had been remedied by the time the notice expired. Clauson J. decided that this fulfilled the requirements of the condition.

In that case the issue before the court concerned the particular date as at which there must be performance of the tenant’s covenants: was it the date of the giving of the notice? or was it the date of expiry of the notice? It is not without significance that no argument was advanced in favour of a “never any breach” construction. Nevertheless, in deciding in favour of the latter date, and having been referred to the authorities, Clauson J., at p. 386, did consider that construction as “a possible construction,” but he concluded that he was bound by “a very heavy weight of judicial opinion” to hold that the true construction was what I have called the “no subsisting breach” construction.

I come to the most recent authority, much relied upon by Mr. Morgan. In Bassett v. Whiteley, 45 P. & C.R. 87, this court considered a renewal clause in an eight year lease, where the condition was expressed in these terms, at p. 88:

“If [the tenants] shall have paid the rent hereby reserved and shall have reasonably performed and observed the several stipulations herein contained and on their part to be performed and observed up to the termination of the tenancy hereby created . . .”

3 W.L.R.

Bass Ltd. v. Morton Ltd. (C.A.)

Nicholls L.J.

A There, on two occasions after service of a notice exercising the option, the tenants withheld rent for short periods in an attempt to put pressure on the landlord to repair a leaking roof. The rent was fully paid up when the original tenancy expired at the end of 1981. Both Waller L.J., at p. 91, and Griffiths L.J., at p. 93, adopted the “no subsisting breach” construction of the first limb of the condition regarding payment of rent and rejected the argument to the contrary advanced for the landlord.

B On the second limb of the condition, regarding performance and observance of the stipulations, they took the view that since one of the “stipulations herein contained” was for payment of rent, this limb imposed an additional requirement on the tenant in the case of rent. Under that requirement it was

C “permissible to look at the conduct of the tenants throughout the term to determine whether or not they have reasonably performed and observed the several stipulations.” per Griffiths L.J., at p. 92.

I do not read those judgments as casting any doubt on the established, conventional approach to the construction of conditions in break and renewal clauses. A notable feature of that case was the presence of the word “reasonably” in the second limb of the condition. As pointed out by Griffiths L.J., at p. 93 the word “reasonably” was introduced to mitigate the great hardship that would flow from the possibility that a very trivial breach of the stipulations might result in the loss of the option, but it did so by giving to the court a discretion. I can well understand, if I may respectfully say so, the disinclination of Waller L.J. and Griffiths L.J. to construe this clause in such a way that, in exercising this discretion (viz., in determining whether the tenants’ stipulations had reasonably been performed), the court should not be able to have regard to the conduct of the tenants.

Those are the principal authorities. In attacking the “no subsisting breach” construction, Mr. Morgan submitted that to treat a covenant as performed and observed if at a particular date there is no outstanding cause of action in respect of a past breach, either for forfeiture or for damages (other than nominal damages), is an unworkable and impractical test. Applying this test, compliance would be a matter outside the tenant’s control, because in the event of a dispute the tenant could not ensure that the dispute would be determined by the court, and any appeal finally disposed of, before the relevant date. I do not find this persuasive. Difficulties may arise in particular cases, but this test was spelled out by Mellish L.J. in 1876 in Finch v. Underwood, 2 Ch.D. 310, 315, following the even earlier observations of Erle J. and Coleridge J. in Grey v. Friar, 4 H.L.Cas. 565, 599, 608, and the paucity of reported decisions on this point since then would suggest that fears in this direction may be exaggerated.

H Mr. Morgan further submitted that, in any event, the option clause in the present case was significantly different from the conventional renewal clause. Typically a renewal clause provides for the grant of a new lease of the same length as the original term and on the same terms (save as to the amount of rent), the option being exercisable towards the end of the original term, and the new term being consecutive to the original one. Here the initial lease was for 15 years and the new term was for 125 years; the new term would, in part, be concurrent with the original term (if the judge was right in his construction of the phrase “the date of the term hereby granted”); the transaction changed from being a rental transaction to one of a capital nature (a premium of £300,000 was payable for the new lease, under which the rent was to be a peppercorn); the tenant's covenants in the new lease were modified so as to be appropriate for a long lease; and the option was exercisable at the beginning of the original term, not at the end. I agree that there are unusual features about this renewal clause. But I do not see how, considered separately or together, they lead to the conclusion, or even suggest, that in the present case the "never any breach" construction, and not the conventional "no subsisting breach" construction, is the true meaning of the relevant words in clause 9 (which, for convenience, I reproduce):

"If the tenant shall be desirous of taking a further lease of the demised premises for a further term of 125 years from the date of the term hereby granted and shall not later than 29 September 1985 give to the lessors notice in writing of such its desire and if it shall have paid the rent hereby reserved and shall have performed and observed the several stipulations on its part herein contained and on its part to be performed and observed up to the date thereof then the lessors will . . ."

In my view the condition in this clause is in a well established conventional form. It is indistinguishable in its essentials from the form considered in Finch v. Underwood, 2 Ch. D. 310, and regarding which Mellish L.J. made the observations, at p. 315, already quoted, over a century ago. One can but wonder how many leases have been entered into and implemented since then on the footing that this form of condition in a break clause or a renewal clause bears the "no subsisting breach" meaning and not the, even stricter, "never any breach" construction. Of course, questions of construction depend upon the particular language of the particular instrument, but this is a field in which the court should be slow to find that small, inexplicit differences in language lead to a clause being construed, contrary to the norm, as imposing a "never any breach" requirement.

Accordingly, and in entire agreement with the judge thus far, I would reject Mr. Morgan's submission that this is a "never any breach" condition.

Positive and negative covenants

Mr. Morgan's alternative submission was that not all covenants in leases are to be regarded as observed and performed once there is no longer any existing cause of action in respect of a past breach. Repairing covenants may be performed late, by the work being done. But, in ordinary speech, a positive covenant such as a covenant to carry on a particular business if broken over a lengthy period, would not be regarded as "performed and observed" by reason only of the tenant once more carrying on the business and paying damages for the past breaches. Again, with negative covenants: in ordinary speech, cessation of a user carried on in breach of a user covenant would be regarded as having the consequence that the covenant was currently being observed, but not that it had been observed.

Accordingly, submitted Mr. Morgan, the correct test is to ask in relation to each covenant, "Has the covenant been performed?" and to treat this, not as a question of law, but as a question of fact to be

3 W.L.R.

Bass Ltd. v. Morton Ltd. (C.A.)

Nicholls L.J.

A answered having regard to the terms of the particular covenant and to what has occurred.

B Mr. Morgan's further alternative submission was to draw a distinction, accepted by the judge, between negative and positive covenants: once a negative covenant has been broken, a condition that requires performance and observation of all covenants, cannot be fulfilled. Although, hitherto, no suggestion has been made that, in applying the "no subsisting breach" construction, different covenants in a lease might fall to be treated in different ways, no case has previously arisen where the covenants which had been breached were negative.

C I am unable to accept either of these submissions, and it is at this point that I must, with respect, part company from the judge, for this reason. The question under consideration is the true construction of a condition, viz., a condition requiring for its fulfilment the performance and observance of the tenant's covenants. In adopting the "no subsisting breach" construction the court has given to the requirement that all the tenant's covenants must have been performed and observed a secondary meaning in preference to the literal meaning: strict observance and performance is not necessary, all that is needed is that at the material date any past breaches have been made good in the way which the law recognises as a discharge of the tenant's obligation under the covenant in question. "Either the thing contracted for has been done, or compensation instead thereof has been made," in the words of Erle J. in Grey v. Friar, 4 H.L.Cas. 565, 600. Depending upon the particular covenant and the particular breach, this secondary meaning will be more, or less, attractive. But if in accordance with what I have referred to as the conventional approach, the requirement of "performance and observance" of the tenant's covenants as a condition in a break clause or a renewal clause is given that secondary meaning, that secondary meaning must, in my view, then be applied to all the tenant's covenants. I can see no basis for construing words such as "perform and observe," appearing as a condition in a break clause or a renewal clause and expressly related without distinction to all the tenant's covenants, as bearing the secondary meaning in relation to some covenants but as bearing their literal, strict meaning in relation to other covenants.

For the same reason I do not think that the distinction, made in section 146(1) of the Law of Property Act 1925, between a breach of a covenant or condition which is "capable of remedy" and one which is not, is relevant in the present case.

G For these reasons, and it being common ground that the plaintiffs suffered no loss by reason of the defendants' applications for planning permission having been made in breach of covenant, I too would allow the defendants' appeal and answer "no" to the second of the two questions directed to be tried as preliminary issues.

The plaintiffs' appeal: the date of commencement of the 125 year term

H I am in complete agreement with the judge's conclusion and reasoning regarding the date on which, on the true construction of clause 9, the new 125 year term would commence. I add a few comments only out of deference to the arguments of counsel addressed to us. Of the three dates competing for the honour of being "the date of the term hereby granted" in clause 9, the date of expiry of the initial 15 year term (31 March 1997) is supported by the references in clause 9 to a "further" lease and a "further term." These suggest that the new term would be consecutive and not (and, indeed, this would be very unusual with a renewal clause) a concurrent term. But in this case the new lease is to be granted on payment of £300,000 and for a peppercorn rent. The existing lease provides for a rental of £15,000 per annum until 1 April 1985, and a market rental thereafter. The option was exercisable until 29 September 1985. For the tenant to exercise his option and pay £300,000 in or before 1985, and then pay a market rental until 1997, and then enjoy a peppercorn rent for the next 125 years, does seem to be an improbable arrangement. When one couples with this the consideration that "the date of the term hereby granted" is not, in my view, a natural way to refer to the date of expiry of the original term, I am left in no doubt that in this case the new lease was not intended to run from 31 March 1997, even though the consequence of this construction is that the new term will run from a date earlier than the expiry of the original term.

This leaves two dates: 1 April 1982, which was the date from which the initial term of 15 years was measured, and 20 September 1982, which was the date borne by the lease. Two features support the first of these two dates. First, in the lease, including in the rent review provisions in clause 3, the term thereby granted was treated as having begun on 1 April 1982. Second, it seems unlikely that, in a lease that granted a 15 year term from a fixed, past date (1 April 1982), the parties would have intended that the new 125 year term should be calculated, not from that date, but from whatever might be the date on which, as events happened to turn out, the initial lease should actually be executed.

I too would give an affirmative answer to the first question raised as a preliminary issue and dismiss the plaintiffs' appeal.

BINGHAM L.J. Under clause 9 of the lease dated 20 September 1982, the defendants' right to require the grant of a new lease for 125 years was subject to fulfilment of two conditions precedent.

The first of these conditions related to the giving of notice not later than 29 September 1985. I agree with what the judge and Kerr and Nicholls L.J.J. have said about this. There is nothing I can usefully add.

The second condition was:

"and if [the tenant] shall have paid the rent hereby reserved and shall have performed and observed the several stipulations on its part herein contained and on its part to be performed and observed up to the date thereof" (i.e. up to the date of the notice).

Two principal questions arise in this appeal on the construction of this condition. The first is whether it requires the tenant, as a condition of its exercising the right to call for a new lease, to perform and observe all the covenants in the existing lease, whether positive or negative, up to the time of giving notice. The plaintiffs' primary submission is that it does, but that submission was not accepted by the judge. The second is whether it requires the tenant, as a condition of its exercising the right to call for a new lease, to perform and observe all negative covenants in the existing lease of which breaches, once committed, cannot be remedied, and to remedy all breaches of positive covenants before giving notice. This is the plaintiffs' alternative submission and it formed the basis of the judge's decision.

3 W.L.R.

Bass Ltd. v. Morton Ltd. (C.A.)

Bingham L.J.

A The basic 1982 lease here was of a usual enough kind. It was for a 15 year term at a rack rent with three-yearly rent reviews. It contained covenants of the kind one would expect in a lease between a brewery company and a tenant of hotel or public house premises. But Mr. Morgan for the plaintiffs suggests, in my view rightly, that clause 9 makes this a very unusual transaction. On exercise of the option the tenant can acquire a lease some eight times longer than the original term. On payment of a premium the tenant acquires this long lease free from any rental obligation. And the option is one that can, apparently, be exercised at any time after the execution of the lease in September 1982 provided it is exercised before the specified terminal date of 29 September 1985. Mr. Morgan submits, again rightly in my view, that these novel features require the court to look at the language of this clause in this lease with care and, if necessary, a fresh eye.

C The judge summarised Mr. Morgan's main submissions in his judgment [1987] 2 W.L.R. 397, 403-404. Not surprisingly, Mr. Morgan makes very much the same submissions to us. The judge observed, at p. 404c: "If the condition is to be construed literally according to its strict language, Mr. Morgan's submissions are, in my view, correct." I agree. The words used, together with the future perfect tense employed, read quite literally, suggest to me that exact compliance with the terms of the lease up to the time of exercising the option is required as a condition of its exercise.

D Mr. Morgan urges that we should, in accordance with ordinary canons of construction, give effect to the plain meaning of what the parties have agreed. If the defendants doubt their ability to comply exactly with their covenants, they can give notice under clause 9 very shortly after executing the 1982 lease. If they choose, or are for any reason obliged, to delay in giving notice, they must pay the price of exact compliance meanwhile on pain of losing the right to exercise this potentially valuable option. Having chosen to give a series of detailed covenants the defendants cannot be heard to say that exact compliance with the covenants is impossible or unreasonable or oppressive.

F It is of course true that the law has intervened to mitigate the rigours of the landlord-tenant relationship, for example in providing for relief against forfeiture and restricting the damages recoverable for breach of covenant to repair. But an option of the present kind has little to do with the ordinary relationship of landlord and tenant, and if the matter were free from authority I should see very great force in the argument that the effect of this option should be determined on ordinary contractual principles. Unfortunately for the plaintiffs, however, questions closely related to the present have been intermittently litigated for 200 years and the current of authority has been against the plaintiffs' contention.

G Of the leading cases, the first two concerned a tenant's right to determine a lease before expiry of the contractual term. This is of significance, because the context coloured the judicial approach to the question of construction. Where a tenant wished to take advantage of a break clause, the landlord was not greatly concerned with the history of the tenant's performance before the break. The worse the tenant's performance, the readier the landlord might reasonably be to get rid of him. But whatever the tenant's defaults in the past, the landlord would be very much concerned that at the time of the break the rent should be fully paid (because he could no longer distrain) and the covenants fully observed (so that the property could be re-let or sold without delay or additional expenditure). A

In Porter v. Shephard, 6 Durn. & E. 665, the lease was for seven years with a right for the tenant to determine after three or five years subject to giving notice and

“payment of all rents and arrears of rent and duties on the tenant’s part to be paid, and performance of the covenants contained on the part of the lessee until the expiration of the said first three or five years . . .” B

The case largely turned on whether this provision was a condition precedent, as it was held to be. But the trend of the court’s thinking is reflected in the judgment of Lawrence J., at p. 670:

“It seems to me that it would be unjust as against the landlord, if this were not considered to be a condition precedent; for if it were not, the lessee, after neglecting to pay the duties which are a charge on the estate, after suffering the house to be out of repair, and the rest of the premises to lie waste, might give them up to the landlord in that state, and the landlord would be left without any remedy.” C

Thus attention was firmly concentrated on the state of affairs at the time of the break. D

I need not rehearse the curious and tortured history of Grey v. Friar (1850) 5 Ex. 584, (1854) 4 H.L.Cas. 565. Most of the difficulty in that case arose from the apparently contradictory terms of the break clause in question. The issue was again whether the clause contained a condition precedent. In the result it was held to do so. There was no ruling on the question in issue here. Among the judges summoned to advise the House of Lords, however, a large majority supported the Court of Exchequer Chamber’s ruling that the clause did contain a condition precedent, and in some of their opinions there are clear and influential expressions of view on the present point. The most telling passages are in the opinions of Talfourd J., Alderson B., Erle J. and Coleridge J. The judge has cited these passages in his judgment [1987] 2 W.L.R. 397, 404–406, and I will not repeat them. All very plainly make the point (undoubtedly influenced by the form of the clause in question) that past breaches do not matter provided that these have been fully remedied or compensated for when the break clause is exercised. E

Finch v. Underwood, 2 Ch. D. 310 is a significant case for several reasons. First, it concerned a renewal clause, which is in substance closer to the present clause than is a break clause. Secondly, the wording of the clause was not dissimilar from the present: “(in case the covenants and agreements on the said tenants’ part shall have been duly observed and performed).” Thirdly, the tenants’ performance in paying rent had been highly unsatisfactory. During a seven-year term the landlords had levied a distress on four occasions, and on two others the bailiff had gone to distrain but the rent had been paid before the levy had actually been made. The case, however, turned on the fact that when the tenant sought to exercise his right to renew there was an extant breach of a repairing covenant, the estimated cost of remedying which was some £13. Malins V.-C. at first instance held that the landlord was bound by the terms of the covenant to renew and that as the want of repair was trifling it furnished no grounds of defence. He appears to have attached no significance to the earlier breaches of the covenant to F

3 W.L.R.

Bass Ltd. v. Morton Ltd. (C.A.)

Bingham L.J.

A pay rent. The Court of Appeal took a different view of the failure to repair. [His Lordship referred to passages in the judgments of James and Mellish L.JJ., at pp. 315–316 quoted by the judge [1987] 2 W.L.R. 397, 406, (see ante, p. 562A–C) and continued:] No member of the Court of Appeal referred to the earlier and (as one would have thought) serious breaches of the rental covenant, clearly regarding these as irrelevant.

B Bastin v. Bidwell, 18 Ch. D. 238 also concerned an option to renew, conditional upon the lessees paying the rent and performing and observing the covenants of this present lease.” According to Kay J., at pp. 250–251:

C “It is obvious the meaning was this: the landlord must have intended by a covenant worded like this to say: ‘I shall have the term in which to see whether you are such a tenant as I shall think it right and expedient to grant a new lease to, and the test I propose in words is this, whether when you come for your new lease, or whether at some time or other (I will not at the present moment say what time) you have paid your rent and performed your covenants.’”

D There was argument in that case (which the judge did not have to resolve) whether the relevant time for testing performance was the date of the notice or the date of its expiry, but consistently with earlier cases it was not suggested that reliance could be placed on breaches existing before either of those dates.

In Simons v. Associated Furnishers Ltd. [1931] 1 Ch. 379, Clauson J. construed a break clause, of which the condition was that the tenant

E “shall up to the time of such determination pay the rent and perform and observe the covenants and conditions on their part hereinbefore contained.”

He held himself, at p. 386:

F “bound by a very heavy weight of judicial opinion to hold that the true meaning of that clause is this, that it will have been complied with, if at the end of the five years ‘there should not exist any cause of action in respect of performance of covenants:’ or, I may put it this way, the condition must be understood as ‘requiring that the account between the parties must, both as to rents and covenants, be clear; the rent need not have been always paid on the day; but all arrears, if any, must have been paid up; the covenants must have been strictly kept, or, if broken, must have been satisfied.’”

G These were quotations from Erle J. and Coleridge J. in Grey v. Friar, 4 H.L.Cas. 565, 599, 608. Although Clauson J. made his decision at first instance, it has stood unquestioned (so far as I know) for over half a century.

H The only decision which runs against the current of authority I have mentioned is Bassett v. Whiteley, 45 P. & C.R. 87, a decision of this court. The tenants in that case were entitled to renew the lease:

“if they shall have paid the rent hereby reserved and shall have reasonably performed and observed the several stipulations herein contained and on their part to be performed and observed up to the termination of the tenancy hereby created.” see p. 88.

Save for the important word “reasonably” this covenant is not very different from that in Simons v. Associated Furnishers Ltd. [1931] 1 Ch.

379. The facts were that rent was fully paid both when notice was given and when the original lease expired, but between those dates the tenants delayed payment of rent to encourage the landlords to mend a badly leaking roof. Waller L.J. held that in the circumstances the tenants had reasonably performed and observed their covenants. Griffiths L.J. agreed with the approach of Waller L.J. It is plain that Griffiths L.J. did not think it was correct simply to look at the position at the date of determination of the original lease and I think that Waller L.J., although less explicitly, took the same view. But the crux of the decision was the word “reasonably.” It was plain that the tenants had acted altogether reasonably, whichever period or point of time was looked at. This made it unnecessary for the court to decide on the precise time to which the obligation related and I do not think the decision is binding authority on that point. The plaintiffs in this appeal understandably rely heavily on this case, but I do not think it can of itself stem or divert the flow of previous authority.

The judge said [1987] 2 W.L.R. 397, 408–409:

“I would respectfully accept that, in the end, the questions raised in the present case turn on the construction of clause 9 of the lease. Nonetheless, it does seem to me that the line of authorities to which I have referred do establish that a condition precedent which requires that there shall have been performance and observance of a tenant’s covenants does not fail simply on account of there having been a past, but remedied, breach of covenant. It would be possible to formulate a condition precedent which did require that there should not at any time have been any breach of a tenant’s covenants. But the fairly common form of condition precedent that is to be found in clause 9, not materially different from the corresponding conditions precedent contained in the respective leases in Grey v. Friar, 4 H.L.Cas. 565; Finch v. Underwood, 2 Ch. D. 310; Bastin v. Bidwell, 18 Ch.D. 238 and Simons v. Associated Furnishers Ltd. [1931] 1 Ch. 379, does not, in my judgment, fail on account of a past breach of covenant provided that the breach has been remedied.”

I agree. Whether this is the rule which, starting from scratch, one would devise, I do not know but rather doubt. It does, however, appear that the rule stated by the judge is one which has over a very long period been understood by practitioners as representing the law on this subject. It would in my opinion be a source of mischief if this court were to disturb an assumption, reasonable on the authorities, on which very many landlords and tenants may have based their conduct and their agreements. I am, up to this point, very much in agreement with the judge.

But the judge distinguished between positive and negative covenants. A covenant to do something can be substantially performed, even if late. A covenant not to do something, once broken, is broken for ever. As Lady Macbeth, referring to her breach of the sixth (negative) commandment, observed: “what’s done is done.” The judge held that the rule established by the authorities should not be extended to cover negative covenants. In reaching that conclusion he derived help from the authorities on section 146 of the Law of Property Act 1925.

I part company with the judge at this point, and for several reasons. First, the distinction is not one which in this context emerges from the

3 W.L.R.

Bass Ltd. v. Morton Ltd. (C.A.)

Bingham L.J.

A authorities on break and renewal clauses which I have mentioned. They were, it is true, concerned with breaches of positive covenants to pay rent and to repair, but the cases contain much reasoning of a general nature in which this distinction is never mentioned. Secondly, in a detailed lease such as the present there are numerous covenants, some positive and some negative, and it would in my view be unwieldy and unnecessary to differentiate between them for this purpose. Many of these covenants could be expressed in either a negative or a positive way and even if regard is had to the substance rather than the words used there is sometimes a positive and a negative element in the covenants. Thirdly and most importantly, I consider that this distinction in the present context distracts attention from the commercial core of the contract and directs it towards what may often be matters of form. One can take for examples the covenants not to sublet the premises or permit them to be used for an unlawful or immoral purpose. Once a breach of such a covenant has occurred, nothing can in a literal sense wipe the slate clean; and, on principles already discussed, it is plain that a tenant who seeks to exercise the option during the currency of a breach or without making proper compensation for a previous breach will be rightly refused. Suppose, however, that an unlawful subletting or an improper user has been brought to an end, and suitable undertakings proffered and appropriate compensation paid, in circumstances such that the landlord could show no continuing damage. It would seem to me highly and undesirably formalistic to hold that the tenant was forever debarred by those breaches from exercising the option, even though breaches of positive covenants at an earlier time could have been committed and made good. The present facts vividly illustrate the point. The defendants should not have applied for planning permission on two occasions, without consent. These were plain, and perhaps indefensible, breaches of covenant. But they have caused the plaintiffs no harm of any kind and would not (I think) have done so even if the applications had not been refused. This whole matter was investigated on the defendants' application for relief from forfeiture, and undertakings were given. There was no reason to apprehend a further breach. When the option was exercised, the account between the parties in this respect was (in the words of Coleridge J. in Grey v. Friar, 4 H.L.Cas. 565, 608) clear; a covenant had been broken, but it had been satisfied for. In my judgment these breaches do not have the effect, simply because the covenant was negative, of preventing the tenant from exercising the option.

G On these grounds I would allow the appeal.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Greek owners chartered their vessel to the charterer under a charterparty which provided, by clause 9, that if the ship should be detained beyond the lay days demurrage should be paid at the rate of U.S. $6,000 per day and, by clause 30, that the amount of demurrage should be paid in British sterling at the exchange rate at the date of the bill of lading. The vessel completed discharge of the cargo after considerable delay. A dispute as to the period of time for which demurrage was payable was referred to arbitration. The umpire determined the amount of demurrage payable and, on the basis that the charterer had been under an obligation to settle and pay for demurrage within two months of completion of discharge, he held that the owners were entitled to recover, as damages for late payment of the outstanding demurrage, the loss suffered by them by reason of sterling having depreciated by the date of the award. He awarded the owners £15,746. The charterer appealed to the High Court. Lloyd J. remitted the award to the umpire for further consideration because it was not clear from his reasons whether the award consisted of general or special damage, with only the latter being recoverable. The umpire published his further award stating that the currency exchange loss suffered by the owners was special damage. Thereafter the charterer's appeal came before Staughton J., who held that the umpire had been wrong in law to conclude that the currency exchange loss amounted to special damage, and he varied the award to exclude the damages element, thereby limiting the award to demurrage payable in sterling in accordance with clause 30 of the charterparty. On the owners' appeal, the Court of Appeal held that the currency exchange loss was recoverable as special damage for breach of contract and that the owners' claim for damages was not precluded by the determination of rate of exchange provision in clause 30, in that the clause did not apply when the paying party was in breach of contract by failing to pay within two months of completion of discharge.

Held, allowing the appeal, that demurrage was the sum payable as damages for breach of the contract in detaining the ship beyond the lay days and under the terms of the charterparty those damages were fixed at $6,000 for each day beyond the contractual period for loading the vessel; that no term could be implied into the charterparty that those liquidated damages for breach of contract had to be paid within two months of the discharge of the cargo; and that, accordingly, since there was no basis for the finding that the charterer was in further breach of

APPEAL from the Court of Appeal.

This was an appeal by the appellant, the President of India, from the order of the Court of Appeal [1987] 2 W.L.R. 906 (Neill and Nicholls L.JJ. and Sir Roualeyn Cumming-Bruce) allowing an appeal by the respondents, Lips Maritime Corporation, from an order of Staughton J. [1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 180 varying the award of an umpire of 22 February 1983 made in arbitration proceedings concerning a claim by the respondents, the owners of m.v. Lips for discharge-port demurrage under a charterparty dated 1 July 1980.

The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Brandon of Oakbrook.

Anthony Diamond Q.C. and Peregrine Simon for the appellant.
Anthony Grabiner Q.C. and Steven Gee for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

29 July. LORD KEITH OF KINKEL. My Lords, I have had the opportunity of reading the speech to be delivered by my noble and learned friend Lord Brandon of Oakbrook. I agree with it and for the reasons he gives would allow the appeal.

LORD FRASER OF TULLYBELTON. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Mackay of Clashfern, and I share his difficulty in departing from the umpire's holding to the effect that the charterer was contractually bound to pay the demurrage by 11 December 1980. But I agree with my noble and learned friend that it would be inappropriate either to remit the case to the umpire or to decide the appeal upon a legal basis which is unsound. In these circumstances I agree that the appeal should be allowed and should be disposed of in the way proposed by my noble and learned friend Lord Brandon of Oakbrook.

LORD BRANDON OF OAKBROOK. My Lords, this is an appeal by leave of your Lordships' House from an order of the Court of Appeal (Neill and Nicholls L.JJ. and Sir Roualeyn Cumming-Bruce) [1987] 2 W.L.R. 906 made on 31 October 1986. By that order the court allowed an appeal from an order of Staughton J. [1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 180 made in the Commercial Court on 4 April 1985, by which he had varied an award of 22 February 1983 made in arbitration proceedings in London by an umpire, Mr. Frank Rehder.

The appellant ("the charterer") was the charterer of the m.v. Lips ("the ship") owned by the respondents ("the owners") under a voyage charterparty dated 1 July 1980 ("the charter"). Pursuant to the charter the ship loaded a cargo of di-ammonium phosphate at Donaldsville, Louisiana, and carried it to India. There she discharged part of the cargo, for lightening purposes, at Visakhapatnam, and the remainder of it at Calcutta. After the completion of the voyage disputes arose concerning, among other things, the amount of the charterer's liability to the owners in respect of demurrage. It is with the way in which the

A umpire dealt with the owners' claim in respect of demurrage that the proceedings in the courts below and the present appeal is concerned.

B The charter provided, so far as material, as follows. By clause 9, that if the ship should be detained beyond the lay days demurrage should be paid at the rate of U.S. $6,000 per day and pro rata, and despatch money for all working time saved at half the demurrage rate per working day and pro rata. By clause 13, that the owners should have a lien on the cargo for demurrage. By clause 15, that general average should be settled in London. By clause 17, that any dispute arising under the charter should be settled by arbitration in London. By clause 18, that the freight should be paid in London in British sterling: 90 per cent. within seven days of submission of the necessary freight bill and the balance after completion of settlement of demurrage/despatch. By C clause 19, that freight should be calculated at various rates in U.S. dollars per ton of cargo depending on the charterer's choice of ports for loading and discharge. By clause 28, how lay time should be calculated and that lay time for loading and discharging should be reversible.

Clause 30 of the charter further provided:

D “(A) Freight . . . is payable in British external sterling . . . in London . . . at the mean exchange rate ruling on bill(s) of lading date. (B) The mean exchange rate ruling on bill of lading date will also apply to other related payments/settlements including demurrage/despatch settlements under this charterparty and will apply in all cases where payments/settlements are effected in currency other than the currency in which the rates of freight and demurrage/despatch are indicated in the charterparty. (C) In cases E where there is more than one bill of lading in respect of a shipment the mean exchange rate as above will be applicable to the calculation of freight under each bill of lading. For the purpose of demurrage/despatch and other related payments, the exchange rate applicable will be the simple average of the mean exchange rates adopted for freight calculations. (D) Demurrage/despatch and any F other payments under this charterparty shall also be made in British external sterling.”

G By his award the umpire decided as follows. (1) That the ship had been on demurrage for 28 days 1 hour and 47 minutes of which only 24 days and 47 minutes had been admitted and paid for by the charterer, leaving 4 days and 1 hour still to be paid for by him. (2) That the amount of demurrage payable in respect of this period of 4 days and 1 hour, calculated at the prescribed rate of $6,000 per day and pro rata, was $24,250. (3) That the rate of exchange on the date of the bills of lading was $1.54 = £1 (4) That the charterer was under an obligation to settle and pay for demurrage within two months of the completion of discharge. (5) That the owners were entitled to recover, as damages for H late payment of the outstanding demurrage, the loss suffered by them by reason of sterling having depreciated from a rate of $2.37 = £1 at the bills of lading date to $1.54 = £1 at the date of the award. (6) That, in order to give effect to this right of recovery, the sum of $24,250 referred to earlier should be converted into sterling, not at the rate of $2.37 = £1 prevailing at the bills of lading date, but at the rate of $1.54 = £1 prevailing at the date of the award, producing a sum payable by the charterer of £15,746.75 to which interest should be added.

While the above represents a summary of what the umpire decided, I think that I should set out in full two passages from the reasons for his award given by him. Paragraph 4.2 of the reasons reads:

“On the date of the bills of lading the rate of exchange was about $2.37 = £1.00. At the present time it is about $1.54 = £1.00. Thus, if, as charterers contended, conversion of the amount awarded is made at the rate as at the bill of lading date, owners will suffer a considerable loss. Charterers were in breach in not making payment at the proper time, and the damages for that breach is the difference between the respective rates of exchange, and I have awarded accordingly.”

Paragraph 8.2 of the reasons reads: “The demurrage should have been settled and paid within two months of the completion of discharge, i.e. by 11 December 1980”

It was common ground between the parties before your Lordships that the sum of £15,746.75 awarded by the umpire in respect of demurrage, though not so expressly described in the award, must be regarded as comprising two separate elements: first, $24,250 converted at $2.37 = £1, which comes to £10,232.07 (“the demurrage element”), and, secondly, the difference between $24,250 converted at $1.54 = £1 and at $2.37 = £1, which comes to £5,514.68 (“the damages element”).

The charterer’s case before your Lordships was that the umpire was wrong in law in deciding that demurrage should have been settled and paid for two months after completion of discharge, and, on that ground, in adding the damages element to the demurrage element. It was, however, also common ground that, assuming that the umpire was right in law about these two matters, he should have calculated the damages element by reference to the rate of exchange prevailing two months after completion of discharge, i.e. 11 December 1980, rather than the rate of exchange prevailing on the bills of lading date. The rate of exchange prevailing on 11 December 1980 was $2.32 = £1. If that rate is taken, the damages element is reduced from £5,514.68 to £5,294.16, and the total of both elements from £15,746.75 to £15,526.23.

My Lords, by order dated 15 July 1983 Hobhouse J. gave the charterer leave to appeal on a question of law which was, in effect, whether the umpire was right in law, in dealing with the owners’ claim in respect of demurrage, to add the damages element to the demurrage element.

On 26 July 1984 the appeal came before Lloyd J. [1985] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 180. He took the view that the principle laid down by your Lordships’ House in President of India v. La Pintada Compania Navigacion S.A. [1985] A.C. 104; [1984] 3 W.L.R. 10 in relation to claims to recover interest as damages for late payment applied equally in relation to claims to recover currency exchange losses as damages for late payment. That principle was that interest could be recovered as damages for late payment if it was special damage which could be brought within the second part of the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale (1854) 9 Exch. 341, but not if it was general damage which could only be brought within the first part of that rule. Lloyd J., being of that opinion and considering also that the umpire’s reasons for his award left it in doubt whether he regarded the owners’ currency exchange loss as coming within the first or second part of the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale, by order dated 30 July 1984 allowed the appeal to the extent of

3 W.L.R.

President of India v. Lips Maritime (H.L.(E.))

Lord Brandon

A remitting the award to the umpire in order that he should reconsider the matter and resolve that doubt.

B As a result of the remission the umpire made a further award dated 23 November 1984. In it he set out a series of further findings of fact on the basis of which he said that, in his view, the currency exchange loss suffered by the owners was special damage coming within the second part of the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale. Paragraph 15 of his further award reads:

“The provisions of clause 30 apply, for better or for worse, where the contract is correctly performed; but they do not apply to a breach. I have already found that charterers were in breach in not making payment timeously.”

C It appears to me that this passage involves some confusion of thought. In arriving at the amount of the demurrage element, the umpire did apply the provisions of clause 30; but he counteracted that application by adding the damages element. The result is, mathematically, the same; but the rationale is different. What I think that the umpire was really trying to say was that, although clause 30 was applicable to the calculation of the demurrage element, it did not preclude the addition to the latter of the damages element.

D Following the making of the umpire's further award, the charterer's appeal came back for further hearing before Staughton J. [1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 180. He held that, having regard to the further findings of fact made in the further award, the umpire had been wrong in law to conclude that the owners' currency exchange loss came within the second part of the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale; he should instead have concluded that it came within the first part of that rule. He accordingly made an order dated 4 April 1985, the effect of which was to vary the umpire's award in respect of demurrage by excluding from it the damages element.

E The owners appealed to the Court of Appeal [1987] 2 W.L.R. 906 constituted as stated earlier. That court allowed the appeal on two grounds. The first ground was that the currency exchange loss suffered by the owners came within the second part of the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale and was therefore recoverable as special damage for breach of contract. The second ground was that clause 30 of the charter determined the rate of exchange applicable when the contract was performed, i.e. when demurrage was settled and paid for within two months of the completion of discharge, but did not do so when the paying party was in breach of the contract by failing to pay within that time. The clause did not, therefore, preclude the owners' claim for damages.

F Here again there seems to have been some confusion of thought. If clause 30 did not apply to determine the rate of exchange applicable in the case of a late payment, then there was no provision for conversion in that case at all. It would follow for reasons given later that, in such a case, demurrage would be payable in dollars. The Court of Appeal, however, held that, since the owners had not contended for payment in dollars before the umpire, it was too late for them to do so at that stage.

G My Lords, it will be apparent from the account which I have given of the proceedings in the courts below that this case has been dealt with throughout on two basic assumptions. The first assumption has been that the umpire was right in law in deciding that the charterer
